OF THE

BY

P R E F A C E.

I PURPOSE to commit to writing the History of a most extraordinary Revolution, one that has caused a deep sensation, and upon which public opinion is still divided. I have not concealed from myself the difficulties of my task; for strong political feelings, which it was considered had expired under military despotism, are now awakening from their slumber. All at once, men, borne down with age and toil, have experienced the revival of passions apparently extinct, and have imparted those passions to us their descendants and inheritors. But although we may have to maintain the same cause with them, we are not, therefore, obliged to defend their errors, more especially as we have the faculty of distinguishing between liberty and those who, whether with good or evil intentions, have devoted themselves to her service, possessing also, as we do, the advantage of having seen and conversed with those veterans who, yet absorbed in their recollection, and impressed with the emotions of the past, instruct us to identify our associations with the memory of long past events. Perhaps the moment when the actors of this great drama are about to quit the scene, is the most proper period to write their history, for then we can receive their testimony without being made parties to their prejudices or political inclinations.

Be this as it may, I have done my best to soften in my own bosom every feeling of personal bias. I have alternately supposed myself as either drawing my earliest breath in a cottage, inspired with a laudable ambition, and striving to attain that eminence from which I was debarred by the pride of the higher classes; or else as having been brought up in a palace, the inheritor of ancient privileges, feeling the mortification of being compelled to disclaim a possession which I had reason to consider as conferring a lawful title. The moment I entered on this train of reflection, all partiality or bias lost its hold upon my mind. I have mourned for the losers in the conflict, and have consoled myself by the admiration of elevated characters.

THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY.

CHAPTER I.

THE MORAL AND POLITICAL STATE OF FRANCE TOWARDS THE END OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY—THE ACCESSION OF LOUIS XVI.—THE MINISTRIES OF MAUREPAS, TURGOT, AND NECKER. CALONNE. ASSEMBLY OF NOTABLES. —THE MINISTRY OF BRIENNE—OPPOSITION BY THE PARLIAMENT OF PARIS, ITS EXILE AND RECALL—THE DUKE OF ORLEANS BANISHED THE COURT—ARREST OF COUNCILLOR D'ESPRÉMÉNIL—NECKER RECALLED TO FILL THE PLACE OF BRIENNE—NEW ASSEMBLY OF NOTABLES—DISCUSSIONS TO WHICH THE STATES-GENERAL GAVE RISE —CLUBS FORMED—THE PROXIMATE CAUSES OF THE REVOLUTION—THE FIRST ELECTION OF DEPUTIES TO THE STATES-GENERAL—THE FIRING OF THE MANUFACTORY OF RÉVILLON—THE DUKE OF ORLEANS; HIS CHARACTER.

With the revolutions of the French monarchy, history is well acquainted; it is well known that first the Greeks and then the Romans carried their arms and civilization among the half-savage Gauls; that after these conquerors, the barbarians established their military hierarchy; and that this system of government transferred from individuals to the land, became as it were permanently secured, and thus formed the feudal system. Power was then divided between the feudal chief, styled king, and sub-chiefs named vassals, who in their turn became kings over their own subjects. In our time, when a new spirit of inquiry has rendered us more acute in detecting the faults of others, we have learnt with sufficient certainty, that the possession of power was first disputed by the vassals, which those who are placed very near its reach are always inclined to do; that this power was afterwards divided between them,—thus forming the feudal anarchy; and that, finally, it returned to the throne, where it became concentrated in despotism under Louis XI., Richelieu, and Louis XIV. The condition of the French population became progressively ameliorated by industry, the first source of riches and freedom. First in an agricultural, afterwards in a commercial and manufacturing point of view, she acquired sufficient importance to form a distinct nation. When introduced in the character of a petitioner to the States-General, she appeared not but on her knees there to be reviled with pity and contempt*. Soon afterwards even Louis XIV. said that he would have no more of such abject assemblies, and declared it to the parliament, booted and with whip in hand. From this period a king was seen at the head of the state, fortified by a power badly defined in its theory but absolute in its practice, with grandees who had abandoned their feudal dignity in favour of the monarch, and disputed among themselves by intrigue that portion of the property of the people which was delivered into their hands; besides this, an immense population existed, having no connexion with this royal aristocracy, except that of an habitual submission and the payment of taxes. Between the court and the people parliaments intervened, invested with power to distribute justice, and to register the royal ordinances. Supreme authority is always disputed: when this is not the case in the lawfully constituted assemblies of the nation, it takes place in the very palace of the prince. It is a known fact, that by a refusal to register, the parliaments suspended the effect of the royal ordinances, which always finished by a "lit de justice*" and an agreement when the king was weak, and a perfect submission when he was strong. Louis had not even to bind himself by any articles, for under his reign no parliament dared make remonstrances. He dragged the nation along with him in his train, and she covered him with the glory of the wonders she wrought in war and the arts and sciences. Both subjects and monarch were unanimous, and drove towards the same end. But Louis XIV. had hardly expired, when the regent offered an opportunity to the parliament of revenging themselves of their long nonentity. The expressed desire of a monarch so respected during his life, was disregarded after his death, and his will violated. Power was now contested in earnest, and a long struggle commenced between the parliaments, the clergy, and the court, in presence of a nation exhausted by long wars

* In the States-general, the tiers état, or third estate, a class not dissimilar to the burghesses when first summoned to English parliaments, remained uncovered, and never spoke but on their knees; but Mignet tells us on the present occasion, that these days were past. Mignet, i. 31. Transl.

tor, a reckless agitator, a demagogue in the parliaments, and aristocrat in the states-general, and who was afterwards declared to be in a state of insanity by a decree of the constituent assembly, this D'Esprémeuil, I say, showed himself on this occasion one of the most violent parliamentary declaimers. But the opposition was secretly conducted by Duport, a young man of distinguished talent, and of a firm and persevering character, who alone perhaps in the middle of these troubles, proposed to himself a definite object, and wished to lead his party, the court, and the nation, to an end entirely distinct from a parliamentary aristocracy.

The parliament was divided into old and young councillors. The first sought a countervailing balance against the royal authority for the honour of their own body; the latter, more ardent and more sincere, wished to introduce liberty into the state, without overturning, nevertheless, that political system under which they had been bred. The parliament made a grave declaration, declaring itself unauthorised to consent to taxes, and maintaining that that power solely belonged to the states-general; and it also demanded from the king an account of the public receipts and expenses.

This declaration of incompetency, and even of usurpation, for the parliament had until then arrogated to itself the right of consenting to taxes, astonished every one. The prelate minister irritated by this opposition, commanded the parliament to assemble immediately at Versailles, and had the two acts registered in a "lit de justice." (Aug. 6, 1787.) The parliament on their return to Paris, made protests, and ordered an inquiry into the prodigalities of Calonne. Suddenly a decision of the council broke up its proceedings, and banished it to Troyes. (Aug. 15, 1787.)

Such was the situation of things on the 15th day of August, 1787. The two brothers of the king, Monsieur and the Count d'Artois, were sent, one to the Court of Accounts, and the other to the Court of Aids, to have the edicts there registered. The first, who had become popular by the opinions he had manifested in the assembly of notables, was received by an immense crowd with acclamation, and reconducted to the Luxembourg in the midst of universal plaudits. The Count d'Artois, who was odious on account of the support he had given to Calonne, was saluted by murmurs of discontent; his suite was attacked, and he himself was obliged to have recourse to an armed force for his protection.

As to the parliaments*, at this time they were protected by numerous defenders, composed of lawyers and persons employed in official capacities in the palace, of clerks, students, and an active population, disposed to insurrection. To these natural allies of the parliaments were to be added those capitalists who apprehended a national bankruptcy, the enlightened classes who were devoted to all who formed an opposition, and lastly, the mob, which always ranges itself on the side of agitation. The disturbances assumed a grave aspect, so much so, that the constituted authorities found it difficult to repress them.

The parliament sitting at Troyes, assembled every day, and called the causes. Neither advocates nor solicitors appeared, and justice was suspended, an event which had often happened during the course of the century. In the meanwhile, the parliament remained in exile, and Mons. de Brienne was without money; he maintained with assurance that he should not want any, and tranquillized the court, who were uneasy on that sole account; but his funds soon became exhausted; and incapable of terminating his difficulties by an energetic resolution, he negotiated with some members of parliament. The conditions demanded were, the loan of 440 millions, the whole to be paid by equal yearly dividends in four years, at the end of which the states-general were to be convoked. At this price Brienne gave up the two taxes, the subject of so much discord; and being sure of the co-operation of some members, he trusted to the whole body, and the parliament was recalled on the 10th of September.

A royal sitting took place on the 20th of the same month; the king came in person to present an edict relative to the creation of a successive loan, and the convocation of the states-general in five years. The nature of this sitting was not explained, nor was it known whether it was a "lit de justice" or not. A solemn silence was preserved by the whole assembly, whose faces were clouded with melancholy. The Duke of Orleans rose, his features agitated with all the marks of violent emotion. He addressed himself to the king, and demanded, if this assembly was a "lit de justice," or a free consultation? "It is a royal sitting," replied the king. The councillors Fréteau, Sabatier, and D'Esprémeuil, spoke after the Duke of Orleans, and declaimed with their usual violence. The recording of the edicts was immediately forced. Fréteau and Sabatier were banished to the isles of Hyères, and the Duke of Orleans to Villers-Cotterets. The states-general were discharged for five years.

Such were the principal events of the year 1787. The year 1788 commenced by new hostilities. On the 4th of January the parliament passed an act against "lettres de cachet," and for the recall of exiled persons. The king annulled this act, and the parliament confirmed it anew.

During this time the Duke of Orleans, exiled to Villers-Cotterets, was unable to support his banishment with resignation. This prince, embroiled with the court, had reconciled himself with public opinion, which had not at first regarded him favourably. But being devoid either of the dignity of a prince or the firmness of a tribune, he could not endure the slightest pain, and to obtain his recall, condescended to solicit the good offices of the queen, his known enemy.

Brienne, although irritated by the obstacles he had met with, had not the energy to overcome them. Weak in Europe against Prussia, to which he had sacrificed Holland; powerless in France against the parliament and the grands of the state, he was no longer supported by any save the queen, and moreover was frequently disabled from attending to business by bad health. He could neither repress revolts, or put into execution the reductions decreed by the king; and in spite of the approaching exhaustion of the treasury, he affected an inconceivable security. Nevertheless, in the middle of so many difficulties, he did not neglect to provide for himself new offices, and to load his family with fresh dignities.

Lamignon, the keeper of the seals, not so weak, but possessing less influence than the archbishop of Toulouse, concerted with him a new plan for the accomplishment of their chief object—that of striking a blow at the political power of the parliament, for there was the principal seat of power at that period. It was necessary to keep this secret. All was prepared in silence: sealed letters were sent to the commandants of the provinces; the press where the edicts were prepared was surrounded by guards. It was intended that this project should not be known till the moment of its promulgation to the parliaments. The time approached, and a report was spread abroad that a great political act was in preparation. The councillor D'Espréménil succeeded in corrupting, by money, a printer's workman to procure him a copy of the edicts. He then proceeded immediately to the palace, assembled his colleagues, and boldly announced to them the ministerial project (May 1, 1788.) According to this project, six great bailiwicks* were to be established within the district of the parliament, whose office was to be that of restraining their too extensive jurisdiction; the power of pronouncing final judgment, and of registering laws and edicts, was transferred to a full court, composed of peers, prelates, magistrates, and military officers, all chosen by the king. The captain of the guard also was to have had a deliberative voice. This plan militated against the judicial power of the parliament, and annihilated altogether its political power. The entire body, astonished at this proceeding, were at a loss how to meet it. It could not deliberate on a measure which had not been submitted to it, nor passively submit to such a blow without resistance. In this embarrassment it had recourse to an expedient which in respect of the occasion discovered great firmness and ability—that of revising and re-establishing, by an express act, all the constituent laws of the monarchy, not forgetting to comprehend in this number its very existence and rights. By this measure, it by no means anticipated the supposed designs of government, and parliament gained its object, and maintained all it had a right to maintain.

It was in consequence declared on the 5th of May by the parliament of Paris:

"That France is a monarchy governed by the king, according to the laws; and that these laws, many of which are fundamental, comprehend and settle, 1st. The right of the reigning family to the throne, descending from male to male by order of primogeniture; 2d, the right of the nation freely to grant subsidies by the organ of the states-general regularly convened and constituted; 3d, the customs and capitularies of the provinces; 4th, the permanency of magistrates; 5th, the right of courts to execute in every province the ordinances of the king, but not to order their registry, unless they be in conformity with the constitutional laws of the province, as well as the fundamental laws of the state; 6th, the right of each citizen never in any manner to be delivered up to any other than his natural judges, who are those which the law appoints; and 7th, that right, without which all others are useless, of every individual, not to be arrested, whatsoever the order be, unless for the purpose of being committed without delay to the custody of judges exercising a competent jurisdiction. The said court protested against every attempt that should be directed against the principles heretofore expressed."

To this energetic resolution the minister replied by empty threats, a course on all occasions badly advised and inoperative: he used rough language against certain members of the parliament. D'Espréménil and Gislart de Monsabert, hearing that they were menaced, took refuge in the body of the assembled parliament. An officer, named Vincent D'Agout, proceeded there at the head of a company, and not knowing the magistrates named in his warrant, called them by their names. The profoundest silence reigned at first in the assembly; then the members cried out that they were all of them one D'Espréménil. At last, the real D'Espréménil declared himself, and followed the officer commissioned to arrest him. The tumult was then at its height; the people accompanied the magistrates with acclamations. Three days after, the king, holding a "lit de justice," had the edicts registered, and the princes and peers assembled presented the image of that plenary court which was to succeed the parliaments.

The Châtelet passed immediately a decree against the edicts. The parliament of Rheims declared those infamous who entered the plenary court. At Grenoble the inhabitants defended their magistrates against two regiments. The troops themselves, excited to disobedience by the military nobles, soon refused to act; and when the commandant of the Dauphiné assembled his colonels to know if their soldiers could be depended on, they all kept silence. The youngest, who was interrogated first, said that his, commencing from the colonel, were not to be trusted. To this resistance the minister opposed the decrees of the grand council, which annulled the decisions of the sovereign courts, and condemned eight of them to exile.

The court, harassed by the nobility, who had occasioned the hostility of the parliament, by appealing to the people, had recourse in its turn to the same means. It resolved to call the tiers état to its aid, as the kings of France had done before to exterminate feudalism. The convocation of the states-general was therefore hurried on with all possible speed; precedents were ordered to be searched as to the best mode of their assembling; authors and learned societies were invited to impart their intelligence; and whilst the assembled clergy declared on their part that their convocation must be hastened, the court accepting the defiance, at the same time suspended the meeting of the plenary court, and fixed the opening of the states-general for the first of May, 1789. At this juncture, the Archbishop of Toulouse retired, (Aug. 24, 1788,) who, by hardy projects inefficiently executed, had provoked a resistance, which ought neither to have been excited or suppressed. In retiring he left the treasury in poverty, the rents of the Hotel de Ville suspended, all the authorities at war, and all the provinces in arms. As for himself, enriched with eight hundred thousand francs from benefices, with the archbishopric of Sens, and with a cardinal's hat, if he did not amend the commonwealth, he at least made his own fortune. As his last advice, he recommended the king to recal Necker to the ministry of the finances, in order that his popularity might be effectual to check those popular encroachments which seemed to be inevitable.

It was during the two years 1787 and 88, that the French nation first conceived the idea of advancing from idle theories to practice. The struggle of the chief authorities excited this desire, and afforded the means of satisfying it. During the whole of this century, the parliament had been attacking the clergy, and discovering their transalpine inclinations; after the clergy, the parliament next attacked the court, pointed out its abuses of power, and impeached its irregularities. Threatened with reprisals, and in its turn disturbed in its existence, it proceeded at last to restore those prerogatives to the nation which the court had been desirous of stripping itself, in order that they should be re-vested in an extraordinary tribunal. Having thus apprised the people of their rights, the parliament exerted every effort to incite them to insurrection; on their part, the high clergy by issuing mandates, the nobility in inciting the military to insubordination, had joined their efforts to those of the magistracy, and stirred up the people to arms in defence of their privileges.

The court, pressed upon by these different enemies, made but a weak resistance. Feeling the necessity of action, and deferring always the opportunity, it had extinguished sometimes some abuses, rather for the advantage of the treasury than the interest of the people, and relapsed again into inactivity. Finally, being attacked on all sides, and observing that the nobility called the people to the contest, it also resolved upon introducing them into the convocation of the states-general; and, although opposed during the whole century to the spirit of philosophy, the court on this occasion appealed to its principles, and determined to deliver up to its examination the constitution of the kingdom. Thus the principal authorities presented the singular spectacle of unjust usurpers, who, having a long time disputed the right of a possession in presence of its lawful owner, at last conclude by calling upon him as an umpire in the contest.

Things were in this situation, when Necker re-entered the ministry. (Aug. 1. 1788.) Confidence accompanied him; credit was forthwith re-established; the most pressing difficulties of the treasury were discharged. By various expedients he provided for the necessary expenses until the convocation of the states-general, which was the remedy anxiously called for by all parties.

Great questions began now to be agitated relative to its organization. It was asked what part the tiers état would take; if it would appear there as an equal or as a petitioner; whether it should possess an equal number of representatives with the two first ranks; whether its deliberations should be carried on individually or collectively, and whether the tiers état should have but one voice against the two voices of the nobility and clergy.

The first question agitated was that of the number of deputies, and never did a philosophical controversy of the eighteenth century excite equal ferment. The absolute importance of the question heated the minds of all. A concise, energetic, bitter writer took in this discussion the place which the great geniuses of the age had occupied in philosophical quarrels. The Abbé Sieyès, in a publication which gave a strong impulse to the public spirit, asks, What is the tiers état? and answers, Nothing. What ought it to be?—Every thing!

The states of the Dauphiné met in spite of the court. The two first ranks, more powerful and more popular in this country than any where else, decided that the representatives of the tiers état should be equal to that of the nobility and clergy. The parliament of Paris seeing already the consequence of its imprudent provocations, perceived that the tiers état would not come as an auxiliary, but as a controlling power; and in registering the edict of convocation, it enjoined as an express clause the maintenance of the precedents of 1614, which virtually annulled the influence of the third class. Having already lost the popular favour by the difficulties it had opposed to the edict of toleration to the protestants, the parliament was now entirely unmasked, and the court completely avenged. They were the first to experience the instability of popular favours: and if at a later period the nation became ungrateful to her favourites whom she abandoned one after another, on this occasion she certainly acted justly against the parliament, for it stopped short before she had recovered any one of her rights.

The court, not daring to decide by its own authority these important questions, or rather wishing to deprive the two first ranks of their popularity to its own advantage, asked their advice, with the intention of not following it, if (as was probable) this advice was against the tiers état. A new assembly of the *notables was convoked, in which all questions relative to the holding of the states-general were agitated. The dispute was animated. On the one side ancient observances, and on the other the natural rights of man were upheld. In reference even to the former, the tiers état had still the advantage; for to the forms of 1614, cited by the nobility, were opposed other precedents of a still more ancient date. Thus in some assemblies, and on certain points, votes had been collected individually; sometimes the deliberations of the states had been carried on by province and not by rank; oftentimes the deputies of the tiers état had equalled in number those of the nobility and clergy: how then could the ancient usages be alleged? had not the powers of the realm been in a continual state of revolution? Had not the royal authority itself been subject to constant vicissitude? at one time sovereign, then vanquished and despoiled, afterwards raising itself anew by the aid of the people, and finally concentrating all power in itself. The clergy were informed that if they went back to the ancient times, they were no longer an order; in respect of the nobles, it was agreed that the possessors of fiefs alone could be elected, and that therefore the majority of them ought to be excluded; in regard of the parliament itself, that they were but the unfaithful officers of royalty; and all of them were told that the French constitution was nothing but one long revolution, during which each power had in turn the predominance; that all had been innovation; and that in such a wide conflict reason ought alone to decide.

The tiers état comprehended nearly the whole of the nation, all the useful, industrious, enlightened classes; although the tiers état did possess but a portion of the landed interest, at least they had farmed it all, and, according to the dictates of reason, it was not unreasonable that there should be granted to this order a number of deputies equal to that of the two other orders.

The assembly of the notables declared itself against this doubling of the tiers état, as they called it. Only one committee, the same over which Monsieur the king's brother presided, voted for it. The court, then taking into consideration, to use its own expression, the advice of the minority, the opinion pronounced by many princes of the blood, the desire of the three orders of the Dauphiné, the demand of the provincial assemblies, the example of many countries of the state, the counsel of several authors, and the wish expressed by a great number of addresses, ordered that the total number of deputies should be a thousand at least; that it should be formed as reason required, and consist of the population and tax-payers selected from every bailiwick; and that the number of deputies of the tiers état should be equal to that of the two first orders joined together. (Decree of the Council of 27th December, 1788.)

This declaration excited an universal enthusiasm. Attributed to Necker, it gained him the favour of the nation, and the hatred of the great. Nevertheless this declaration decided nothing as to the voting individually or collectively, but impliedly it reduced the question to one point, for it was useless to augment the number of voices, if they were not to be counted. Thus the third class obtained virtually that which had been expressly denied them. It also gave an idea of the weakness of the court, and even of Necker himself. This court presented such an assemblage of various opinions, that it became impossible to attain a definite result. As for the king himself, although equitable and desirous of pleasing, he was too mistrustful of his own abilities; and, though willing to redress the grievances of his people, he was seized sometimes with panical and superstitious terrors, and thought he could see anarchy and impiety marching hand-in-hand with liberty and toleration. The spirit of philosophy, in its first flight, had committed some errors; and a timid and religious king naturally became terrified. Thus sinking every moment under weakness, terror, and vacillation of mind, Louis XVI. determined upon every sacrifice, so far as he himself was concerned, but he had not resolution enough to impose any upon others: a victim to his leaning towards the court, and of his complaisance to the queen, he expiated faults which were not of his own commission, but which became his as being the head of the state. The queen, devoted to her pleasures, revelling in the empire of her own charms, would have been perfectly happy if her husband had been tranquil, and the treasury full, and herself adored by the court and her subjects. At one time, when the necessity appeared urgent, she joined the king in endeavouring to bring about a reform; while, at another, when she imagined the supreme authority to be menaced, and her court friends despoiled, she stayed the king's intentions, caused the popular minister to be dismissed, and destroyed all means and hope of doing good. Above all, she yielded to the influence of one party of the nobility, who lived in the royal circle, and were fostered in its luxuries and excesses. This court nobility, as did the queen herself, undoubtedly wished that the king should have the means of indulging their prodigalities; and, from this motive, were the enemy of parliaments when they refused the supplies, but became their friends when they defended their privileges, by refusing, under specious pretences, their assent to the territorial subsidy. In the midst of these contrary influences, the king, not daring to look danger in the face, to judge of abuses and destroy them by his authority, yielded alternately to the court and public opinion, and satisfied neither the one nor the other.

If, indeed, during the whole of the eighteenth century, when the philosophic spirits of the nation assembled in a green walk of the Tuilleries, contenting themselves merely with expressing their hearty desires for the success of Frederic and the Americans, for Turgot and for Necker; if when their ambition was not to govern states, but simply to enlighten princes, and their foresight merely perceived a revolution at a distance, which the signs of discontent and the absurdity of the government institutions made sufficiently presumable,—if at this period the king had spontaneously introduced some moderation into his expenses, and given some guarantees, all would have been tranquilized for a long period, and Louis XVI. would have been adored as the equal of Marcus Aurelius. But when all the authorities found themselves degraded by a long struggle, and all the abuses of the state unveiled by an assembly of notables, and when the nation, made a party to the quarrel, had conceived the hope and the will of acquiring importance, she haughtily insisted upon her claim. The states-general had been promised to the nation; she demanded that the period of its convocation should be hastened; the period having been accelerated, the nation claimed the preponderance; it had been refused her; but by the doubling her representatives, the means of victory had been imparted. Thus the very concessions of the government were ungracious, and were rather forced from it than freely granted. The nation felt her strength, and determined upon attaining all that could be grasped. A continual opposition urged her ambition, and quickly rendered her insatiable. But even now, if a great minister, in giving strength to the king, conciliating the queen, and keeping in check the privileged orders, had anticipated, and satiated at once the popular ambition, by becoming himself the organ of the gift of a free constitution, and had satisfied the thirst for action which the nation experienced, by calling it, not to reform the state, but to discuss the annual interests of a state already formed, perhaps the fearful struggle which ensued might have been prevented. Such a minister would have anticipated rather than yielded to difficulties, and above all, would have made it his object rather to silence than listen to the numerous pretensions of all ranks. The times called for a man of an energetic mind, able and willing to act up to his conviction, and such a man, bold, powerful, and perhaps passionate, would have intimidated a court reluctant to assent to his measures. To please the public, without sacrificing ancient pretensions, and to satisfy the pressing wants of the treasury, the court took half-measures. It chose a minister half-philosopher and only half-bold, who enjoyed an immense popularity, because half popular intentions in an agent of power, went beyond all the hopes, and excited the enthusiasm of a people whom, shortly after, their demagogic leaders could hardly satisfy.

The approaching crisis threw the whole kingdom into an universal ferment. Assemblies were formed all over France, from the example of England, under the denomination of clubs. Abuses to be destroyed, reforms to be made, and a constitution to be formed, were the only subjects there discussed. This examination into the state of the country produced a general irritation. In fact the state of politics and economy were intolerable. All was privilege; in individuals, in classes, cities, provinces, and even in trades. The industry and genius of man was everywhere shackled. Civil, ecclesiastical, and military dignities were exclusively reserved for certain classes, and in those classes for certain individuals. No one could enter into a profession without certain titles and certain pecuniary conditions. Cities had their privileges for the assessment, receipt, and proportion of taxes, and for the choice of magistrates. Even crown gifts, converted by reversions into family property, hardly permitted the monarch to indulge in preferences. There only remained to him the liberty of conferring some pecuniary donations, and he has been seen obliged to dispute with the Duke de Coigny respecting the abolition of an useless office*. Every thing, then, was permanently established in certain hands, and on all sides the small number were opposed to the great majority who were despoiled. The expenses of the state weighed on one class alone. The nobility and clergy possessed nearly two-thirds of the land. The remainder, the property of the people, paid a multitude of feudal rights to the nobility, and tithes to the clergy, and was exposed to the devastations of noble hunting parties and of game preserves. All taxes on articles of consumption weighed upon the majority, and consequently on the people. The mode of collecting them was extremely vexatious; the gentry were, with impunity, in arrears; the people, on the contrary, exposed to every harsh severity, were condemned to imprisonment if their produce was insufficient, and though they nourished with their sweat, and defended by their blood, the higher classes of society, they themselves could hardly, with the greatest difficulty, obtain the bare means of existence. The lot of the citizens, an enlightened and industrious class, was certainly less unhappy than that of the people; but yet, while enriching the kingdom by their industry, and adorning it by their talents, they were precluded from all those advantages which they had a right to enjoy. Justice, administered in some provinces by the gentry, and in the royal jurisdictions by magistrates who purchased their offices, was slow, often partial, always ruinous, and above all, cruel in criminal prosecutions. Individual liberty was violated by lettres de cachet, and the liberty of the press by the royal censors. Finally, the state, ill-defended from without, betrayed by the mistresses of Louis XV., and compromised by the weakness of the ministers of Louis XVI., had been recently dishonoured in Europe by the shameful sacrifice of Holland and of Poland.

The masses of the population had begun already to agitate; riots took place many times during the alterations of the parliaments, particularly on the retirement of the Archbishop of Toulouse; his office was burnt by the populace, and the armed force which endeavoured to disperse the mob, were insulted and even attacked; agitators were insufficiently prosecuted, the ferment was universal, and the excited mind of the public was full of the idea of an approaching revolution. The parliament and the nobility already saw that the arms they had given to the people would be turned against themselves. In Brittany, the doubling of the tiers was opposed by the noblesse, who had refused to nominate deputies; and the citizens of that district, who had been such powerful opponents to the court, now turned against the noblesse, and terrible conflicts ensued. The court, not thinking itself yet thoroughly avenged on the noblesse of Brittany*, not only refused them its aid, but imprisoned some of their members who came to Paris to require assistance.

The elements themselves seemed to join in the general turbulence. A hail storm, on the 13th of July, had destroyed the harvests, and rendered the provisioning of Paris most difficult, in addition to the distraction that appeared to be brewing. All the activity of commerce was scarcely sufficient to collect the quantity of provisions necessary for that great capital; and an apprehension gained ground, that when confidence in the public wealth was shaken, and communications with the provinces interrupted by political tumults, the very means of subsistence would hardly be found. Since the severe winter which followed the disasters of Louis XIV., and which immortalized the charity of Fenelon, a more rigorous one than that of 1788 and 1789 had not been witnessed. A benevolence equal to that which then shone forth in the most affecting manner was not sufficient to alleviate the miseries of the people. Destitute vagabonds, without money or food, might be seen crowding together in the streets of Versailles and Paris, displaying their misery and nakedness in solicitation of the public charity, and appearing, on the slightest symptom of every tumult, to take part in the fray and seek to profit by chance, always favourable to those who have every thing to gain, even to bread for the passing day.

Thus every thing conspired to bring about a revolution. The events of an entire century had contributed to uncoil abuses; the last two years had excited a general spirit of revolt; and the interference of the populace in the quarrel of the privileged orders, had disciplined the popular mobs. A concurrence of political circumstances and natural calamities seemed also to hasten the impending catastrophe, whereof the period might have been delayed, although the fulfilment would, sooner or later, become inevitable.

It was in the midst of these circumstances that the elections took place. They were tumultuous in some provinces, contested throughout, but carried on with great unanimity and order at Paris. In the distribution of the lists there was a spirit of unity and mutual understanding; merchants, lawyers, and men of letters, astonished to find themselves for the first time associated together, by degrees became elevated to the same level by the spirit of liberty which united them. The first act of their authority was the re-nomination of the committees constituted by the king; but as this was merely done to manifest and confirm their powers, the persons who filled these several offices were still left in possession of their places. One of the most celebrated of the electors was Bailly: this modest and learned man quitted his retreat at Chailôt to take part at this interesting crisis in the public affairs: a stranger to intrigue, and possessed of a high sense of the importance of his noble mission, he presented himself singly and on foot before the assembly. He stopped on his route upon the terrace of the Feuillans; an unknown young man approached him with respect. "You will be nominated," said he to him. "I know nothing of it," replied Bailly; "this honour ought neither to be refused nor solicited." The modest academician resumed his walk, presented himself at the assembly, and was nominated successively elector and deputy.

The election of Count Mirabeau was tumultuous; rejected by the nobility, and welcomed by the tiers état, he threw Provence, his country, into agitation, and came shortly afterwards and presented himself at Versailles.

The court did not wish to influence the elections; they were not sorry to see in them a great number of curates, and reckoned on their opposition to the great dignitaries of the church, and at the same time their respect for the throne: in other respects they did not foresee all; and in the deputies of the tiers described rather the adversaries of the nobility than of themselves. The Duke of Orleans was accused of taking an active part to cause himself and his partisans to be nominated. Already signalized among the adversaries of the court, an ally of the parliaments, and appealed to by the popular party as their leader, whether he liked it or not, he was accused of many secret plots. A deplorable scene took place at the Faubourg St. Antoine, and as an originator is readily ascribed to all events, he was accused of it. Réveillon, a manufacturer of painted paper, who from the extent of his business maintained large workshops, improved our manufacture, and gave subsistence to three hundred workmen, was accused of intending to reduce his wages to one half. The populace threatened to burn his house. They were, however, dispersed, but returned the next day; the house was attacked, burned, and destroyed. (27th April, 1789.) In spite of the menaces thrown out the evening before by the assailants; in spite of the appointed rendezvous which had been openly made, the authorities did not interfere till very late, and then acted with excessive vigour. They waited till the people were masters of the house, and then attacked them with fury, and slaughtered a great number of a ferocious and intrepid class of men, who afterwards appeared upon every occasion of tumult, and were known by the name of brigands.

All parties mutually accused each other of the blame of this transaction. The court was reproached with its tardy interference at first, and its cruelty afterwards; and it was supposed that the people had been intentionally allowed to commence their attack, for the purpose of making an example, and testing the fidelity of the soldiery. The money found upon the persons of some of the rioters at Réveillon's house, together with the expressions which escaped from some of them, created a suspicion that they were instigated by some concealed influence; and the enemies of the popular party accused the Duke of Orleans of having wished to make a trial of these revolutionary forces.

This prince had received from his birth the most felicitous qualifications; he was the inheritor of immense riches, but, having devoted himself to evil pursuits, he had abused all these gifts of nature and fortune. Devoid of consistency in his character, alternately careless of the public opinion, and greedy of popularity, he was daring and ambitious one day, and submissive and fluctuating the next. Being embroiled with the queen, he became an enemy to the court. When parties began to form, he allowed them to make use of his name, and even, it is said, his money. Flattered with a confused prospect of the future, he did enough to make himself the subject of accusation, but not enough to succeed; and if his partisans really had projects, they should have despaired of success, from his inconstant ambition.

THE STATES GÉNÉRAL.

CHAPTER II.

THE CONVOCATION AND OPENING OF THE STATES-GENERAL—THE DISCUSSION AS TO THE VERIFICATION OF POWERS, AND AS TO THE VOTING INDIVIDUALLY OR COLLECTIVELY—THE ORDER OF THE TIERS ÉTAT DECLARES ITSELF A NATIONAL ASSEMBLY—THE HALL OF THE STATES IS CLOSED, THE DEPUTIES MEET IN ANOTHER PLACE—THE OATH AT THE TENNIS COURT, (JEU DE PAUME)—ROYAL SITTING (SÉANCE ROYALE) OF THE TWENTY-THIRD OF JUNE—THE ASSEMBLY CONTINUE THEIR DELIBERATIONS IN SPITE OF THE KING'S COMMANDS—DEFINITIVE ASSEMBLY OF THE THREE ORDERS—THE FIRST OPERATIONS OF THE ASSEMBLY—POPULAR TUMULTS AT PARIS—THE MOB RESCUE THE GUARDS CONFINED AT THE ABBAYE—SECRET PLOTS OF THE COURT; A CONGREGATION OF MILITARY TOWARDS PARIS—DISMISSAL OF NECKER—THE EVENTS OF THE TWELFTH, THIRTEENTH, AND FOURTEENTH OF JULY, 1789—THE STORMING OF THE BASTILLE—THE KING JOINS THE ASSEMBLY AT VERSAILLES AND AFTERWARDS AT PARIS—THE RECAL OF NECKER.

THE moment of the convocation finally arrived; in the common danger the highest ranks drew near the court, and crowded about the princes of the blood, and the queen. They endeavoured to gain by their flatteries the country-gentlemen, and laughed behind their backs at their rusticity; the clergy used every effort to gain over the plebeians of their order, and the military nobility those of their own. The parliaments, who had thought to occupy the highest place in the states-general, began to fear that their ambition would be thwarted. The deputies of the tiers état, strong in their superiority of talent, and the energetic expression of their papers, supported also by their continual communications with the provinces, and even stimulated by the doubts many entertained of their success, determined to assume a commanding appearance.

The king alone, who had not enjoyed a moment's rest since the commencement of his reign, regarded the meeting of the states-general as the termination of his embarrassments. For himself he was very little jealous of his authority; but he looked upon it as his duty to the queen and his children to keep his patrimony inviolate; and had it not been for this consideration would have been well content to resign part of it, and throw the cares of government from his own shoulders upon those of the nation. He therefore hastened with joy the preparations for the convocation. A spacious hall had been hurriedly prepared for the occasion; the costumes were fixed upon; and an humiliating regulation imposed upon the tiers état. Men are not less jealous of their dignity than of their rights; with a just pride therefore their papers forbade the deputies to submit to any degrading ceremonial. This new fault of the court originated, as did all the others, in a desire of maintaining at least the shadow of power when the substance was no more; and this might well excite a deep indignation, at the very moment when the nation was, as it were, measuring it with its eye, previous to commencing the attack.

On the 4th of May, the evening before the opening of the states-general, a solemn procession took place. The king, the three estates, and all the dignitaries of the state, proceeded together to the church of Notre Dame. The court displayed extraordinary magnificence: the two first estates were dressed with splendour: princes, dukes, and peers, were attired in purple, and wore hats and feathers: the deputies of the tiers, clothed in simple black cloaks, followed; and in spite of their exterior humble appearance, seemed strong in number, and elate with hope. It was observed that the Duke of Orléans, who followed in the rear of the nobility, lagged behind and mixed with the first of the deputies of the tiers.

This national, military, and religious procession; the pious chaunts and warlike music which accompanied its march, and above all, the greatness of the event it celebrated, deeply affected the hearts of all. The sermon of the bishop of Nancy, which was full of generous sentiments, was applauded with enthusiasm, in spite of the sanctity of the place, and the presence of the king. Great assemblies elevate the soul, divest it of selfishness, and fill it with sympathy. A general excitement pervaded all bosoms; the omitties of all hearts seemed to be suddenly appeased; and humanity and patriotism appeared, for the moment, to be the paramount sentiments¹.

The opening of the states took place the next day, May the 5th, 1789. At this solemnity, the king was seated on an elevated throne; the queen near him; the court in stalls; the two first orders of the state on the two sides; and the tiers état at the bottom of the hall, or lower benches†. A general movement took place on the appearance of Count Mirabeau, and indeed his look and manner made an impression on the assembly. The members of the tiers état, in spite of the established usage, covered their heads with the two other orders. The king made a speech in which he recommended disinterestedness to some, prudence to others, and spoke to all of his love for his people. The keeper of the seals, Barentin, then addressed the assembly; and was followed by Necker, who read a report upon the state of the kingdom; spoke at great length of the finances, which he charged with a deficiency of † Galleries, disposed in the form of an amphitheatre, were filled with a brilliant assembly of spectators; the deputies were introduced and arranged according to the order established in the last convocation, in 1614. fifty-six millions; and fatigued by his prolixity those whom he did not wound by his censures.

The next day, the deputies of each order had separate chambers assigned them. Besides the common hall, which was sufficiently spacious to contain the three orders together, two others had been constructed for the nobility and clergy. The common hall was appropriated to the tiers état; by which arrangement they possessed the advantage of being in their own place and that of the estates at the same time. The first thing to be done was the verification of powers. Whether this should be a general, or separate transaction effected by each order independent of the others, was the question now discussed. The deputies of the tiers, pretending it was of consequence that each chamber of the states-general should be assured of the legitimacy of the other two, demanded a common verification; while the nobility and clergy, wishing to maintain a distinction of ranks, insisted that each order should constitute itself separately. This question was not that of individual voting, for the powers might be verified in common, and the votes collected separately, but it greatly resembled it. It caused, as might have been foreseen and prevented by terminating the difference beforehand, a division on the very first day. But the court never had firmness enough either to deny or accord anything; and besides, perhaps, hoped to turn the quarrels of the states to its own advantage.

The deputies of the tiers état, having taken their places in the common chamber, remained inactive, waiting, they said, to be joined by their colleagues. On the contrary, the nobility and clergy, having retired each to their respective hall, discussed the question of the verification. The clergy voted for a separate verification by a majority of 133 against 114, and the nobility by a majority of 188 against 114. The tiers état were still unmoved, and continued the next day the conduct of the former evening. They avoided every measure that could give countenance to the idea of their being a separate order. For this reason, when they sent some of their members to the two other chambers, no express mission was given them: these members were sent to the nobility and clergy, to inform them, that the deputies of the third class were waiting for them in the common chamber. The nobility, not at that instant sitting, returned no answer; the clergy were assembled, and offered to nominate commissioners to reconcile the differences which had arisen between them. This they immediately did, and invited the nobility to do the same. In this altercation, indeed, the clergy showed a disposition very different from that of the nobility; and although they had suffered more than any other of the privileged classes from the attacks of the eighteenth century, their very political existence contested, and their revenue diminished by the increase of curates, still their profession suggested moderate measures, and accordingly they acted, as we shall presently see, in the character of peacefulness and moderation.

The nobility, on the contrary, refused all terms, and declined to name commissioners. Less prudent than the clergy, conceiving loftier notions of their rights, they disregarded moderation, and thought that everything must give way to their absolute superiority. These men, who did not excess passion in others, abandoned themselves to their own intemperance, and in public committed the most violent extravagances. Casals and D'Espréménil, who had both been lately ennobled, adopted the most outrageous notions which they had concocted at particular meetings. In vain did the minority, composed of men more wise or more prudently ambitious endeavour to enlighten the nobility; they would listen to no counsel, but talked of defending their rights with their blood and lives; and added, that their cause was one of right and justice. These extravagancies had no effect on the tiers état; they still continued immovably obstinate, and received every insult with the greatest calmness; they nursed their anger in silence, allowed no symptom of it to appear, and were careful that their whole conduct should be marked by discretion and firmness; and they thus gained the plaudits of the galleries, which, though first designed for the court, were soon filled by the people.

Many days had already elapsed; the clergy had in vain laid several snares to entrap the tiers état, in seeking to involve them in certain acts tending to compromise them as a constituted order. But the tiers état had constantly rejected these questions: none but the indispensable measures of its own interior government were transacted by the tiers état; the appointment of a senior, or president, and associates to collect the votes, were almost their sole act. All letters addressed to them were left unopened; and they declared themselves to form not merely an order, but an assembly of citizens, associated by legitimate authority, waiting to be joined by other citizens.

The nobility, after their first refusal to nominate conciliatory commissioners, at last consented to send them; but the instructions their commissioners received were rendered useless, inasmuch as they were ordered to declare that the nobility would not depart from their decision of the 6th of May, which insisted on a separate verification. The clergy, on the contrary, consistent with themselves, suspended the verification which they had commenced in their own chamber, and declared themselves not constituted during the conferences of the conciliatory commissioners. The conferences were at last opened: the clergy were silent, the deputies of the commons set forth their reasons with calmness; those of the nobility with violence. The latter became only exasperated by the dispute; and the tiers état, determined to yield nothing, secretly rejoiced at the ill-success of the conference. The nobility were daily assured by their commissioners, that the advantage in every conference was on their side; this proportionably exalted their pride; nevertheless a passing glimmer of prudence made the two first orders voluntarily renounce their pecuniary exemptions. The tiers état accepted of this concession, but persisted in preserving its inaction, and in its constant demand of a common verification. The conferences still continued open; a new method of adjustment was proposed: that of confirming the powers of the whole states by commissioners selected from the three ranks. The delegates of the nobility expressly refused to assent to this arrangement, and they retired without fixing a day for a new conference. Thus all accommodation was broken off. On the same day the nobility passed a resolution, by which they now declared that, for the present session, they should separately verify; but that it should be left to the states to determine upon some other mode in future. This resolution was communicated to the commons on the 27th of May. They had been assembled since the 5th; twenty-two days had elapsed, and they had done nothing. It now seemed time to determine upon something. Mirabeau, who was the chief mover of the popular party, observed that the consideration of the public good had been too long retarded; that something must be finally decided on. He proposed then, (after the communication of the decision of the nobility,) that the clergy should be called on for the last time to explain themselves, and declare whether they would or would not join the commons. This proposition was instantly adopted. The deputy, Target, at the head of a numerous deputation, entered the chamber of the clergy. "The gentlemen of the commons invite," said he, "in the name of the God of peace, and the national interest, the deputies of the clergy to join them in the hall of Assembly, to consult on the best means of re-establishing that concord which is so necessary at the present minute, to the safety of public affairs." This solemn invitation produced a great effect; it was answered by great numbers with acclamations, and many would have accepted of it immediately, but they were prevented, and answer was returned to the commons, that the clergy would take their message into consideration. On the return of the deputation, the tiers état, as not to be swayed from its purpose, resolved to await the reply of the clergy at the present sitting; this answer not arriving, a message was sent stating that they were waiting for a reply. The clergy complained of being hurried, and demanded a longer time. They were answered that the commons would await their reply all day and all night.

Their situation was a delicate one; knowing that after their answer a decisive part would immediately be taken, they wished to temporize and consult with the court; they demanded therefore a delay till the next day, which was most unwillingly granted. On the following day, the king, who, in this emergency, was appealed to by the two first orders, determined to interfere. The sudden and rapid elevation of the popular power caused all recent enmities to be forgotten, and united the court, nobility, and clergy, in their opposition to the deputies of the tiers état. The king finally appearing at the states, invited the three orders to resume their conferences in presence of his keeper of the seals. The tiers état, whatever may be said of their projects, which have been judged of by the event, did not extend their wishes beyond a qualified monarchy. Knowing the benevolent intentions of Louis XVI., they entertained the highest respect for his person; and besides, not wishing to injure their cause by any blameable act, they answered, that in deference to the king, they would consent to the resumption of the conferences, although, from the declarations of the nobility, they had reason to believe they would prove useless. This answer was accompanied by an address which the senior was commissioned to give to the king. This senior was Bailly, a simple and virtuous man, an illustrious, learned, and modest scholar, who had been suddenly transported from the silent studies of his closet into the midst of civil discord, and was chosen to preside over the assembly of popular deputies. He was intimidated at first at his new task, and thought himself unworthy of fulfilling it, and indeed only undertook the office as a matter of public duty; but the spirit of liberty which animated him soon gave him new thoughts: he found in himself an unexpected firmness and presence of mind; and in the midst of such conflicts he made the majesty of the assembly respected, and as its representative, conducted himself with all the dignity of virtue and intelligence.

Bailly had the greatest trouble to obtain an interview with the king. As he insisted upon being introduced, the courtiers spread the report that he had not even respected the grief of the king, afflicted by the death of the Dauphin. But he at last obtained admittance; and passing over every humiliating ceremony, presented himself before his sovereign with firmness and respect. The king received him with kindness, but without explaining his intentions.

The government, having made up its mind to make some sacrifices for the sake of the treasury, was not sorry to see a conflict between the different orders of the states, and thought to turn it to its own advantage by becoming their arbiter: first, by depriving the nobility of their pecuniary privileges by means of the tiers état; and, secondly, by checking the ambition of the latter with the aid of the nobility. As to the nobility, not caring for the embarrassment of the treasury, and considering nothing but the great sacrifices it was likely to cost them, they wished to bring about a dissolution of the states-general, and thus render their convocation inoperative. The commons, whom the court and first ranks would not recognise under that title, but called always by the name of the tiers état, acquired daily fresh strength, and felt determined to brave all dangers rather than allow an opportunity so favourable to their interests, as that which now offered, to escape them.

The conferences demanded by the king took place. The commissioners of the nobility raised every kind of difficulty as to the title of commons which the third class had assumed, and objected to the form of the signature of their procès verbal. At last they entered into discussion, and were nearly reduced to silence by the arguments of the popular deputies, when Neckers, in the name of the king, proposed a new method of reconciliation. According to his plan, each order was to examine separately their powers, and communicate their examinations to the others; in case difficulties arose, the commissioners were to make report of them to each chamber, and if the decision of the different orders was not uniform, the king was to be judge of the last resort. Thus the court turned the differences of the states to its own profit. The conferences were immediately suspended to consider this new proposal. The clergy accepted the project purely and simply. The nobility received it at first with favour, but, hurried on by their ordinary instigators, they disregarded the advice of their wisest members, and modified this conciliatory design. All their misfortunes may be dated from that day.

The commons, informed of this resolution, quietly waited till their turn came to discuss what had been communicated to them; but the clergy, with their ordinary cunning, wishing to lower that order in the eyes of the nation, sent them a deputation to employ themselves jointly with them in the consideration of the daily increasing scarcity, that some remedy might be quickly devised by their united endeavours. The commons, exposed to popular disgrace if they appeared indifferent to such a proposition, played stratagem against stratagem, and answered that, impressed with a sense of the same duties, they were ready to attend the clergy in the great hall, to enter with them on that important subject. At the same time the messengers of the nobility arrived, and communicated solemnly their resolution to the commons. They adopted, they said, the plan of reconciliation, but persisted in a separate verification, and in not submitting to the united states, and the supreme judgment of the king, save only in such difficulties as might arise concerning the entire deputations of a single province.

This resolution put an end to the embarrassment of the commons. Had the new plan been adopted, it being only acceptable to them after having undergone material alterations, they would have been obliged to yield, or declare themselves alone at war with the highest ranks of the state and the throne. The moment was decisive. To yield upon the point of a separate verification was not, it is true, to yield to a voting by classes, but to be weak on one occasion was always to be weak. They must either submit to a part which would almost render them cyphers, give resources to power, and content themselves with destroying some abuses, at a time when they saw the possibility of destroying all; or enter at once into a firm determination of seizing by violence a portion of the legislative authority. This was the first revolutionary act, but the assembly did not hesitate; consequently all the "proces verbaux" being signed, and the conferences finished, Mirabeau rose up. "Every proposition to conciliate," said he, "being rejected by one party, cannot be examined by the other; a month has elapsed; a decisive part must be taken; a deputy of Paris has an important motion to make; let him be attended to." Mirabeau having opened the deliberation by his boldness, introduced Sieyès to the tribune, a man of profound, systematic, and unbending genius. Sieyès took a brief retrospect of the conduct and motives of the commons. "They have waited," said he, "and are ready for all conciliatory propositions; their long submission has become useless; they can delay public business no longer without failing in their duty as deputies; consequently a last invitation should be given to the two other orders to join them and commence the verification." This proposition, enforced by the acutest reasoning*, was received with enthusiasm. The commons wished even to summon the two orders to join them in an hour, (10 June, 1789). In the meantime the term was prorogued. The next day, Thursday, being devoted to religious ceremonies, it was deferred till Friday. On Friday the last invitation was given. The two orders answered that they must deliberate; and the king said that he would make known his intentions. The calling over of the bailiwicks commenced. On the first day, three clergymen joined the commons, and were received with acclamation; on the second six came; and on the third and fourth, ten, among whom was the Abbé Grégoire.

During the calling over of the bailiwicks and the verification of the powers, a weighty dispute arose, concerning the title the assembly should take. Mirabeau proposed that of Representatives of the French People; Mounier, that of The Majority deliberating in the absence of the Minority; the deputy Legrand, that of The National Assembly. The last was adopted after a long discussion, which was prolonged to the hour of midnight, on the 16th of June. At one o'clock in the morning the commons were deliberating whether they should constitute themselves a national assembly during the present sitting, or put it off till the next day. One party of the deputies were unwilling to lose a minute in acquiring a legal character, in order to obtain importance in the eyes of the court. A small number, wishing to put a stop to the operations of the assembly, became violent, and exclaimed loudly against its proceedings. The two parties, ranged on opposite sides of a long table, uttered mutual reproaches. Bailly, placed in the centre, was called upon by one side to break up the assembly, and by the other to put the proposition to the vote. Unaffected in the midst of cries and outrageous language, he remained more than an hour inflexibly silent. The sky was stormy, and the wind blew in gusty blasts through the chamber, and added to the turbulence of the scene. At last the violent members having retired, Bailly addressed the assembly, now rendered quiet by the retreat of those who had disturbed it, and persuaded them to put off till the next day the important act which had been proposed. His advice was adopted, and he retired highly applauded for the firmness and wisdom he had displayed.

On the next day, the 17th of June, the proposition was put to the vote, and by a majority of 401 against 90, the commons constituted themselves a National Assembly. Sieyès, again called upon to give reasons for this decision, did it with his accustomed acuteness.

"The assembly, deliberating after the verification of its powers, declares that it is composed of representatives, chosen by ninety-six hundred parts at least of the nation. Such a mass of deputations cannot remain inactive on account of the absence of the deputies of some bailiwicks, or of some classes of the citizens; for the absentees, who have been summoned, cannot debar those present from exercising the plenitude of their rights, especially when the exercise of these rights is an imperious and pressing duty.

"Furthermore, since it belongs only to those representatives who have been verified, to concur in the desires of the nation, and inasmuch as all the verified representatives ought to be in this assembly, it must of necessity be concluded, that to it, it belongs, and to none but it, to interpret and represent the general will of the nation.

"There cannot exist between the throne and this assembly any 'Veto,' or negating power.

"The assembly declares, then, that the general business of national redress can and ought to be begun without delay by the deputies present, and that they ought to pursue it without any interruption as without impediment.

* See note 2, in the Appendix.

"The denomination of National Assembly is the only one which suits the assembly in the actual state of things : whether it be because the members who compose it, are the only representatives legitimately and publicly known and verified ; or as being deputed by nearly the entire of the nation ; and lastly, because representation being one and indivisible, no deputy, in whatever order or class he may be chosen, has a right to exercise his powers separately from this assembly.

"The assembly will never quit the hope of uniting in its own person all the deputies at present absent. It will never cease to call upon them to fulfil the obligation which is imposed upon them, of joining the session of the states-general. At whatever period in the session which is about to open, the absent members may present themselves, the assembly declares beforehand, that it will with alacrity receive them, and after the verification of powers, cordially co-operate with them in the cause of those grand operations which ought to ensure regeneration to France."

Immediately after this declaration, the assembly, wishing at the same time to display an act of their power, and to prove that they did not intend to stop the course of their administration, legalized the receipt of taxes, although established without the national consent; and providing for their own dismemberment, added, that this act should become null on the day on which that event took place ; foreseeing also a bankruptcy, the only remaining method of terminating the embarrassment of the treasury, and dispensing with the national interference, they satisfied both prudence and honour, by putting the creditors of the state under the safeguard of French loyalty. Finally, they announced their intentions of occupying themselves unceasingly with the causes of the scarcity and public poverty.

These measures, which manifested as much courage as ability, created a deep impression. The court and highest ranks were terrified at such boldness and energy. Meanwhile the clergy deliberated in a tumultuous manner, whether they should join the commons. The mob awaited out of doors the result of their deliberations. The lower ranks of that order finally carried the point in the favour of the junction, by a majority of 149 against 115. Those who had voted for this measure were received with enthusiasm, the others were insulted and mobbed by the people.

This event should have brought about a reconciliation between the court and the aristocracy. They were both in equal jeopardy. The last resolution militated against the king as against the first ranks themselves, with whom the commons had virtually declared they could dispense. The aristocracy threw themselves at the feet of the monarch. The Duke de Luxembourg, the Cardinal de Larochehoucauld, and the Archbishop of Paris, implored him to repress the audacity of the tiers état, and to defend their injured rights. The parliament offered to dispense with the states, and promised to consent to all taxes. The king was hemmed in by the princes and the queen, and as these were not sufficient to prevail upon his weakness, he was hurried off to Marly, that he might more easily be persuaded into the adoption of some rigorous measure.

The minister, Necker, who was attached to the popular cause, contented himself with useless representations, which the king thought just, when his mind was free ; but the effect of which the court speedily destroyed. From the moment Necker saw that the royal interference was necessary, he formed a project which appeared to him a very bold step. He proposed that the monarch, in a royal sitting, should order the assembly of the orders, but solely for the consideration of measures of general interest ; that he himself should give his sanction to all the resolutions taken by the states-general ; that he should prospectively disallow every institution repugnant to a limited monarchy, such as that of a single assembly ; and that he should promise the abolition of privileges, and the equal admission of all Frenchmen to civil and military employments, &c. Necker, who had not sagacity enough to anticipate the proper time for such a plan, had still less the ability of ensuring its execution.

The council had followed the king to Marly ; Necker's plan, approved of at first, became the subject of discussion ; suddenly a note was put into the hands of the king ; the council was suspended, resumed, and adjourned till the next day, in spite of the urgent necessity for great celerity. The next day new members were added to the council, among whom were the brothers of the king. The project of Necker was modified ; he resisted, and made some concessions, but finding himself overcome, he returned to Versailles. A page came thither three times to give him notes relative to new modifications ; his plan was altogether spoilt, and the royal sitting was fixed to the 22nd of June.

It was now only the 20th, and already the chamber of the states was shut, under pretence of some preparations which were necessary for the presence of the king. These preparations could have been made in half a day, but the clergy, having determined the evening before to join the commons, the court wished to prevent this junction. An order from the king suspended the sittings till the 22nd. Bailly, considering himself bound to obey the assembly, which on Friday the 19th had adjourned till the next day, Saturday, went to the door of the chamber. A body of the French guards were posted there, with orders to prevent any one entering. The officer on duty received Bailly with respect, and permitted him to enter the court, to make his protest. Some young and indignant deputies wished to break through the orders of the sentry. Bailly ran up, appeased them, and took them away with them, that he might not injure the generous officer who executed his superior's orders with so much moderation. The assembly collected together in a tumult, and persisted in assembling. Some proposed holding their sitting under the very windows of the king, and others assembling in the Tennis court, (le salle de jeu de paume) where they proceeded immediately, and the master gave it up to them joyfully.

The court was large, but the walls were gloomy and bare ; there were no seats ; a chair was offered to the president, who refused it, and remained standing with the assembly ; a bench served for a table ; two deputies were placed at the door to guard it, but were soon relieved by the provost-marshal of the king's household, who came to offer his services. The people ran together in crowds, and the deliberation commenced. Indignation was expressed from all parts against the suspension of the sittings, and many methods were proposed to prevent it for the future. The angry feelings of the assembly became heightened by discussion, and measures of the last extremity began to offer themselves to the imagination. It was proposed to go to Paris. This proposition, which was received with enthusiasm, was discussed in the most animated manner; it was nearly agreed that they should proceed thither in a body and on foot; but Bailly, alarmed at the violence which the assembly might encounter on their route, and fearing besides a schism, opposed this project. Then Mounier proposed, that the deputies should bind themselves by an oath not to separate before a constitution was established. This proposal was received with transport. The form of the oath was immediately made out: Bailly demanded the honour of binding himself first, and read the form thus expressed: "You take a solemn oath never to separate, and to assemble wheresoever circumstances may force you, until the constitution of the kingdom is established and settled on solid foundations." This oath, pronounced in a loud and clear voice, was heard even out of doors; at the same moment every mouth pronounced it, and every arm was extended towards Bailly, who standing upright and motionless, received this solemn engagement of the assembly to assure by means of the law the full maintenance of national right. The mob immediately uttered the cries of "Vive l'Assemblée, Vive le Roi," as if to prove that they as an act of duty to themselves were determined to recover their rights without anger or hatred. The deputies then proceeded to sign the declaration which they had just made. One man alone, Martin D'Auch, adds to his name the word "opposer." A disturbance gathered around him. Bailly, for the purpose of being heard, mounts on a table, and addressing himself with moderation to the deputy, represents to him, that he has the right of refusing his signature, but not that of making a protest. The deputy persists, and the assembly, out of respect for his political freedom, allow the word, and permit it to remain on the "proces verbal."

This new act of energy excited the greatest alarm in the nobility, who, the next day, carried their grievances to the foot of the king, to apologize in some manner for the restriction they had put upon his plan of reconciliation, and to beg his assistance. The minority of the nobles protested against this proceeding, maintaining, with reason, that it was no longer time to demand the royal intervention, after having so unwisely refused it. This minority, too little attended to, was composed of forty-seven members, among whom were the Duke de Liancourt, the generous friend of his king, and liberty; the Duke de Larochehoucauld, distinguished for his virtue and great talents; Lally-Tolendal, already celebrated by the misfortunes of his father and by his brilliant advocacy; Clermont-Tonnerre, distinguished by his eloquence; the brothers Lameth, young colonels celebrated for their wit and bravery; Dupont, already alluded to for his vast capacity, and resolute character; and, finally, the Marquis de Lafayette, the defender of American liberty, who united to French vivacity the firmness and simplicity of a Washington.

Intrigue relaxed every operation of the court. The sitting, fixed first for Monday the 22nd, was put off till the 23rd. A note, written very late to Bailly at the breaking up of the grand council, announced this adjournment, and thus demonstrated the agitation which prevailed in the minds of the court-party. Necker was resolved not to be present at this sitting, that he might not seem to authorize, by his presence, projects of which he disapproved.

Petty devices, the ordinary resource of a weakened authority, were employed to prevent the sitting of Monday the 22nd. The princes bespoke the tennis-court for their own diversion on that day. The assembly, therefore, met at the church of St. Louis, where they received the majority of the clergy, at whose head was the Archbishop of Vienne. This meeting, brought about with the greatest dignity, excited the most lively joy. Even the clergy, it was said, had submitted to the common verification.

The next day, the 23rd, was that appointed for the royal sitting. It was arranged that the deputies of the commons should enter the chamber by a by-way door, and different from that which was appointed for the nobility and clergy. In lieu of violence, humiliations were not spared. Exposed to a heavy rain, they remained in waiting for a considerable time. The president rapped at the door frequently, but was answered from within, that it was yet too early. The deputies were now about to retire, Bailly knocked once more; the doors at last were opened, and, on entering, they found the two first orders in possession of their seats, which they had desired to secure by this previous occupation. This assembly was not like that of the 6th of May. The hopes of all parties were then high, and the solemnity majestic and affecting. A numerous band of soldiers in gloomy silence distinguished the present solemnity from the former. The deputies of the commons had resolved to maintain the utmost taciturnity. The king first addressed the assembly; but his expressions, too energetic for his character, only betrayed his own weakness. Reproaches and commands had been put into his mouth. He ordered the separation of each order; annulled the preceding acts of the tiers état, and promised to sanction the abdication of pecuniary exemptions when they were resigned by their possessors. He required the maintenance of all feudal rights, both practical and honorary, as inviolable property; and concluded by saying, that, although he did not enjoin the united assembly as to measures which concerned the public interests, he left it as a matter not unlikely to be affected by the moderation of the higher orders. Thus he endeavoured to force the obedience of the commons, and contented himself with presuming upon that of the aristocracy. He left the nobility and clergy judges of what particularly concerned themselves, and finished by saying, that if he met with any further obstacles, he should take the good of his people solely into his own hands, and regard himself as their only representative. This tone and language deeply irritated the minds of the commons, not against the king, who represented feebly those passions which were not his own, but against the aristocracy, of whom he was the organ.

As soon as he had finished his speech he ordered the assembly to break up instantly. The nobility and part of the clergy followed him: the other ecclesiastical deputies remained: the commons kept their seats, and preserved a profound silence. Mirabeau, who always took the lead, first rose. "Gentlemen," said he, "I confess that what we have just heard might redound to the benefit of the country, were it not that the presents of despotism are always dangerous . . . What! an array of arms, and the violation of the national temple, to command you to be happy! . . . Where are the enemies of the nation? Is Catiline at our gates? . . . I call upon you, gentlemen, to assert your dignity, and legislative power, and to call to mind the religious obligation of your oath, which will not suffer you to separate, till you have established a constitution."

The Marquis de Brézé, grand-master of the ceremonies, then entered, and addressed Bailly: "You have heard," said he, "the orders of the king;" and Bailly replied, "I am going to receive those of the assembly." Mirabeau then advanced: "Yes, sir," cried he, "we have heard the intentions which have been suggested to the king; but you have neither voice, place, nor right, to speak here. Nevertheless, to avoid delay, go and tell your master, that we are here by the power of the people, and will not be torn from hence but by the power of the bayonet." Monsieur de Brézé retired, and Siyès pronounced these words: "We are to-day as we were yesterday; let us deliberate." The assembly now gathered together, to deliberate on the maintenance of its former acts. "The first of these acts," said Barnave, "has declared what you are; the second relates to taxes, to which you alone have a right to consent; the third is the oath to do your duty. None of these measures require the royal sanction, the king cannot prevent that to which he has not to consent." At this moment the workmen came to take away the seats; armed soldiers traversed the hall, and others surrounded it from without. The body-guard advanced even to the door. The assembly, without the least interruption, remained on their seats, but lowered their voices. The maintenance of all their preceding acts was carried with unanimity; but this was not all. In the heart of the royal city, in the midst of the servants of the court, without the aid of that people afterwards so formidable, the assembly might have been attacked. Mirabeau, therefore, ascended the tribune, and proposed to decree the inviolability of each member. This was immediately carried into effect; and the assembly, opposing to force nothing but the majesty of its own will, declared every one of its members inviolable, and proclaimed as traitor, infamous, and guilty of a capital offence, whosoever should offer violence to a member.

Meantime, the nobility, who believed the state to be saved by this "lit de justice," presented their congratulations to the prince, who had first suggested it, and from him carried them to the queen. The queen, holding her son up in her arms, in exhibiting him to her devoted servants, received their promises and oaths, and unhappily abandoned herself to a blind confidence. But this joy was of short duration. Presently the shouts of the populace, congratulating Necker at not having assisted at the royal sitting, were heard. Terror now succeeded to exultation. Necker was immediately sent for by the king and queen, and those august personages condescended to supplicate the minister not to resign his office. He consented, and transferred to the court part of that popularity which he had gained by absenting himself from this fatal sitting.

In this manner was the first act of the revolution brought about. The tiers état had recovered the legislative power, and their adversaries had lost it, by endeavouring to keep it all to themselves. In a few days this legislative revolution was entirely accomplished. Some petty devices were still employed against it; such as embarrassing the interior communications in the chambers of the states; but they were without success. On the 24th the majority of the clergy joined the assembly, and demanded a verification in common, that they might forthwith deliberate on the propositions made by the king at the sitting of the 23rd of June. The minority of the clergy continued to deliberate in their own chamber. Juigné, Archbishop of Paris, a virtuous prelate, and the benefactor of the people, but an obstinate privilégie, was insulted by the populace, and forced to promise to join the assembly; and in fact he did join them, accompanied by the Archbishop of Bordeaux, a popular prelate, who ought at least to have been a minister.

The greatest agitation was manifest in the nobility. Their ordinary instigators inflamed their passions. D'Espréménil proposed to publish a decree against the tiers état, and to prosecute them by the procurator-general; the minority proposed their joining with them. The motion was lost in the midst of uproar. The Duke of Orleans supported this motion, after having the evening before promised the contrary to the Polignacs*. Forty-seven members, having resolved to join the general assembly in spite of the decision of the majority, proceeded there in a body, and were received with acclamation. Nevertheless, in spite of this joy caused by their presence, their countenances remained serious. "We yield to the dictates of our conscience," said Clermont-Tonnerre, "but it is with grief that we separate from our brethren. We come to assist in the redress of the public grievances, and each of us will let you know the extent of the power which his commission allows."

Every day produced new accessions, and the assembly saw the number of its members increase. Addresses poured in from all quarters, expressing the aspirations and approbation of cities and provinces. Mounier procured those of the Dauphiné; Paris presented its own; and even the Palais-Royal sent a deputation, which the assembly received, that they might not alienate the multitude. At that period the assembly did not foresee the excesses that followed; on the contrary, it had need of relying on the energy of the multitude, and to trust to its support; this was a subject of doubt to many. The enterprise of the people was at that time little else than a pleasing illusion. For this reason, the applauses of the galleries, frequently troublesome to the assembly, were permitted. Bailly once, indeed, endeavoured to put a stop to them, but his voice and motion were stifled by boisterous clapping of hands.

The majority of the nobility continued their sittings in the midst of tumult and uproar. Their leaders became alarmed; and the first signs of a disposition to join the assembly originated with those very persons who had, till now, persuaded them to resistance. But these passions, already too much excited, were not easily directed. The king was obliged to write a letter, and the court and grondees were reduced to supplications. "The union with the assembly will be but for a short time," said they, to the most obstinate; "the military are gathering: yield to save the king. Consent was thus, with difficulty, obtained; and the majority of the nobility, accompanied by the minority of the clergy, joined the assembly on the 27th of June. The Duke de Luxembourg, speaking in the name of all, said that they came to give the king a mark of their respect, and the nation a proof of their patriotism. "The family is complete," answered Bailly; and supposing that the re-union was perfect, and that they came there, not to verify, but to deliberate in common, he added—"We can now occupy ourselves, without intermission, and without distraction, upon the regeneration of the kingdom, and the common-wealth."

More than one little art had still to be employed, to make it appear that what had been done was not exacted by necessity. New comers arrived in companies always after the opening of the sittings, so as to appear banded together as an order. They affected to remain standing behind the president, and as it were not to appear to join the assembly by sitting down. Bailly, with much discretion and firmness, overcame all their objections, and contrived to make them take their seats. They wished also to dispute his presidency, not by open force, but sometimes by a secret negotiation, and sometimes by a mere quibble. Bailly kept his place; and in retaining it was actuated not by motives of ambition, but by a sense of duty. Thus a simple citizen, remarkable only for his virtues and talents, presided over the grondees of the church and state.

It was now too evident that a legislative revolution had been already accomplished. Although the first differences between the states had no other object than the mode of verification, and did not relate to the manner of voting; although the one party had declared that they only united for a common verification, and the others in obedience to the royal will, expressed on the 23rd of June, it was clear that individual voting was inevitable, and all protestation against it was useless and impolitic. Nevertheless the Cardinal Delarochefoucauld protested against it in the name of the minority, and declared, that he had only joined the assembly to deliberate on general subjects, reserving to himself always the right of forming a separate order. The Archbishop of Vienne replied with warmth, that the minority could not decide on any thing in absence of the majority of the clergy, and that the majority had not the right of speaking in the name of that order. Mirabeau forcibly opposed this design, and said it would be strange that one party should protest in the assembly against the assembly, and that it should either acknowledge the sovereignty of the assembly, or at once retire from it.

The question concerning imperative mandates* was now discussed. Most of the papers expressed the will of the electors upon the reforms to be effected, and made this will obligatory on the deputies. It was necessary to ascertain to what point the assembly could go, before they commenced acting. This question then was the first. It was taken up and resumed several times. Some wished the papers to be returned to the constituents, and others thought that they could not be received from them; that the business of representatives was to vote for their constituents, after the subjects under consideration had been discussed and examined by the deputies of the whole nation; but not to receive beforehand ready prepared instructions. Whether it be true, that a law can only be made by a general council, either because greater intelligence is to be found at the highest point of elevation, or that fuller instruction can be obtained by a mutual understanding of all parties of the nation than by a few individuals, it follows that deputies should be free, and without any obligatory mandate. Mirabeau adding irony to argument, said that those who believed mandates to be imperative, were to blame in coming to the assembly; they had nothing to do, but leave their papers in their places, and that their papers would sit quite as well as they would. Sieyès, with his usual sagacity, foreseeing that in spite of the just decision of the assembly, a great number of the members would cleave to the obligation of their oaths, and pleading conscience, would become inflexibly resolute, moved for the order of the day, under the assumption that every one is best judge of the importance of the oath he has taken. "Those who believe themselves bound by their instructions," said he, "will be regarded as absent, just the same as those were who refused to verify their powers in general assembly." This wise opinion was adopted. Had the assembly used constraint upon the dissentients, it would have furnished them with a variety of pretences; whereas by thus leaving them free, she was sure to bring all over to her own side; for, from henceforth, victory was in her hands.

The object of the new convocation now, was the reform of the state, that is to say, the establishment of a constitution, of which France was destitute, in spite of all that could be said to the contrary. If relations between the governed and the government could be thus called, without doubt France had possessed a constitution: for a king had commanded and the subjects obeyed; ministers had imprisoned arbitrarily; revenue officers had wrung from the people their very last farthing; and the parliaments had condemned unfortunate victims to the wheel†. The most barbarous nations possess these kinds of constitutions. France had possessed her States-generals, but without any defined political attributes, without any stated period for re-assembling, and always without any effective result. There had existed, it is true, a royal authority alternately absolute and powerless. There had been tribunals or sovereign courts, which often united to judicial authority the legislative power; but there never had been any law which ensured the responsibility of the agents of power, assured the liberty of the press, individual liberty, and finally, all those safeguards which in a social state are substituted for the fiction of natural freedom*.

This want of a constitution was generally avowed and felt; all the papers energetically expressed it, and formally explained themselves as to the fundamental principles of this constitution. They had unanimously prescribed a monarchical form of government, hereditary from male to male; the exclusive attribute of executive power to the king; the responsibility of all agents; the mutual concurrence of the nation and the king in making laws; the institution of taxes by vote; and the liberty of individuals. But on the questions as to the creation of one or two legislative chambers; the permanency, periodical meeting, and dissolution of the legislative body; the political existence of the clergy and the parliaments; and as to the extent of the liberty of the press, the sentiments of the electors seemed very much divided. So great a variety of important questions settled or proposed by the papers, proved clearly enough to what extent the public attention had been aroused, and how generally the longing aspiration for liberty was expressed throughout the kingdom†. But to rear the edifice of an entire new constitution from amidst the crumbling remains of an ancient form of legislation, was a great and difficult undertaking, particularly when the disorganized state of the times, and the violent resistance of all the privileged orders is considered. Besides the dissensions which a contrariety of interests would produce, a natural conflict of opinions was to be feared. The idea of an entire new code of legislation to be given to a great nation, so strongly excited the minds of all, and inspired them with projects so vast, and hopes so chimerical, that it was natural to expect either vague or exaggerated, and sometimes hostile measures. To prevent this, therefore, as much as possible, a committee was nominated to consider, as near as was practicable, the extent of the work to be performed, and to arrange the method of its distribution. This committee was composed of the most moderate members of the assembly. Mounier, a person of great ability, although self-willed, was its most laborious and influential member. It was he who drew up the order in which they were to proceed.

The difficulty of forming a constitution was not the only one the assembly had to overcome. Placed between a government who looked upon them with an unfavourable eye, and a famishing people who required prompt relief, it was difficult not to interfere with the administration. Mistrusting the constituted authorities, and urged to relieve the people, they were forced, even without ambition, to invade little by little the executive power. The clergy had already given the example, by their insidious proposal to the third class, to enter into immediate consideration of provisioning the public. The assembly was scarcely formed before it named a committee of sustenance, required all necessary information upon this matter from the ministry, proposed circulating supplies of provision from province to province, particularly to those places where they were most wanted, and made large gifts of alms, and provided for these expenses by loans. The government acquainted the assembly with the measures which had already been taken, and which had been anxiously furthered by Louis XVI. Lally Tolendal proposed passing acts relative to a free circulation, but this was objected to by Mounier, who observed that such acts required the royal sanction, and that this sanction not yet being regulated, exposed the assembly to weighty difficulties. Thus all obstacles were united against the legislators. It was necessary to watch over the administration without invading authority; to make laws without the legislative forms being fixed; and to stand up against so many difficulties, in spite of the malevolence of power, the opposition of various interests, diversities of opinions, and the exigencies of a people newly awakened and violently agitated by political controversies, in the heart of an immense metropolis, no more than a few leagues distant from the hall of assembly itself.

A very small space separates Paris from Versailles, and it may be visited several times in one day. All the agitations of the capital, therefore, were felt immediately at Versailles, in the court and in the assembly. Paris, at that time, presented an extraordinary spectacle. The electors of sixty districts, who had met for the purpose of election, continued to assemble daily together, either to give instructions to their deputies, or from the necessity of thus meeting to debate together, a desire inherent in the heart of man, and which bursts forth with greater violence the more it is repressed. They had, in the first instance, met with the same fate as their deputies; the place of their meeting was shut against them, but they met in another, and at last gained admittance into the Hotel de Ville, where they continued to assemble, and to correspond with their deputies. There were, at that time, no public newspapers giving an account of what took place at the sitting of the National Assembly; it was therefore the custom for people to meet together in knots, to inform themselves of, and discuss, passing events. The garden of the Palais Royal was the place of the most numerous assemblages. This magnificent garden, surrounded by the richest shops in Europe, and forming an adjunct of the palace of the Duke of Orleans, was the "rendezvous" of strangers, débauchés, and idlers, and especially of the most violent. The most intemperate agitators' discussions were there held in the coffee-houses, or in the garden itself. An orator might be seen mounted on a table, collecting a crowd around him, and exciting them to recklessness by the most violent speeches, words always uttered with impunity, for there the multitude reigned supreme. Men supposed to be devoted to the Duke of Orleans were observed, on these occasions, to be the most fiery orators. The riches of this prince, his known prodigalities, his enormous loans, his near neighbourhood, and his vague and aimless ambition, all caused him to be accused. The historian, without fixing on any name, can at least assert that gold was profusely scattered; for, if the sound reasoning part of the nation had ardently wished for liberty, and if the restless and suffering part had been inclined to insurrection to better their lot, still it is manifest that instigators were often busy in directing their blows. To conclude, money is not to be reckoned among the causes of the revolution, for it is not with a little gold and secret designs that a nation of twenty-five millions of men is shaken to its centre.

An opportunity for an outbreak shortly presented itself. The French guards, who were chosen troops; and destined to compose the life-guards of the king, were stationed at Paris. Four companies were alternately detached to do duty at Versailles. Besides the barbarous severity of the new discipline, these troops had to complain of their new colonel. In the pillage of the house of Réveillon, it is true, they had shewn some exasperation against the people; but they afterwards repented of it, and living always among them, yielded to their influences. Added to this, both soldiers and subalterns felt that every opening to preferment was shut against them: it wounded their feelings to see their young officers, exempt from almost every service, never appear among them except on parade-days, and then never accompany them to their barracks. There was here, as well as elsewhere, a tiers-état, who did every thing without bettering their condition. Insubordination displayed itself among them, and some soldiers were imprisoned in the Abbaye.

A crowd immediately assembled at the Palais Royal, calling out "L'Abbaye!" The multitude instantly broke open the doors of that prison, and led out in triumph the soldiers, whom it was attempted to seize again. (June 30, 1789.) While the populace guarded them at the Palais Royal, a letter was sent from thence to the assembly, praying that liberty might be granted them. Thus placed between the people on one side, and the government on the other, who became the subject of hatred in simply asserting itself, the assembly could have no desire to interfere, and thus commit an impropriety by meddling with the public police. Adopting therefore a resolution, at once ingenious and discreet, the assembly wrote first to the Parisians, recommending to them the maintenance of the public tranquillity; and then sent a deputation to the king, imploring his clemency, and pointing it out as the only means of re-establishing concord and peace. The king, influenced by the moderate course taken by the assembly, promised the exertion of his clemency when order should be re-established. The French guards were, therefore, immediately replaced in prison, and a pardon from the king instantly released them.

Thus far all went on well; but the nobility, in joining with the two orders, had made a concession with repugnance, and under the promise of its being but of short duration—the nobility, therefore, protested every day against the proceedings of the national assembly. Their numbers became gradually less and less: on the 3rd of July, one hundred and thirty-eight members were counted present; on the 10th, there were no more than ninety-three; and on the 11th, eighty. Nevertheless, the most obstinate among them still persisted in their opposition; and on the 11th had determined on a protest, which the events which followed prevented them from putting into execution. The court, on their part, had not yielded without regret, or without design. Recovered from their terror after the sitting of June the 23rd, they had promoted the general union of the assembly, for the purposes of impeding the proceedings of the commons by means of the nobility, and in the hope of dissolving it shortly by sheer force. Necker had only been retained in their service, to cover by his presence the secret manœuvres they had devised. From a certain embarrassment and reserve which was used towards him, he suspected that some grand machination was carrying on. The king himself was not informed of all; for the court party intended, no doubt, to go to greater lengths than he wished. Necker, who thought that the business of a statesman should be confined to reasoning with his sovereign, and had just sufficient energy to make his reports, on this occasion did so to no purpose. Associated with Mounier, Lally, and Clermont-Tonnerre, he, as well as they, meditated the establishment of the English constitution. The court, meanwhile, continued its secret preparations; and the deputies of the nobility, although desirous to withdraw, were persuaded to remain, by the announcement of a forthcoming event.

Military musters were taking place; the old marshal de Broglie was appointed to the chief command, and the baron de Besenval was placed at the head of those who surrounded Paris. Fifteen regiments, nearly all composed of foreigners, were quartered in the environs of the capital. The boasts of the courtiers revealed the meditated danger, and these conspirators, too prompt to threaten thus, compromised the success of their projects. The popular deputies, informed not of all the details of a plan, which to this day is not perfectly known, and which the king himself knew only partially, but which induced the apprehension that violence was meditated, became greatly indignant, and immediately provided means of resistance. It is not, and probably never will be, known what were the secret springs which prompted the insurrection of the 14th of July; but it little signifies. The aristocracy conspired, and the popular party might justly conspire also. The means employed being equal, the justice of the cause remains to be considered, and justice certainly was not on their side who wished to break up the union of the three orders, dissolve the national representation, and persecute its most courageous deputies.

Mirabeau thought that the surest means of intimidating power, was to force its agents publicly to explain the measures which they were taking; for this purpose it became necessary openly to denounce them, and if they hesitated to answer, or eluded the inquiry, they stood condemned; the nation was warned, and put on its guard.

Mirabeau suspended the proceedings of the assembly in the formation of a constitution, and proposed demanding of the king the dismissal of the troops. He mingled in the discourse which he delivered on this occasion, respect for the monarch, with the severest reproaches against government. He remarked that every day new troops advanced; he observed that all the streets were blocked up; that the bridges and walks were converted into military posts; that events were public, and yet concealed; that precipitate orders and counter-orders were continually given and countermanded, and that every thing announced war. Adding to this comment on facts bitter reproaches: "We see," said he, "more soldiers menacing the nation than an invading enemy perhaps would meet, and a thousand times, at least, more than could on a late occasion be assembled to succour our friends, martyrs of their fidelity, or to preserve the alliance of Holland, so precious, so dearly gained, and so shamefully lost."

His discourse was received with applause, and the address which he proposed immediately carried; but, as in calling for the dismissal of the troops he had demanded the establishment of a body of citizen guards in their stead to preserve the public peace, this article was suppressed; and the address then unanimously carried, with the exception of four votes. In this celebrated address, which is said to have been perfectly extempore, Mirabeau foresaw nearly all that was about to happen: the irritation of the multitude, and the defection of the troops, occasioned by their intimacy with the people. With a peculiar adroitness and boldness, he dared to assure the king that his promises should not be in vain. "You have called us," said he, "to regenerate the kingdom; your wishes shall be accomplished in spite of the snares, the difficulties, the perils," [that beset us] &c.

This address was presented by a deputation of twenty-four members. The king, not wishing to explain himself, answered, "That the assemblage of troops had no other object than the maintenance of public tranquillity, and that protection which was due to the assembly; and further, that if the assembly still retained their fears, he should transfer their sittings to Soissons or Noyon, and that he himself would go to Compiègne."

The assembly could not rest content with such an answer, especially the intention of removing to a distance from the capital, and thus placing them between two camps. The Count de Crillon proposed trusting to the word of a king and a gentleman. "The word of a king and a gentleman," replied Mirabeau, "is a bad guarantee for the conduct of his ministry; our blind confidence in our kings has ruined us; we have demanded the withdrawal of the troops, and not permission to fly before them; we must still insist upon it, and that without delay."

This opinion was not supported. Mirabeau insisted too much on open measures to tolerate the employment of secret machinations, if indeed they were ever used.

On the 11th of July, Necker, having several times told the king that if his services displeased him he would humbly retire, "I take you at your word," answered the king. On the evening of the same day, he received a note from Louis XVI. claiming the fulfilment of his declaration, pressed him to depart, and added that he trusted in him sufficiently to hope, that he would conceal his departure from every one. Necker, justifying the honourable confidence of the monarch, departed immediately, without intimating his intention to his company, or even to his daughter; and in a few hours was far from Versailles. The next day, the 12th of July, was Sunday. The report spread in Paris that Necker had been dismissed, as also the Messieurs de Montmorin, de La Luzerne, de Puysegur, and de Saint Priest. It was announced also, that the Messieurs De Breteuil, De la Vauguyon, De Broglie, Foulon, and Dancœur, nearly all of them notorious for their opposition to the popular cause, were to replace them. The alarm was spread in Paris. The populace assembled at the Palais Royal. A young man, Camille Desmoulins, since known by his republican elevation, but endowed nevertheless with a susceptible and enthusiastic mind, mounted on a table, displayed his pistols, and crying "To arms," plucked the leaf of a tree, and stuck it in his hat as a cockade. The whole multitude imitated his example. The trees were soon stripped, and the populace went away to a depository of waxen busts. They carried away those of Necker and the Duke of Orleans, menaced, as they said, with exile; and then spread through all the quarters of Paris. In traversing the Rue Saint Honoré, they were met by a detachment of the royal German regiment; a conflict ensued, several persons were wounded, and, among others, a soldier of the French guards. These guards were as favourably disposed towards the people as they were hostile to the royal German regiment, with whom they had had a quarrel a few days before; they were in barracks near the Place Louis Quinze; these guards fired upon the royal German regiment. The Prince of Lambese, who had the command of this regiment, defiles his corps into the garden of the Tuileries, and charges the crowd of persons who were there quietly promounging, kills an old man, and clears the garden; in the meanwhile the military stationed around Paris mustered in the Champ de Mars and the Place Louis Quinze. The public alarm now knew no bounds, and was converted into fury. The populace spread throughout the city, crying "To arms." They ran to the Hotel-de-Ville to demand them. Those electors composing the general assembly were there assembled, and the arms, when they could no longer be refused, were delivered up. The electors constituted, at this time, the only established authority. Deprived of all active power, they assumed that which circumstances exacted, and ordered the convocation of the districts. A meeting of citizens was, in consequence, held, to deliberate concerning the best means of preserving themselves, both from the fury of the multitude, and the attacks of the royal troops. During the night, the people, who always run after that which particularly concerns them, forced open and burnt the barriers, dispersed the commissioners, and made all the entrances of Paris free. The shops of all the armourers were plundered; the Brigands, who had already signalized themselves in the affair of Réveillon, and who were observed on every occasion of tumult to spring, as it were, out of the earth, re-appeared, armed with clubs and pikes, and spread terror on every side. These events took place during all Sunday the 12th of July, and the whole of Sunday night till Monday the 13th. Early on the morning of Monday, the electors, always assembled at the Hotel de Ville, considered it necessary to give a more legal form to their authority; they therefore summoned the provost of the merchants, the ordinary governor of the city; but he refusing to yield obedience, unless upon a formal requisition, they were obliged to compel his attendance upon those terms, and then associated with him a certain number of electors, thus forming a municipality invested with all necessary authority. This municipality called to its assistance the lieutenant of police, and, in a few hours, a plan was formed of arming a citizen militia.

This militia was to be composed of forty-eight thousand men, furnished by the different districts. Their distinguishing mark was, instead of the green cockade, the Parisian cockade, red and blue, and every one taken in arms with this cockade, without having been enrolled by his district in the citizen guard, was liable to be arrested, disarmed, and punished. Such was the first origin of the national guards. This plan was adopted by all the districts, who hastened to put it into execution. In the course of this same morning, the populace broke into the building of Saint-Lazare, for the purpose of obtaining corn; forced open the magazine to carry off the arms, and brought to light many pieces of ancient armour, which they fitted on, and sallied out with their helmets and pikes, to spread over the city. The people however appeared to discountenance pillage, and with their proverbial fickleness, suddenly respected property, took nothing but arms, and even themselves apprehended the plunderers. The French guards and the guards of the prisons offered their services, and were enrolled in the citizen guard.

Arms were always demanded with vociferation. The provost Flesselles, who had at first resisted his fellow-citizens, now displayed his zeal, by promising twelve thousand muskets that very day, and more on the days following. He pretended to have made a bargain with an armourer, whose name was not mentioned. The thing appeared improbable, considering the little time which had elapsed. However, the evening having arrived, the chests of musketry announced by Flesselles, were carried to the Hotel de Ville, but on being opened were found to contain nothing but old rags. At the sight of this the multitude became irritated against the provost, who declared he had been deceived. To appease them, he directed them to the Carthusian friars, assuring them that they would find arms there; the astonished Carthusians received this furious crowd with dismay, introduced them into their retreat, and succeeded in convincing them that they possessed nothing of the description which the provost had announced.

The people, more irritated than ever, returned crying out, "Treason." To satisfy them, fifty thousand pikes were ordered to be made. Boats of powder, which were going down the Seine to Versailles, were seized; and an elector distributed their contents among the people, in the midst of the greatest disturbance.

The most horrible confusion reigned at the Hotel de Ville, the seat of the authorities, the headquarters of the militia, and the centre of all operations. Here it was necessary to provide for the exterior safety of the city, threatened by the court, and its interior safety, menaced by rioters; it became every moment more than ever necessary to calm the suspicions of the people, who believed themselves betrayed, and to save from their fury those who excited their mistrust. Carriages were in one place observed to be stopped, messengers intercepted, and travellers in waiting for permission to continue their journey. During the night the Hotel de Ville was again menaced by the rioters. An elector, the courageous Moreau de Saint Méry, who was posted to keep guard there, had some barrels of powder brought thither, and threatened to blow them all up if any violence was attempted. At the sight of this the robbers departed. Meanwhile the citizens retired to their own houses, and held themselves ready for every species of attack. All the streets were unpaved, trenches opened, and every means taken for resisting a siege.

During these troubles of the capital, a general consternation pervaded the assembly. The deputies met on the morning of the 13th, dismayed at the threatening appearance of affairs, but as yet ignorant of that which had passed at Paris. The deputy Mounier rose first, and complained of the dismissal of the minister; Lally-Tolendal next addressed the assembly, and made a magnificent eulogium on Necker; and both united in proposing an address to the king, wherein they prayed for the recall of the disgraced ministers. One of the deputies of the nobility, Mons. de Virieu, even proposed confirming the resolutions of the 17th of June, by a new oath. Mons. de Clermont-Tonnerre opposed this proposition as useless; and calling to mind the engagements already entered into by the assembly, cried out, "The constitution shall be, or we will perish." The discussion had already been much prolonged, when the assembly were informed of the tumults which had taken place at Paris on the morning of the 13th, and the calamities with which the capital was threatened, between the undisciplined French, who, according to the expression of the Duke de Larochevaucault, were under the direction of no one, and the disciplined foreigners who were weapons in the hands of despotism. A resolution was passed for sending a deputation to the king, to depicture the disasters of the capital, and to pray him to send away the troops, and establish a citizen guard. The king returned a cold and phlegmatic answer, which ill accorded with the sentiments of his heart, and said over and over again that Paris could not guard itself. The assembly then, by a noble assumption of courage, entered into a memorable resolution, in which it insisted upon the dismissal of the troops, and the establishment of a citizen guard; declared ministers and all agents of power responsible, and charged the responsibility of the calamities which threatened the country on the counsellors of the king, of whatever rank they might be. It also consolidated the public debt, proclaimed the name of bankruptcy infamous, insisted upon the validity of its former acts, and ordered the president to express their sympathy with Mons. Necker, and the other ministers.

After these well-timed and energetic measures, the assembly, in order to preserve their members from all personal violence, declared themselves permanent, and nominated Mons. de Lafayette vice-president, to relieve the respectable Archbishop of Vienne, whose advanced age did not permit him to sit up day and night. The night of the 13th and 14th passed away in this manner in the midst of tumults and alarms. Every instant calamitous reports were circulated and contradicted. No one knew all the projects of the court; but this was known, that many deputies were menaced, and that physical force was about to be directed against Paris, and the most conspicuous members of the assembly. The sitting, suspended for a few hours, was resumed at five o'clock in the morning of the 14th of July. The assembly with an impressive tranquillity resumed their proceedings relative to the formation of a constitution, and discussed with great propriety the means of accelerating this great measure, and ordering it with wisdom. A committee was nominated to examine the propositions. It was composed of Messrs. the Archbishop of Autun, the Archbishop of Bordeaux, Lally, Clermont-Tonnerre, Mounier, Sieyès, Chabot, and Bergasse. Thus the morning elapsed: towards evening, fresh intelligence arrived, (it was always of an unfavourable character,) that the king was to quit [Versailles] during the night, and leave the assembly at the mercy of several foreign regiments. At the very moment when this intelligence arrived, the princes, the duchess of Polignac, and the queen, were seen walking in the orangery, condescendingly conversing with the officers, and distributing refreshments among the soldiers. It appeared plainly that some great design had been conceived, which was to be executed during the night of the 14th and 15th, that Paris was to be attacked on seven points, the Palais Royal surrounded, the assembly dissolved, and the declaration of the 23rd of June referred to parliament, and that finally, the necessities of the treasury were to be provided for by a bankruptcy, and state debentures (billets d'état). This one thing is certain, that the commandants of the troops had received orders to march from the 14th to the 15th, that debentures had been made out, that the Swiss barracks were full of ammunition, and that the governor of the Bastille had removed all his furniture, with the exception only of such articles as were indispensable for his own accommodation. In the after part of the day, the alarm of the assembly increased. The Prince de Lambesc was seen to pass by fully equipped; the noise of cannon was heard; [and terror so fully possessed all, that] the deputies listened attentively to the slightest noise, and put their ears to the ground to catch it more distinctly. Mirabeau then proposed suspending all discussion, and sending a new deputation to the king. The deputation set out immediately to make fresh solicitations. At this moment, two members arrived from Paris in the greatest haste, and assured the assembly that the work of slaughter had begun; one of them declared that he had seen a headless body in black clothes. The night began to draw on: the arrival of two electors was announced; the most profound silence reigned in the chamber: the very sound of these electors' steps was heard in the darkness; and the assembly learnt from their mouths, that the Bastille was attacked, that the firing of cannon had commenced, that blood was already spilt, and that the people were threatened with the most frightful calamities. A new deputation, before the return of the preceding, was instantly dispatched. At the very moment of its departure the first returned, and brought back the answer of the king. "He had ordered," he said, "the dismissal of the troops encamped on the Champ de Mars, and having been informed of the formation of the citizen guards, had nominated the officers who were to take their command." At the arrival of the second deputation, the king, with increased agitation, said to them, "Gentlemen, you rend my heart more and more by the recital you give me of the calamities of Paris. It is not possible that the orders given to the troops should be the cause of them." The assembly had not yet obtained the removal of the army. It was two o'clock in the morning. An answer was sent to the city of Paris, saying, "that two deputations had been sent to the king, and that their solicitations should be renewed on the morrow, until they obtained that success which they had to expect from the heart of the king, when left freely to its own emotions." The sitting was for a short time suspended; and in the evening information was brought of the events of the 14th.

The people, from the night of the 13th, had been collecting towards the Bastille; some musquet shots had been fired, and it appeared that the instigators of the multitude had several times prompted the cry "A la Bastille." The desire for its destruction had been expressed in some papers, so that the ideas of the people had already taken this direction. The cry for arms was heard on every side. The report spread that the Hotel des Invalides contained a considerable store of them: the multitude ran there immediately. The commandant, Monsieur de Sombreuil, forbade their entrance, saying that he must first receive orders from Versailles; but the people, who would hear of no denial, rushed into the hotel, and carried off some pieces of cannon and a great quantity of muskets. Already, nay at this very time, an immense mob had commenced the siege of the Bastille. The besiegers said that the cannon of the place pointed on the city, and intimidated it, and consequently they should be prevented from firing on it. The deputy of a district required to be admitted within the fortress, which the commandant did not refuse; he thus ascertained that it was garrisoned only by thirty-two Swiss and eighty-two invalids: this garrison promised him faithfully not to fire, provided they themselves were not attacked. During this conference, the people, not seeing their deputy appear, became impatient, and he was obliged to show himself to appease the multitude: he left the fortress shortly before eleven o'clock. Half an hour had scarcely elapsed, when a new armed gang arrived, shouting "We want the Bastille." The garrison warned the assailants to retire, but they disregarded the warning. Two men most courageously climbed upon the roof of the guard-house, and broke the chains of the bridge, by blows of an axe, which immediately fell down; the crowd rushed in and ran to the other bridge to pass over it in like manner. A discharge of musketry stopped them: they drew back, but fired in return. The conflict lasted some minutes. The electors, assembled at the Hotel de Ville, heard the report of the musketry, and becoming more and more alarmed, sent two deputations, one immediately after the other, to order the commandant to allow of a detachment of Parisian soldiery to be introduced into the place, by reason that all military force in Paris ought to be under the direction of the city. These two deputations arrived successively. But in the midst of this popular siege it was very difficult to make themselves understood. The sound of a drum and the sight of a flag suspended the firing for a short time. The deputies advanced; the garrison held a parley with them; but mutual explanation was difficult. Musket shots were fired, it was not known from whence, and the people, persuaded that they were betrayed, rushed forward to set fire to the place. The garrison then began to discharge their heavy artillery. The French guards arrived with some pieces of cannon, and a regular attack commenced.

During these transactions, a note, addressed by the Baron de Besenval to Delaunay, commandant of the Bastille, was intercepted, and read at the Hotel de Ville. In this letter Besenval urged Delaunay to hold out, assuring him that he would be speedily relieved; nevertheless Delaunay, receiving no assistance, and seeing the exasperation of the people, seized a lighted match and would have blown up the place, had not the garrison prevented him and compelled him to surrender. Signals were made, and a bridge lowered; the besiegers drew near, promising to do no injury, but the crowd rushed on, and stormed the courts. The Swiss contrived to save themselves. The invulnibles were assailed, and only snatched from the fury of the people by the humanity of the French guards. At this moment a young, beautiful, and terrified girl came forward: supposing her to be daughter of Delaunay, the crowd seized her, and were on the point of burning her, when a brave soldier rushed in, and snatching her away from the infuriated populace, hastily carried her to a place of safety, and returned to the engagement.

It was now half past five o'clock. The electors were suffering the most intense anxiety, while they heard a prolonged and buzzing murmur—a crowd rushed in, shouting "Victory!" the hall is instantly filled, a French guard, covered with wounds and crowned with laurels, is carried in triumphantly by the people; the regulations and keys of the Bastille are on the point of a bayonet; a bloody hand, raised above the crowd, shows a curl in buckle, taken from the neck of the governor, who had just been beheaded. Two French guards, Elie and Helling, had defended him to the last extremity. Other victims had fallen, although defended with heroism against the ferocity of the multitude. A species of violence began to be exhibited against Flesselles, the provost of the merchants, whom they accused of treason. They pretended that he had merely amused the people in promising them arms, which he never had any intention to give them. The hall was filled with an immense multitude, highly excited by a long combat, and urged by a hundred thousand men, who remaining without, awaited their chance of gaining admittance. The electors made an effort to justify Flesselles. He soon began to lose his assurance, and already pale with fear, cried out, "Since I am suspected, I will retire." "No," replied the people, "come to the Palais Royal to be tried." He immediately prepared to proceed there. The multitude pressed upon him and shook him; and as soon as he had arrived at the Quai Pellatier, he fell by a pistol-shot from some unknown hand. It was reported that they had found a letter upon Delaunay, in which Flesselles said to him, "Hold out while I amuse the Parisians with cockades."

Such had been the unfortunate events of this day. A feeling of alarm quickly succeeded the intoxication of victory, and the conquerors of the Bastille, astonished at their own audacity, and expecting to be exposed to punishment by the formidable authority of the law, dared not acknowledge their exploit. Reports were spread every moment, that troops were advancing to sack Paris. Moreau de Saint-Méry (the same who, the evening before, had threatened the brigands to blow up the Hotel de Ville,) remained undaunted, and gave more than three thousand orders in a few hours. The moment that the taking of the Bastille was known at the Hotel de Ville, the electors informed the assembly of it, who received the intelligence at about midnight. Their sitting was at that time suspended, but the news spread with rapidity. The court, having no opinion of the energy of the people, made light of the efforts of an ignorant multitude, who endeavoured to take a place, in former times fruitlessly besieged by the great Condé. The court, I say, were tranquil, and bandied forth their witticisms. Nevertheless the king began to be uneasy, his last replies had in fact disclosed his anxiety. The king had retired to rest. The Duke de Liancourt, so distinguished for his liberal feelings, who was the particular friend of Louis XVI., could, in his quality of grand master of the wardrobe, obtain access to him at all times. Informed of the events which had happened at Paris, he hastened immediately to his sovereign, awoke him in spite of the remonstrances of his attendants, and informed him of all that had taken place. "What, a revolt!" cried the prince. "Sire," replied the duke, "rather call it a revolution." The king, enlightened by his statements, consented to meet the assembly in the morning; in the propriety of this the court also assented, and this act of confidence was determined on. Meanwhile the assembly had resumed its sitting, and not knowing the new sentiments of the king, were about to send a last deputation, and to make one more effort to make a due impression on him, and obtain at his hands all that remained for him to grant. This deputation was the fifth since the commencement of these tragical events: it was composed of twenty-four members, and was now leaving the assembly, when Mirabeau, with greater vehemence than ever, thus addressed them. "Tell the king," cried he, "tell him, that the foreign hordes by whom we are surrounded, received yesterday a visit from the princes, princesses, and their favourites; that they received from them caresses, exhortations, and presents: tell him that during the whole night these foreign satellites, gorged with gold and wine, predicted, in their impious songs, the slavery of France, and in their brutal expressions called for the destruction of the national assembly: tell him, that in his very palace, the courtiers danced to the sound of that barbarous music, and that such were the scenes which preceded the massacre of Saint Bartholomew!"

"Tell him that that Henry, whose memory the whole universe revere, and whom, of all his ancestors, he wishes to take for a model, sent food into Paris, when it was in a state of revolt, and when he was besieging it in person; but that his cruel councillors will not allow that corn which commerce has provided to enter into Paris, when faithful and furnishing."

The deputation were on the point of setting out for the palace, when they were informed that the king himself, of his own inclination, had arrived, without guard or escort. The chamber rung with shouts and clapping of hands. "Wait," said Mirabeau with gravity, "till the king makes known to us his good intentions. A mournful respect should be the first reception given to a monarch at this season of calamity. The silence of the people is a lesson for kings."

Louis XVI. entered, accompanied by his two brothers. His simple and affecting discourse excited the most lively enthusiasm. He re-assured the assembly of his good will, which, for the first time, he called "the national assembly;" and meekly complained of the mistrust they had conceived. "You distrust me," said he; "well! it is I who trust in you." These words excited the most ardent applause. The deputies immediately rose up, surrounded the monarch, and conducted him on foot to the palace. The crowd pressed around him; tears ran from all eyes, and he could scarcely open a passage through this numerous retinue. The queen, seated with the court in a balcony, contemplated at a distance this impressive scene. Her son was in her arms, and her daughter, standing by the side of her, played innocently with the ringlets of her brother's head. The princess, powerfully affected, seemed delighted by this expression of love from the people. Alas, how many times during the fatal discords of the revolution, has a reciprocal burst of feeling reconciled all hearts! How often for a moment have all enmities seemed forgotten; but on the morrow, nay, on the very day itself, has the court returned to its pride, the people to their mistrust, and implacable hatred resumed its career!

Peace was now made with the assembly, but it had still to be made with Paris. The assembly immediately sent a deputation to the Hôtel de Ville, to carry the happy news of the reconciliation wrought between the king and the nation. Bailly, Lafayette, and Lally-Tolendal, were among the number of the delegates. Their presence spread the most lively joy. The speech of Lally caused such ardent transports, that he was carried in triumph to a window of the Hôtel de Ville, to be shown to the people. A crown of flowers was placed upon his head, and he received the homage of the people opposite the very place where his father had expired with a gag in his mouth. The death of the unfortunate Flesselles, chief of the municipality, and the refusal of the Duke d'Aumont to receive the command of the citizen militia, left a provost and a commander-in-chief to be nominated. Bailly was pointed out; and, in the midst of the most animated acclamations, appointed successor to Flesselles, under the title of mayor of Paris. The crown which had been on the head of Lally was transferred to that of the new mayor; he wished to tear it away, but the archbishop of Paris held it there in spite of him; the virtuous old man shed some tears, and resigned himself to his new functions. A worthy representative of a great assembly in the presence of the majesty of the throne, he was less capable of resisting the storms of a commonwealth, where the multitude struggled tumultuously against their magistrates. Nevertheless, acting upon a principle of self-denial, he unhesitatingly devoted himself to the anxious cares of providing subsistence for a people who repaid him with reproaches and ingratitude. It still remained to nominate a commandant to the military. There was in the chamber a bust, sent by emancipated America to the city of Paris. Moreau de Saint-Méry pointed to it, and immediately all eyes were directed thither: it was that of the Marquis de Lafayette. A general acclamation proclaimed him commandant: a "Te Deum" was immediately voted, and all present hastened in crowds to Notre Dame to celebrate it. The new magistrates, the archbishop of Paris, and the electors, mixed with French guards, and the soldiers of the militia marching arm in arm, proceeded to the ancient cathedral in a species of intoxication. On their route, some foundlings fell at the feet of Bailly, who had already exerted himself much for the hospitals; they called him their father; Bailly took them up in his arms, and called them his children. The assembly quickly arrived at the church; the ceremony was celebrated with pomp; and every one strolled about the city, where a delirious joy had succeeded to the terror of the preceding evening. It was then that the people visited that so long dreaded den, to which an entrance had been at length obtained. The people flocked to the Bastille with a greedy curiosity, not unmingled with terror. They then beheld its deep cells and instruments of torture, especially an enormous fragment of rock placed in the middle of a dark and damp dungeon, to the centre of which was affixed a heavy chain.

The court, as blind in its fears as it had been in its self-assurance; at this time so greatly feared the people, that they imagined every moment that a Parisian army was marching upon Versailles. The Count D'Artois and the Polignac family, so dear to the queen, immediately quitted France, and were the first emigrants. Bailly, however, inspired the king with confidence, and engaged him to make a visit to Paris, which he determined upon in spite of the resistance of the queen and the court.

The king prepared to set out. Two hundred deputies were ordered to accompany him. The queen bade him adieu with profound grief. The body guard escorted him to Sèvres, where they stopped to await his return. Bailly, at the head of the municipality, received him at the gates of Paris, and presented to him the keys given formerly to Henry IV. "That good king," said Bailly to him, "conquered his people; but at present, it is the people who have re-conquered their king." The nation, legislative at Versailles, was militant at Paris. Louis XVI. on entering the city, saw himself surrounded by a silent and embodied multitude. He arrived at the Hôtel de Ville, (17th July, 1789,) passing under an arch of swords crossed over his head, in token of respect. His address was simple and affecting, and the people being no longer able to repress their feelings, burst forth and lavished on him their accustomed applause. These acclamations somewhat relieved the mind of the prince; however, he was unable to conceal a feeling of satisfaction on perceiving the body-guard stationed on the heights of Sèvres; on his return, the queen, throwing herself on his neck, embraced him as if she had feared she should never have seen him more.

Louis XVI., to satisfy entirely the public wishes, ordered the return of Necker, and the dismissal of his new ministers. M. de Liancourt, the friend and able counsellor of the king, was elected president by the assembly. The deputies of the nobility, who although part of the deliberative assembly, had refused to take a part therein, were at last persuaded to take an active part in its deliberations, and give them their votes. Thus all distinction of rank was virtually abolished. The revolution might now be looked upon as accomplished. The Nation, mistress of the legislative power by means of the assembly, and sole controller of public authority, could now realize all that was necessary for her interests. It was in refusing an equalization of taxes that the states-general were rendered necessary; it was by refusing a just distribution of authority among these states, that the court had lost all influence; and it was, finally, by endeavouring to recover this influence, that Paris was excited to insurrection, and the whole nation incited to have recourse to public force.

ALL now was agitation in the metropolis, where a new authority had just been established. The same considerations which had instigated the electors to take an active part, urged all other classes to do the same. The assembly was taken for a model by the Hotel de Ville, the Hotel de Ville was followed by the districts, and the districts by all the corporations. Tailors, cordwainers, bakers, and servants, held hurnal deliberations at the Louvre, at the Place Louis Quinze, and in the Champs Elysées, in spite of the reiterated orders of the municipality to the contrary. In the midst of these conflicting parties, the Hotel de Ville, opposed by the districts, and annoyed by the Palais Royal, became altogether embarrassed, and was hardly able to sustain the duties of its immense administration. It united in itself the civil, judicial, and military authority. It was there that the militia had their general quarters assigned them. The judges, at first, dubious as to their powers, handed over the accused to them; the Hotel de Ville, indeed, might be said to possess legislative power, being commissioned to constitute itself. Bailly had, for this last purpose, required two commissioners from each district, who, under the name of representatives of the commune, were to regulate its constitution. That they might effectually fulfil such various duties, the electors divided themselves into several committees; one, named the committee of inquiry, took charge of the police; and another, the committee of subsistence, looked to the supply of provisions, the most difficult and hazardous appointment of them all. It was in this last, that Bailly was compelled to be engaged night and day. This committee was obliged to make continual purchases of wheat, then to have it ground, and afterwards carried across famishing provinces to Paris. The convoys were frequently stopped, and numerous detachments were necessary to prevent its being pillaged on its journey, and in the markets. Although the state sold corn at a loss, that the bakers might lower the price of bread, the people were not satisfied; it was still necessary to diminish this price, and the scarcity at Paris was augmented by this diminution, because the provinces came there to buy their provisions. The fear of want on the morrow made every one provide himself abundantly, so that a large stock being accumulated by some, left others destitute. Public confidence promotes the success of commerce, causes abundance in provisions, and renders their distribution equal and easy; but when it ceases, commercial activity disappears; the objects of our wants no longer anticipate us; and the fear of destitution adds confusion to famine, and prevents the just distribution of the little which remains. The duty of providing subsistence for the capital was, therefore, the most toil-some of all. Bailly and the committee were subjected to the most excruciating anxieties. The labour of the day scarcely sufficed for the necessities of the day, and on the morrow the same anxieties had to be undergone.

Lafayette, commandant of the citizen militia*, had an equal share of labour. He had incorporated in this body the French guards devoted to the revolution, some Swiss, and a great number of soldiers, who deserted from their regiments, in hopes of gaining larger pay. The king himself had concurred in this arrangement. These mixed troops composed what was called the companies of the centre. The militia took the name of the national guard, were dressed in uniform, and added to the two colours (red and blue) of the Parisian cockade, that of white, which was the colour of the king. This is that tri-coloured cockade, whose destiny Lafayette predicted, prophesying that it would go round the world.

It was at the head of this troop, that Lafayette, for the two succeeding years, endeavoured to maintain public tranquillity, and carry into execution those laws which the assembly daily passed. Lafayette was descended from an ancient family, which had remained pure in the midst of the corruption of the great; endowed with an intelligent mind, and intrepid courage; enamoured of true glory, he was heartily disgusted with the frivolities of the court, and the pedantic discipline of our army. His country presenting to him no elevated object of ambition, he determined to embark in the most liberal enterprise of the age, and set out for America, the day after the report was spread in Europe that she had been humbled. He there fought by the side of Washington, and decided the question of the emancipation of the new world by the alliance of France. Having returned to his own country as a distinguished character in Europe, entered at the court as a remarkable person, he conducted himself there with all the freedom and simplicity of an American. When philosophy, which had hitherto been to the indolent nobility nothing but a literary pastime, demanded attention at their hands, Lafayette, nearly alone, retained his own opinions, called for the states-general, contributed powerfully to the union of orders, and then, as his due, was appointed commander-in-chief of the national guard. Lafayette possessed not that enthusiasm of passion and genius which always hurry their possessors into the abuse of power: with an evenness of temper, a fine and comprehensive understanding, and an invariable principle of disinterestedness, he was the most fit actor for the part circumstances had assigned him, that of enforcing obedience to the laws. Adored by his troops without having captivated them by victory, remarkably calm and full of resources in the midst of the raging multitude, he maintained order with the most persevering vigilance. Those who had found him incorruptible accused him of want of ability, because they were unable to attack his character. In the meantime he did not deceive himself either in his estimation of events or men: did not over-estimate the court and the leaders of parties, protected them at the peril of his life, although he did not esteem them: and often hopelessly struggled against factions with the constancy of a man who will never abandon the cause of the public, even though he can no longer rest in hope.

Lafayette, in spite of all his vigilance, could not always succeed in checking popular commotions; for however active the military force might be, it could not be present everywhere, against a people every where in insurrection, and who saw an enemy in every one. The most ridiculous reports were continually propagated and believed. Sometimes it was said that the soldiers of the French guards had been poisoned; sometimes that the corn had been purposely wasted, or its arrival prevented; and those who devoted themselves to the arduous service of bringing it to the capital were exposed to the caprice of an ignorant rabble, who overwhelmed them with abuse or applause, according to the whim of the moment. Nevertheless, it is certain, that the animosity of the populace, who generally speaking neither knows how to select or to delay in seeking her victims, often appeared under some guidance, whether by means of wretched hirelings, who were to be rendered more desperate by being imbued in blood, or whether it were to be effected by persons of deeper malice than ordinary. Foulon and Berthier were pursued and arrested far from Paris, with an evidently pre-determined plan. There was nothing spontaneous so far as they were concerned, but the fury of the multitude who murdered them. Foulon was an old intendant of taxes, a man of a cruel and avaricious disposition; he had certainly committed the most detestable exactions, and had been one of the ministers pointed out to succeed Necker and his colleagues. He was arrested at Viry, although he had spread a report of his own death [to elude his pursuers]. He was conducted to Paris, amidst reproaches for having said that the people ought to be made to eat hay. They tied nettles round his neck, put a bouquet of thistles in his hand, and a bundle of hay behind his back; and in this state he was drawn to the Hotel de Ville. At the same time, Berthier de Sauvigny, his son-in-law, was arrested at Compiègne, by colour of orders from the commune of Paris, which in fact had never been issued. The commune had without delay written for their release; an order that was not obeyed. They brought him to Paris at the very moment when Foulon was at the Hotel de Ville, exposed to the rage of an infuriated mob, who desired to kill him at once: the representations of Lafayette calmed the fury of the rabble for a moment, and they consented that their victims should be tried: but they insisted on sentence being passed instantly, that they might speedily revel in its execution. Several electors were chosen as judges, but had under divers pretexts refused this terrible office. At last Bailly and Lafayette were fixed upon, and reduced to the cruel extremity, either of exposing themselves to the rage of the people or sacrificing a victim. Nevertheless, Lafayette temporized with much firmness and address, and appealed to the people several times with success. The unhappy Foulon, placed on a seat by his side, had the imprudence to applaud his last words. "See," said one of the spectators, "they understand one another!" This idea immediately fired the mob, who would no longer listen to his remonstrances. They rushed in upon their victim, and carried him off. Lafayette made incredible efforts to extricate him from the assassins, but in vain. The unfortunate old man was hung at a street lamp, his head cut off, fixed on the point of a pike, and carried about Paris. At this moment Berthier arrived in a cabriolet, conducted by the guards, and followed by the mob. They showed him the bloody head of his father-in-law, which he did not recognize; He was conducted to the Hotel de Ville, and, far from being daunted, in a few words manifested the greatest intrepidity and indignation. Again seized by the mob, he extricates himself for a moment, gets hold of a weapon, defends himself with spirit, and soon falls, as did the unfortunate Foulon *. These murders were planned, either by the enemies of Foulon, or of the common weal; for although the fury of the people was spontaneously aroused at seeing them, as in other instances, their arrest was certainly pre-concerted. Lafayette, filled with grief and indignation at these outrages, gave in his resignation. Bailly and the municipality, alarmed at his determination, endeavoured to dissuade him from it; and it was at last agreed that he should give in his resignation, to make the people feel his displeasure, and afterwards allow himself to be prevailed upon to resume it, by solicitations which would be made him. In fact, the people and the military both pressed round him, and promised him the most implicit obedience. He resumed the command on these conditions; and henceforward had the satisfaction of preventing most of the tumults—thanks to his energy, and the devotion of his soldiers.

During this time Necker had received at Bâle the orders of the king, and the solicitations of the assembly. The Polignacs, whom he left triumphant at Versailles, and met fugitives at Bâle, were the first who informed him of the misfortunes of the throne, and the sudden return of favour which awaited him. He immediately set out for Paris, and came through France, drawn in triumph by the people, to whom according to his custom he recommended peace and good order. The king received him with embarrassment, the assembly with eager joy, and he determined to pay a visit to Paris to enjoy his day of triumph. It was Necker's intention to ask, of the electors, the pardon and enlargement of the Baron de Besenval. In vain Bailly, not less an enemy to measures of rigour than himself, but who more justly considered the circumstances of the times, represented to him the danger of such a step, and explained to him that this favour, granted unwillingly, would be revoked the next day as illegal, because a purely administrative body could neither condemn nor pardon: Necker was self-willed on this point, and experimentalized upon his influence in the capital. He visited the Hotel de Ville, on the 30th of July. The people on this day surpassed his hopes, and in witnessing the transports of the multitude, he might well believe himself all powerful. Deeply affected, and with his eyes full of tears, he demanded a general amnesty, which was granted with acclamations. The two assemblies, of the electors, and of the representatives, showed themselves equally eager: the electors decreed a general amnesty, and the representatives of the "Commune" gave an order for the liberation of Besenval. Necker retired intoxicated, congratulating himself on the applauses which were the forerunners of his disgrace. But from this day he was to be undeceived: Mirabeau aroused him from his delusive dream. In the assembly and districts a general cry was raised against the sensibility of the minister, excusable, it was said, but mistaken. The district of the "Oratoire," instigated, as it was asserted, by Mirabeau, was the first to annul the act of the electors and communes. It was maintained, on all sides, that a purely administrative body could neither condemn nor pardon. The illegal act, therefore, of the Hotel de Ville was revoked, and the detention of Baron de Besenval confirmed. Thus the opinion of the discreet Bailly was verified, and with this opinion Necker had declined to concur.

At this period, parties began to take a more decided character. The parliament, the nobility, the clergy, and the court, menaced with the same ruin, had blended their interests, and acted in concert *. At present, the court no longer possessed either the Count d'Artois, or the Polignacs. That kind of consternation which borders on despair, bore sway among the aristocracy. Not being able to prevent that which they called evil, they now desired that the people should perpetrate as much disorder as they could, in order that they might, by means of the very excess of the evil committed, bring forth good. This malicious and perfidious system, which may be truly termed political Possibilism or the basest policy, originated with those parties who having lost so much already, renounced what was left them, in the hopes of recovering all. The aristocracy from this time concurred in this policy, and were now often seen to vote with the most violent members of the popular party.

stances. The peril of the nobility raised up a defender for them. The young Cazalès, captain of the queen's dragoons, all at once displayed a fund of talent and facility of expression which astonished every one. Simplicity and conciseness, promptness and propriety, distinguished all he said; and it is to be regretted that a mind so accomplished was devoted to a cause in whose favour no good arguments could be furnished, till it had been persecuted. The clergy found a defender in the Abbé Maury. This abbé, a practised and imperturbable sophist, joined to great abilities a frigidity and obstinacy of disposition, which enabled him to resist tumult courageously, and oppose evidence with audacity, and admirably adapted him to support his tottering party. Such were the means and resources of the aristocracy.

The ministry were without either objects or projects. Necker alone, who was hated by the court, who only endured him by compulsion, had no settled plan, but merely an aspiration. He had always desired the English constitution, the best, without doubt, which could be adopted as an accommodation between the throne, the aristocracy, and the people; but this constitution, proposed by the bishop of Langres before the establishment of a single assembly, had been rejected by the first orders. He would not have two chambers, because it implied a species of submission; the lesser nobility also rejected it, because they would then be excluded from the upper chamber; and by the popular party, because, still feared by the aristocracy, their object was to deprive them of all influence. A few members alone, some from a principle of moderation, and others because it was really their own opinion, wished for English institutions, and formed the sole party of the minister, a feeble party enough, because it offered nothing but conciliatory views to irritated passions, and brought nought in opposition to their adversaries but mere reasonings and explanation.

The popular party became divided among themselves, because they were getting the upper hand. Lally-Tolendal, Mounier, Malloüet, and the other partisans of Necker, approved of all that had been done hitherto, because its result had been to lead the government into their views, that is to say, the English constitution. At this time they considered that their object had been attained. Having made friends with government, they were desirous of giving over. The popular party, on the contrary, considered that they had no reason to cease from what they had thus begun. This question was agitated with the utmost vehemence in the Breton club*. A sincere conviction influenced the majority; yet nevertheless personal pretensions began to display themselves, and already motives of self-interest had succeeded to the first burst of patriotism. Barnave, a young advocate of Grenoble, endowed with a prompt and luminous genius, and possessing in the highest degree the talent of speaking with propriety, formed, with the two Lameths, a triumvirate, rendered interesting by the youth of the parties who composed it, and soon possessed great influence by their activity and abilities. Du-port, that young counsellor of the parliament whom we have already mentioned, soon joined them. It was said, that Dupont was the head, Barnave the tongue, and the Lameths the hands, of this association. As yet these young deputies were on friendly terms with each other, without being the declared enemies of any one.

But of all the popular chiefs, Mirabeau took the lead in every bold and perilous debate. The absurd institutions of the old monarchy had stung the minds of the unprejudiced, and offended the well constituted; it was not possible, therefore, that they could fail in outraging and exasperating an enthusiastic and passionate mind. Such was the mind of Mirabeau, who encountering from his birth all kinds of despotism,—that of his father, of the government, and the courts of justice, spent his youth in hating and combating them. He was born in Provence, and descended from a noble family. He distinguished himself early by his debauched life, his quarrels, and his vehement eloquence. His travels, observations, and extensive reading, had given him knowledge on every subject, and he had retained everything. Extravagant, eccentric, and sophistical, even without the aid of passion, he became quite another man when under its influence. Excited by the warmth of a debate, or the presence of his opponents, his soul became on fire; his first ideas were confused, his sentences broken, and his body nervously agitated; but, quickly, as light broke in upon him, his genius displayed in an instant the acquirement of years; and even in the very act of speaking, his animated and rapid expressions gave point and illustration to his subject, and flashed conviction on his auditors. If opposed again, he returned to the charge still more forcible and more clear, and displayed the truth in striking or terrible images. If the situation of affairs was difficult, and the minds of all wearied by a long discussion, or intimidated by danger, some single expression, or decisive sentence, would escape from him, his countenance at such moments becoming terrible, from the combined expression of deformity and genius; and the assembly, enlightened or confirmed in their opinions, passed wise laws, or entered into vigorous resolutions.

Proud of his great qualities, and making vice his amusement; alternately haughty or courteous and flattering, he seduced some, intimidated others by his boldness and irony, and brought all into his train by a singular power of fascination. His party was every where—among the people, in the assembly, in the court itself, and in all those to whom he addressed himself at the moment. Mixing familiarly with all men, and acting with justice and expediency, he applauded the rising talents of Barnave, although he did not like his young friends; he appreciated the profound genius of Sieyès, and flattered his wild humour; he feared the purity of Lafayette's life; and he abhorred in Necker an extreme severity of principle, a pride of reasoning, and the pretension of governing a revolution, which he knew was a part that belonged only to himself. The Duke of Orleans, and his vague ambition, but little suited him; and, as will be shortly seen, had never possessed a single interest in common with him. Thus singly, and without any support but from his own genius, he attacked that despotism which he had sworn to destroy. Yet, if he was an enemy to the vanities of monarchy, he was no less so to the ostracism of republics; but not being yet sufficiently avenged on the great, and on power, he still continued his hostilities. In addition to this, being harassed by poverty and discontent with the present, he pushed forward to an unknown future, making every thing to depend upon his talents, his ambition, his vices, and the bad state of his fortune; and countenancing, by the imprudence of his discourses, every kind of suspicion and description of calumny.

Thus was France and its parties divided. The first differences between the popular deputies were occasioned by the excesses of the multitude. Mounier and Lally-Tolendal proposed that a solemn proclamation should be issued, in disapproval of these outrages. But the assembly, perceiving the inutility of this measure, and the necessity of not alienating the multitude, who had supported them, at first refused it; yielding, however, at last to the pressing remonstrances of some of its members, a proclamation was issued, which, as had been foreseen, was altogether useless, for a people in a state of insurrection are not calmed by words.

The agitation was universal. A sudden consternation spread throughout the country. The name of those brigands who, as has been seen, appeared in the different commotions, was in every one's mouth, and their image in every one's imagination. The court laid the blame of their havoc upon the popular party, and the popular party threw back the reproach upon the court. Couriers were immediately despatched, and, traversing France in all directions, brought intelligence that the brigands were advancing, and cutting down in their way the harvests before they were ripe. The people assembled together in all quarters, and in a few days the whole of France was in arms, in expectation of the brigands, who never appeared. This stratagem, which rendered the revolution of the 14th of July universal, by provoking the nation to arms, was attributed to all parties, and has since been ascribed to the popular party, who reaped the profit. It is astonishing that a stratagem more ingenious than culpable, should have been denied on all sides, and its imputation bandied from one to the other. It was attributed to Mirabeau, who was applauded as its author, but who nevertheless disavowed it. It was thought accordant to the genius of Sieyès, and some believe that he suggested it to the Duke of Orleans. Others after all imputed it to the court. It was thought that the couriers had been stopped, at every step, without the consent of government, and that the court, never having looked upon the revolution as general, and regarding it as a simple insurrection of the Parisians, wished to arm the provinces to subdue Paris. Whatever truth there may be in these conjectures, the event was of advantage to the nation, which it armed, and put in a state to watch over its safety and its rights.

The inhabitants of the cities having shaken off their fetters, those of the provinces wished also to follow their example. They refused to pay feudal rights, persecuted those lords who had oppressed them, set fire to their châteaux, burnt their titles of property, and exercised in some places the most atrocious outrages. A melancholy accident contributed more than anything else to produce this universal commotion. A gentleman at Mesmai, lord of Quincey, gave a fête in the grounds of his château. All the country people were assembled there, and, when giving loose to joy and merriment, a barrel of powder took fire, and suddenly blew up, with a tremendous explosion. This accident, which was known afterwards to have been occasioned by imprudence, and not intentionally, was laid to the charge of the landlord of Mesmai. The report was quickly propagated, and provoked on every side the ferocity of the peasants, hardened by a miserable life, and rendered cruel by their long sufferings. The priests came in bodies, to make a representation to the assembly of the deplorable state of France, and to demand from them the means of re-establishing order: these unhappinesses, which were of every possible description, took place after the 14th of July. The month of August had begun, and it became indispensably necessary to re-establish the action of the government and the laws; but to attempt this with success, it was requisite to commence the reformation of the state, by the reform of those institutions which most sensibly aggrieved the people, and disposed them chiefly to insurrection. One portion of the nation, subject to the other, had to discharge a multitude of services called feudal; of which some, termed beneficial, imposed upon the peasants ruinous duties; and others, termed honorific, submitted them to the most humiliating respect and services towards their lords. These were the barbarous remains of feudalism, and their abolition was a mere act of common justice. These privileges, regarded as rightful property, and even so styled under this appellation by the king, on the 23rd of June, consequently could not be abolished by mere discussion. It was necessary, therefore, by a sudden and energetic impulse, to induce their possessors to resign them themselves.

The famous declaration of the rights of man was at this crisis under discussion in the assembly. The first question was, whether one should be made out; and, on the morning of the 4th of August, it was decided in the affirmative, and settled that it should be placed at the head of the constitution. On the evening of the same day, the committee brought up their report of the troubles of the kingdom, and of the best means of appeasing them. The Viscount de Noailles and the Duke d'Aiguillon, both members of the nobility, on this occasion addressed the assembly, and represented, that it would be of little avail to re-establish order among the people by force; that the cause of their complaints should rather be destroyed, and that the disorders which sprung from it would immediately be calmed. Explaining themselves afterwards more clearly, they proposed the abolition of all those vexatious rights, which, under the denomination of feudal rights, weighed so heavily upon the inhabitants of the provinces. Monsieur Lequen de Kerendal, a proprietor in Brittany, presented himself at the tribune, in the dress of a husbandman, and delineated a frightful illustration of the feudal system. Hereupon, generosity exciting some, and pride drawing in others, induced a sudden disinterestedness, and every one hurried to the tribune to abdicate his privileges. The nobility set the first example, and the clergy, not less eager, hastened to follow it. A species of transport pervaded the assembly, superseding an useless discussion, certainly not necessary to demonstrate the justice of such sacrifices; all orders, all classes, all possessors of prerogatives, whatsoever they might be, hastened to execute their renunciation of them. After the deputies of the first orders, those of the commons came in their turn to make their resignations, and having no personal privileges to sacrifice, they offered those of the provinces and cities; the equality of rights established among individuals, was also extended to all parts of France. Some delivered up their pensions, and one member, having nothing else to give, promised his devotion to the public cause. All the passages to the public registry were crowded with deputies who had just entered the act of their renunciations. The assembly at this point contented themselves with enumerating the sacrifices of the aristocracy, and adjourned to the next day their formation into articles. The feeling became general; but in the midst of this enthusiasm, it was easy to perceive certain privileged persons perfectly insincere, whose object was to push things to the worst. Everything was to be feared from the effect of that night, added to the violence of public feeling, when Lally-Tolendal, perceiving the danger, passed a note to the president. "Everything is to be apprehended," said he, "from the enthusiasm of the assembly; break up the sitting." At the same moment a deputy sprang towards him, and grasping his hand with emotion, said to him: "Give us the royal sanction, and we are friends." Lally-Tolendal, immediately perceiving the necessity of again identifying the revolution with the king, proposed to proclaim him the restorer of French liberty. The proposition was received with enthusiasm: a "Te Deum" was decreed, and the assembly broke up at about midnight.

During this memorable night, the following acquisitions to liberty were obtained:—

- The abolition of the condition of serfship;
- The power of commuting of seigniorial rights;
- The abolition of seigniorial jurisdictions;
- The suppression of the exclusive rights of the chase, of dove-houses, and free warren, &c.;
- The amortization of tithes;
- The equalization of taxes;
- The admission of all citizens to civil and military employments;
- The abolition of the practice of selling offices;
- The annulling of all the privileges of cities and provinces;
- The abolition of jurats or aldermen;
- And the suppression of pensions obtained without services.

These resolutions were decreed under a general form, but it remained to reduce them into acts; and it was then, that the first burst of generosity having subsided, and the minds of all being restored to their natural bent, some wished to extend, and others to limit the concessions which had been obtained. The discussion became lively, and a prolonged and ill-judged opposition destroyed every sentiment of gratitude.

The abolition of feudal rights had been determined; but it was necessary to distinguish between those which were to be entirely abolished, and those which were to be commuted. These rights had originated from the ancient conquerors of the country, who, on their first occupation, had imposed services on the inhabitants, and tribute on the land. The land itself was only restored gradually to its cultivators, in consideration of perpetual rents. A long possession, followed by numerous conveyances, constituting ownership, all the burdens imposed upon the inhabitants and the land had acquired that character. The assembly was therefore reduced to the necessity of attacking these properties, not by objecting to the lawfulness of their acquisition, but by insisting on their burdensomeness to society. They abolished personal services; and many of these services having been changed into rents, those rents were also abolished. Among the duties imposed upon land, those were abolished which were evidently the remains of slavery, such as that placed on aliens. All perpetual rents were declared redeemable, although they were evidently the price for which the nobility had in old time granted a part of their territory to the tillers of the soil. Nothing therefore is more absurd than to accuse the constituent assembly of having violated property, for that had been done long before; and it is strange that the nobility, having so long violated, either by imposing tribute, or by not paying taxes, all the principles of private right and public justice, should have now shown themselves so tenacious of them when they concerned their own prerogatives. Seigniorial jurisdictions were also called property, having been for ages transmitted as hereditary; but the assembly did not suffer itself to be abused, and abolished them, ordering nevertheless, that they should be continued till a substitute could be provided for them.

The exclusive right of the chase was also a subject of animated disputes. In spite of the vain objection, that the whole population would shortly be in arms if that right was accorded, it was granted to every one within the extent of his own fields. Privileged dove-houses were also prohibited. The assembly decided that every one might possess them; but at the harvest season the pigeons might be killed as common game on the ground where they alighted. All commanderies were abolished; but it was added, out of respect for the king, that the royal diversions should be provided for in a manner compatible with the interests of liberty and property.

One article, that of tithes, excited, more than all the others, violent disputes, on account of the more important questions of which it was the prelude, and of the interests which it attacked. On the night of the 4th of August, the assembly had declared tithes to be redeemable. But, at the time of passing these resolutions into acts, they abolished them without redemption; adding, that the maintenance of the clergy should be provided for by the state. Undoubtedly there was a defect of form in this decision, as it contradicted an act already passed. Monsieur Garat replied to this objection, that according to the proposed plan the state would redeem the tithes in taking on itself to provide for the clergy; so that redemption was equally understood by this arrangement as by any other. The Abbé Sieyès, who occasioned surprise by being found amongst one of the assertors of tithes, and who was not deemed a disinterested defender of this tax, agreed, that in fact the state truly redeemed the tithes, but that it robbed the great bulk of the nation, in throwing on it the weight of a debt, which ought only to weigh on landed proprietors. This objection, enforced in a sarcastic manner, was accompanied by this satirical remark, since so often repeated: "You wish to be free, and you don't know how to be just"—Although Sieyès did not believe it possible to reply to this objection, the reply was easy. The expense incurred by public worship belongs to all; and whether it was fairer to make it weigh only on landed proprietors or on every one subject to taxation, was a question for the state to decide. A distribution most advantageous to the general interests could, in reality, injure no particular class of men. Tithes, by oppressing small proprietors, destroyed agriculture; the state therefore was bound, by every consideration of justice, to abolish this tax; this was proved by Mirabeau, with the most conclusive evidence. The clergy, who preferred tithes to every other mode of provision, because they foresaw that the salary given them by the state would be in proportion to their real wants, pretended to be proprietors of tithes by immemorial concessions, and renewed the oft repeated argument of long possession, which proves nothing, for then everything, even to tyranny, would be legitimized by long possession. To this it was replied, that tithes were merely an usufruct, which was not transmissible, and had not the characteristic marks of property; that it was evidently a tax established in their favour, and that the state took upon itself to change this tax into another. The pride of the clergy disdained the idea of being pensioned; their expostulation against the proposed measure was violent; but Mirabeau, who excelled in masterly strokes of argument and irony, rejoined to these interruptions, that he only knew three ways of existing in society: to be either a robber, beggar, or receiver of wages. The clergy perceived that it was requisite to abandon that which they could not defend. The curates especially, knowing that they had every thing to gain from the spirit of justice which reigned in the assembly, and that it was the opulence of the prelates at which it was particularly desired to strike, were the first to desist. The entire abolition of tithes was therefore decreed, and the state took upon itself the expenses of public worship. But, till this act should be carried into practical force, the clergy were permitted to levy tithes as usual. This last clause, full of consideration for that order, was, it is true, useless. The people had long ceased to be amenable to this article of taxation, and even before the abolition of the feudal system, had virtually cast off their obligation to pay tithes.

On the 13th of August, all the articles were presented to the king, who accepted the title of Restorer of French liberty, and assisted at the Te Deum, having at his right hand the president, and in his suite all the deputies.

Thus was accomplished the most important reform of the revolution. The assembly had displayed, in acquiring it, as much strength as moderation. Unhappily, the people never possess the wisdom of regaining their rights with equanimity. The most atrocious outrages were committed throughout the kingdom. The country was overrun by sportsmen, who spread themselves over the fields hitherto reserved for the exclusive pleasure of their oppressors, where they committed frightful devastations. Every usurpation has a painful retribution, and he who commits an usurpation ought to reflect upon this, at least for the sake of his descendants, who, in almost all cases, bear the punishment. Numerous accidents also took place.

On the 7th of August, the ministers were anew presented to the assembly, in order to make a report upon the state of the kingdom. The keeper of the seals depicted the alarming disorders which were every day taking place; Necker had displayed the deplorable state of the finances. The assembly received this double intelligence with sorrow, but without despondency. On the 19th, an act to ensure the public tranquillity was passed. By this act all municipalities were authorized to maintain the public peace, by dispersing all seditious assemblages; all rioters were made amenable to the sentence of the courts of justice; and those who spread false alarms, used false orders, or in any other way excited the populace to violence, were condemned to imprisonment. The national militia and regular troops were placed at the disposal of the municipalities, and were obliged to take an oath of fidelity to the nation, the king, and the laws, &c. This oath has since been termed the oath of civism.

Necker's account of the state of the finances was most alarming. Absolute want of subsidies compelled him to have recourse to a national assembly. This assembly had scarcely met, before it became engaged in a contest with government; and thinking of nothing else but the pressing necessity of establishing safeguards [against that formidable enemy], had neglected to provide for the revenues of the state. On Necker, therefore, alone fell all the harassing cares and anxieties of the finances. While Bailly, having the charge of providing for provisioning the capital, suffered the most cruel solicitude; Necker, tormented by necessities, perhaps less pressing, but greater in extent, and busied in the most laborious calculations, distracted by a thousand cares, made every effort to meet the public exigencies; and whilst he thought of nothing but financial questions, was unable to comprehend that the assembly considered nothing but politics.

Thus, Necker and the assembly, pre-occupied with their different objects, left every other matter unattended to. But, if the actual distress of the treasury justified the fears of Necker, the confidence of the assembly was equally justified by the elevation of their views. This assembly, taking a comprehensive view of France, and her future prosperity, could not believe that so fine a country, although for the moment in debt, had been stricken with irretrievable poverty.

Necker, on entering his ministry in August, 1788, had only found four hundred thousand francs in the treasury. He had at first, by great care, provided for the most pressing emergencies; but since then, circumstances had increased these wants, in diminishing his resources. It had been necessary to make purchases of wheat, to sell it again below the prime cost; to expend large sums in charities; and to provide public works to occupy the labouring classes. Twelve thousand francs per diem went out of the treasury for this last purpose; and instead of any proportionate augmentation of funds to meet these increasing demands, the revenue was daily diminished. The reduction of the price of salt, the delay of payment of taxes, and often the absolute refusal to pay them; the system of smuggling, which was carried on in defiance of all prohibition, the destruction of the barriers, the embezzlement of the very registers, and the murder of the commissioners, had annihilated a great part of the receipts. In consequence of this, Necker demanded a loan of thirty millions. The first impression made by his representation was so powerful, that the demand was on the point of being voted by acclamation; but this first impulse soon subsided. A repugnance was manifested against new loans, and a species of inconsistency was committed, by consulting the papers, the authority of which had been formerly renounced; and which prohibited the consent to taxes before a constitution was formed. Even a calculation was gone into as to the sums received since the preceding year, as if in distrust of the minister. Nevertheless, the necessity of providing for the wants of the state made consent to a loan indispensable; but the plan of the minister was changed, and the interest reduced to four and a half per cent., from a false expectation of exciting a patriotic feeling, which not only had no real existence in the nation, but certainly was not to be found among the stock-jobbers, the only people who usually pay any regard to financial operations. This first blunder of the assembly was one of those into which assemblies ordinarily fall, because they supersede the immediate views of the minister who negotiates, by the general views of twelve hundred speculators. It was easy to perceive that the spirit of the nation no longer accommodated itself to the timidity of the minister.

After this indispensable attention had been given to the public tranquillity and the finances, the assembly turned their thoughts to the declaration of rights. The first idea of this had been suggested by Lafayette, who, himself, had borrowed it from the Americans. The consideration of this question, interrupted by the revolution of the 14th of July, renewed on the first of August, and interrupted again by the abolition of the feudal system, was resumed and definitively settled on the 12th of August. This topic possessed great importance in the eyes of the assembly. These violent emotions of the mind directed them to every thing that was intrinsically great; from these transports proceeded their unanimity, their courage, their good and their evil resolutions. If the only question had been to lay down some principles entirely unknown to the authority whose yoke they had just shaken off, such as the vote for the general taxation, religious liberty, the liberty of the press, or ministerial responsibility, nothing would have been more easy. This had been done already in England and America. France might have also laid down, in a few clear and positive maxims, those new principles which she wished to impose on her government; but disregarding the experience of past ages, and wishing to go back to the most primitive times, she aspired at the formation of a complete declaration of the rights of the man and the citizen. The necessity and danger of such a declaration became the subject of great discussion; for there was no necessity, nor did any danger exist in framing a declaration composed of articles which the people were unable to comprehend; it served no other purpose than that of gratifying some of those philosophic minds, who did not take any prominent lead in the popular tumults. As it was decided that it should be drawn up, and placed at the head of the constitutional act, it became necessary to digest it, and here was the difficulty. What is the definition of the word right?—that which is due to man; consequently it might be said, that every benefit that could be conferred on man was his due; every wise measure of government is therefore a right. Likewise all proposed resolutions comprehended the definition of a law, the mode of its operation, the principle of its authority, &c. It was then objected that this was not an elucidation of rights, but of general maxims. Nevertheless it was necessary to express these maxims. It was therefore agreed that, in such cases, general maxims should be substituted for positive right. But the embodying of these maxims was extremely difficult; Mirabeau, in a fit of impatience, cried out, "Don't use the word right, but say, For the benefit of all it has been declared." . . . Nevertheless, the more imposing title of 'Declaration of rights' was preferred, in which maxims, principles, and definitions, were all mixed together; and this celebrated declaration, compounded of such various materials, was placed at the head of the constitution of 91. The greatest evil that accrued from it was the loss of a few sittings in the commonplace cant of philosophy; in other respects it was perfectly harmless. But who will reproach the assembly for being intoxicated with such a subject? And who has a right to despise the unavoidable weaknesses of their new political existence?

Although it was full time that something decided should be done towards forming a constitution, a general wariness was manifested in regard to preliminary matters, and fundamental points were already the subject of discussion out of doors. The English constitution, as it united the interests of the king, the aristocracy, and the people, was the model which naturally presented itself to many minds, seeing that it involved a mere agreement, as the consequence of a conference between the king, lords, and commons. This constitution essentially resided in the establishment of two chambers, and in the royal sanction; and was well adapted to reconcile together the extremes of despotism and democracy. But a people long enslaved, and suddenly emancipated, have no idea of mediating between evils. A nation who declared their will, and a king who executed it, appeared to such zealots for liberty the only legitimate form of government. To give to the aristocracy a part equal to that of the nation by means of an upper chamber, and to give to the king the right of annulling the national will by means of his sanction, were things abhorrent to all their notions of equality. The nation wills, the king executes, comprised their simple system of government; and because a king was left at the head of the state as an executor of the national will, those who wished to reduce him to such insignificance, persuaded themselves that they were advocates for monarchy. But real monarchy, such as it exists even in states reputed free, is the dominion of a single man, whose power is limited by the necessity of a national concurrence in his measures. The will of the prince is in reality nearly all; and that of the nation is confined to the prevention of evil, either in disputing taxation, or in consenting, as a third party, to the laws. But from the moment that a nation can command all its wishes, without the king having the power to oppose it by a veto, such king is no more than a magistrate. The state is then a republic, with one consul instead of many. The government of Poland, although it had a king, was never called a monarchy, but a republic; that of Laedremonia had also a king.

Monarchy, to be well understood, exacts great concessions from the people. But it is not after a long privation, and in their first enthusiasm, that a nation is disposed to such concessions; consequently, a republican form of government alone suited their views, without being expressly named, and they insensibly became republicans without intending it.

But the assembly did not explain themselves clearly in their discussions on this point; thus, notwithstanding the genius and knowledge which abounded in it, the question was badly handled, and little understood. Necker, Mounier, and Lally, the partisans of the English constitution, did not know exactly in what monarchy ought to consist; and if they had known it, they would not have dared to tell the assembly plainly, that the national will should not be omnipotent, and that it should possess rather a negative than positive authority. They contented themselves with repeating that the king should have the power of checking the excesses of an assembly; that for the purpose of effectively executing the law, he should co-operate in the formation of the laws; and that, finally, some relationship should exist between the executive and legislative powers. These arguments were bad, or at least weak; and in truth, it was ridiculous to acknowledge the sovereignty of the nation, and attempt, at the same time, to annihilate it by the single will of the king *.

There were more able advocates of the two chambers, because, even in republican forms of government, gradations of ranks must subsist; and it is highly expedient that the upper classes should have the power of putting some check to those bold novelties and experiments that might be expected from popular legislators. But this upper chamber, more indispensable than the royal prerogative, since there is no example of a republic without a senate, was still more violently the subject of opposition than the royal sanction, as the assembly were more irritated against aristocracy than royalty. The establishment of an upper chamber was therefore impossible; the lower nobility opposed it, because they were not admitted into it; so did the privileged orders, now past hope, because they desired the worst should take place at all events; and so did the popular party, because they were unwilling to leave a single hold to the aristocracy, from whence they might domineer over the national will. Mounier, Lally, and Necker, were almost single in their aspirations for this upper chamber. Sic ys from the wanderings of an arbitrary spirit, was opposed both to the two chambers and the royal sanction. He conceived the idea of a society perfectly united: according to his idea, the mass of the people, without distinction of classes, should be empowered to express their will, and the king, as sole magistrate, be entrusted to fulfil it. Thus he was sincere when he said, that monarchy or a republic were the same thing, since the difference was only in the number of magistrates commissioned to execute the laws. The peculiarity of the genius of Sic ys was a systematic concatenation and strict congruity of his own ideas. He understood well within himself, but he could not understand the nature of things, or those opinions which differed from his own. He obtained supremacy by the mere force of absolute maxims, but he rarely possessed the power of persuasion, consequently not being able to divide his systems, nor yet ensure their entire adoption, he expressed himself capriciously. Mirabeau, though possessing an accurate, prompt, and pliant mind, was not in point of fact a whit more advanced in political knowledge than the assembly itself. He opposed the two chambers, not from any moral conviction, but from a knowledge of its actual impracticability, and thorough hatred he bore to the aristocracy. He defended the [royal] sanction from a bias to monarchy; and had been constantly declaring, ever since the opening of the states, that without the sanction he would rather live at Constantinople than at Paris. Barnave, Duport, and Lameth, in this instance, disagreed with him. They neither desired an upper chamber nor the royal sanction; but they consented to modify their opinions, and were willing to grant the king and the upper chamber a suspending veto, that is to say, the power of temporarily opposing to the will of the nation, as expressed in the lower chamber.

These preliminary discussions engaged the assembly during the 28th and 29th of August. The party of Barnave wished to confer with Mounier, whom his own obstinacy had made chief of the English constitution party. He was the most unbending of those whom it was necessary to gain over, and to him therefore court was made. Conferences took place, when it was plain enough that it was impossible to alter a mode of thinking which in him had increased to a habitude of opinion; Mounier agreed to the adoption of the English forms he so strenuously insisted upon, provided that in opposing to the popular chamber an upper chamber and the king, he would not allow to them both but one suspending veto, and moreover deny the king the power of dissolving the assembly. Mounier answered like one fully convinced; he said, that truth was not exclusively his, and that he was unable in sacrificing one party to save another. He therefore threw up two institutions because he was unwilling to qualify them. And if it be true, that the constitution of 91, by the suppression of the upper chamber overturned the throne, which, as will be seen hereafter, was not the case, he had great cause to reproach himself. Mounier was not so passionately attached to his opinions, but merely wilful; he was as absolute in his notions as Sieyès, and preferred losing all, rather than conceding any thing. The conferences were broken off with ill-temper. Mounier was threatened with Paris and the public opinion, and his adversaries, said he, left him with the determination of putting their threats into execution*.

These questions were discussed by the people in a manner equally as animated as they were by the assembly. The very mob took part in the discussions, nor was their ignorance of the question any impediment to their forming the most decisive opinions; every thing was summed up in that terse and short word veto †. To have the veto and not have the veto , became in common parlance the same thing as to say one would or would not submit to a tyranny; the people not understanding it quite in that spirit, considered the veto as a tax that ought to be abolished, or considered it in the same light as an enemy they ought to get rid of, and whom they were desirous of hanging from a lamp-post.

But the Palais Royal was distinguished, above all, for its extended agitation. This was the rendezvous of the most violent demagogues, who being unable even to bear the restraints imposed by the districts, mounted themselves upon chairs and addressed the people uncalled for, and were either hissed or carried in triumph by that immense mob, who were perfectly ready to execute whatever they suggested. Camille Desmoulins, already mentioned in this history, distinguished himself by mad sallies, originality of mind, and selfish imprudence; and without being of cruel disposition, yet suggested the most cruel acts. There also was to be observed Saint-Hurugue, an aged marquis, who had been a long time kept prisoner in the Bastille, on account of some family feuds, and, irritated against the nobility to a pitch of perfect madness, was busy in stirring up the people to insurrection. There it was from day to day that these demagogues insisted that the Parisians should march to Versailles, to call the king and the assembly to account for their hesitation in according the wishes of the people; Lafayette had much ado to prevent this by means of a constant Patrol; the mob already began to accuse the national guard of aristocracy. There was no patrol, said Desmoulins, at Athens,—already were the names of Cromwell and Lafayette coupled together; at last, on Sunday the 30th of August, at a mob convocation at the Palais Royal, held for the purpose, the deputy Mounier was accused, Mirabeau represented as in great danger, and a proposition made of marching to Versailles to watch over the latter.

Mirabeau had in the meantime defended the sanction , but this did not interfere with his character as a tribune of the people, or make him appear a bit the less frequently in the eyes of the people. Saint-Hurugue, at the head of some fanatics took the road to Versailles. They intended, they said, to solicit the assembly to dismiss their faithless representatives, and nominate others, and to supplicate the king and the dauphin to reside in Paris, and there place themselves in safety, in the middle of the people. Lafayette hastens after them, stops them short and turns them back. On the next day, however, Monday, the 31st, they met again, and drew up an address to the commune , in which they demanded a convocation of the districts to express their disapprobation of the veto and the deputies who defended it, proposing, at the same time, their recall and the nomination of others. The commune repulsed them twice with the greatest firmness.

Meanwhile, agitation prevailed in the assembly. The malcontents had written letters to the principal deputies, full of menaces and invectives; one of them was signed with the name of Saint-Hurugue. On Monday the 31st, at the opening of the sitting, Lally complained of a deputation which he had received from the Palais Royal. This deputation had exhorted him to separate himself from the bad citizens who defended the veto , and added, that an army of twenty thousand men was ready to march [to Versailles]. Mounier read also letters which he had received, and proposed searching for the secret authors of these troubles, by offering a reward of five hundred thousand francs to any one who would inform against them. A disorderly wrangle ensued: D'apport maintained that it did not become the dignity of that assembly, to pay attention to such trifles. Mirabeau afterwards read letters which had been addressed to him, in which the enemies of the popular cause did not treat him a whit better than Mounier. The assembly then moved the order of the day, and Saint-Hurugue, as having signed one of the letters, was imprisoned by order of the commune .

The three questions of the permanency of the assembly, the two chambers, and the veto , were discussed together. The permanency was voted nearly unanimously. The nation had suffered too much from the long intervals of national assemblies, not to pronounce for their permanence. They passed, then, immediately, to the great question of the unity of the legislative body. The galleries being occupied by a numerous and noisy multitude, many of the deputies retired, in spite of the efforts of the president, the bishop of Langres, to keep them in their seats. They went out in numbers. The vote was loudly called for from all sides. Lally demanded, again, liberty to address the assembly, but this was denied him, while the president was accused of having sent him to the tribune. One member went so far as to ask the president whether he was not weary of fatiguing the assembly. Offended at these words, the president quitted his seat, and the decision was again delayed. On the next day, the 10th of September, an address was read from the city of Rennes, declaring the veto inadmissible, and those traitors to their country who voted for it. Mounier and his party became irritated, and proposed to snub the municipality, but Mirabeau replied, that the assembly was not obliged to teach ignorant municipal officers good manners. The question of the two chambers was then put to the vote, and amidst bursts of applause, the unity of the assembly was decreed. Four hundred and ninety-nine voices declared themselves for having one chamber, and ninety for having two; an hundred and twenty-two were lost, from the apprehension entertained by a large number of the deputies.

At last comes the question of the veto. [To reconcile the wide differences which existed on this subject,] a middle term had been found, that of a suspending veto, which stayed the passing of the law only for a time, during one or more legislative sittings. This was considered as an appeal to the people, because the king, in having recourse to new assemblies, and yielding to them if they persisted in the measures he opposed, in reality would appear to defer to the national authority; Mounier and his party resisted this plan; they drew their inference from the constitution of the English monarchy, where the king advises with the national representation, and does not obey it; but they were in the wrong, considering the situation of things. Their only object was, said they, to frustrate a precipitate act. Now the suspending veto produced this effect as well as the absolute veto; if the national representation should persist, the national will would be manifested; and in admitting its sovereignty it would be difficult to resist it indefinitely.

The ministry, in point of fact, felt that the suspensive produced, in a great measure, the effect of the absolute veto; and Neckor counselled the king to give himself the advantage of a voluntary concession, by addressing a memorial to the assembly, in which he should demand the suspensive veto. The report of this intended communication spread with rapidity, and its spirit and object was known before it was presented, which was on the 11th September. One would think that Mounier, advocating the cause of the throne, would have had no other views than the throne itself; but parties obtain very soon an interest distinct from those they serve. Mounier therefore repelled this communication, in observing, that if the king renounced a prerogative useful to the nation, it should be given him in spite of himself, as well as for the common weal. The tables were now turned, and the adversaries of the king here defended his mode of proceeding; but their efforts were useless, and the memorial was harshly rejected. The assembly now explained themselves again on the word sanction; arguing the question upon the point of its being indispensable to the constitution. After having determined that the constituting power was superior to constituted authorities, it was settled that the sanction could only be exercised on legislative, and in no wise on constitutional acts; and that these last merely required promulgation. Six hundred and seventy-three voices declared for the suspensive, and three hundred and twenty-five for the absolute veto. Thus were the fundamental articles of the new constitution passed. Mounier and Lally-Tolendal immediately laid down their commission as members of the constitutional committee.

Hitherto the assembly had passed a multitude of acts, without presenting any of them for the royal assent. It was now resolved to present to the king the articles of the 4th of August. But the previous question to be decided was, whether they required the sanction, or a simple promulgation; that is, whether they were to be considered legislative or constitutional acts. Maury, and even Lally-Tolendal, had the bad taste to maintain that they were legislative, and required the sanction, as if they had expected some obstacle to their passing from the royal prerogative. Mirabeau, with remarkable propriety, argued, that some abolished the feudal system, and were peculiarly constitutional; that the others were entirely a gift from the nobility and clergy, and that they could have no wish that the king should revoke their bounties. Chapelier added, that it was not to be supposed that even the consent of the king was necessary, since he had already approved of them, by accepting the title of the Restorer of French liberty, and assisting at the Te Deum; consequently, the assembly demanded of the king merely a simple promulgation*.

A member suddenly proposed a declaration of the hereditary descent of the crown, and the inviolability of the royal person; and the assembly, who sincerely wished for a king as their first hereditary magistrate, carried these two articles by acclamation. The inviolability of the person of the heir-presumptive was then proposed; but the Duke de Mortemart presently remarked, that sons had sometimes endeavoured to dethrone their fathers, and that it was necessary to preserve some means of checking such attempts. Upon this suggestion, the proposition was rejected. The deputy, Arnault, then, in reference to the act relating to the hereditary descent of the royal power from male to male, and branch to branch, proposed confirming the exclusion of the Spanish branch by the terms of the treaty of Utrecht. But the present was not thought a proper time to deliberate on this subject, more especially as it might alienate a faithful ally. Mirabeau agreed to this opinion, and the assembly passed to the order of the day. But suddenly, Mirabeau, for the purpose of making a badly conceived experiment, desired to revive the very question he had himself assisted to delay. The house of Orleans was in competition with the house of Spain, in case of the extinction of the reigning branch. Mirabeau had observed an earnest desire in the assembly to pass to the order of the day. Stranger as he was to the duke, although on familiar terms with him, as he was well able to be with every body, he wished to know the state of parties, and to know who were the friends, and who the enemies, of the duke. The question of the regency presented itself. In the case of a minority, the brothers of the king could not be guardians of their nephew, because, as successors of the royal ward, they were not interested in his preservation. The regency devolved then upon the nearest relation; this was either the queen, the duke of Orleans, or the family of Spain; and Mirabeau therefore proposed that the regency should not be bestowed upon any one who was not a native of France. "The knowledge," said he, "that I have of the geography of this assembly, and the point from whence proceed the cries of the order of the day, prove to me, that there is question here of nothing less than a foreign domination, and that the proposal of not deliberating on the subject, although apparently Spanish, is perhaps of Austrian origin."

* These articles were presented to him on the 20th September, 1789.

At these words loud cries drowned his voice, and the discussion re-commenced with extraordinary violence; all its opponents still called out for the order of the day. In vain Mirabeau repeated to them, over and over again, that they could have but one motive, that of bringing upon France a foreign domination. To this no reply was attempted, because, in fact, they preferred a stranger to the duke of Orleans. Finally, after a discussion of two days, it was again declared, that the present was not the proper time for this deliberation. But Mirabeau had obtained what he wanted, in seeing how parties declared themselves. This experiment, however, could not fail to expose him to a popular charge, and he passed from that time for an agent of the duke of Orleans*.

The assembly, while quite out of temper by this discussion, received the answer of the king to the articles of the 4th of August. The king, approving of the spirit in which they were conceived, gave to some of them only a conditional assent, in the hope that they would be modified in their execution; he renewed, for the most part, all the objections which had been made during their discussion, and repelled by the assembly. Mirabeau made his appearance in the tribune. "We have not," said he, "examined the superiority of the power constituent over the power executive; we have in some measure thrown a veil over this question (the assembly had in reality explained, for its own satisfaction, the manner in which it should be understood, without passing any decree with regard to it); but if our constituent power is withstood, we shall be obliged to declare it. Let the king act frankly and without dissimulation. We are agreed as to the difficulties of executing our acts, but we do not exact their unconditional performance. Thus, we demand the abolition of some offices, but decree at the same time a future compensation, and a compensation fund for that purpose: we declare the tax levied for the salary of the clergy destructive of agriculture, but fill a substitute can be found, we order the perception of tithe: we abolish seigniorial jurisdictions, but allow them to exist till other tribunals can be established. It is the same in every thing else; they involve principles which must be rendered irrevocable by their promulgation; and even if they were bad, public opinion calls for their adoption, and we can no longer refuse it. We should repeat frankly to the king, that which the fool of Philip II. said to that despotic prince, 'What would you do, Philip, if all the world should say yes, when you say no?'"

The assembly again ordered the president to wait upon the king, and demand his promulgation. The king granted it, and the assembly, deliberating on the duration of the suspensive veto, extended it to two legislative sessions. But the assembly did wrong in suffering it to appear that this concession was, in some sort, a recompense to Louis XVI. for the concessions he was making to public opinion.

Hitherto the assembly had pursued its object in spite of the obstacles raised by the ill-will of the privileged orders, and the excesses of the popular fury; but another embarrassment now arose, which threatened to terminate its proceedings, and caused its enemies to triumph. It was expected that their course would be delayed by financial embarrassments, as that of the court had previously been. The first loan of thirty millions had not succeeded: a second of eighty, voted on account of a new proposition of Necker*, did not lead to happier results. "Let us go on with our discussions," said M. Degouty D'Arcy; "let delays be continued, and at the expiration of these delays, we shall no longer exist. I am going to disclose to you terrible truths."—"To order, to order," cried some; "No, no, speak," said others. A deputy rose up,—"Go on," said he to Mons. Degouty, "spread alarm and terror! What will be the consequence? we shall give a part of our fortunes, and that will settle every thing." M. Degouty continued, "The loans which you have voted have furnished nothing. There are not ten millions in the treasury." At these words he was again mobbed, reproached, and begged to hold his peace. The Duke D'Aiguillon, president of the committee of finance, contradicted his statement by proving that twenty-two millions yet remained. Nevertheless, it was ordered that Fridays and Saturdays should be particularly devoted to finance questions.

Necker finally arrived. A sufferer in every way from his continual labours, he renewed his never-ceasing complaints; he reproached the assembly with having neglected the finances after five months' business. The two loans were of no permanent service, because the disorders of the nation had destroyed its credit. The capitalists concealed themselves; those of foreign countries had not come forward. Emigration, and the great infrequency of all travellers, had still more diminished the currency, and there was not enough remaining for daily necessities. The king and queen had sent their plate to the mint. The sequel was, that Necker demanded an extraordinary levy of a fourth of the revenue, assuring the assembly that this supply appeared to him insufficient. A committee, employed three days in the examination of this plan, approved of it entirely. Mirabeau, the known enemy of the minister, was the first who endeavoured to persuade the assembly to consent to it without a discussion. "Not having time," said he, "to form their opinion, they ought not to charge themselves with the responsibility of the event, either in approving or condemning the proposed means." From this motive he advised the voting for it off-hand with confidence. The assembly thus hurried on, adopted his advice, and ordered him to retire and draw up the act. Meantime their enthusiasm became calmed; the enemies of the minister pretended to have found resources which he had not perceived; and his friends, on the contrary, attacked Mirabeau, and complained that he wished to crush Necker with the responsibility of events. Mirabeau re-entered, and read his decree. "You are rendering the plan of the minister fatal to himself," cried M. de Virieu; and Mirabeau, who never yielded without answering, frankly avowed his motives: he agreed that they had been truly conjectured when it was said that he sought to charge Necker with the responsibility of events; he said, that he had not the honour of being his friend, but that if he was his most intimate friend, and above all considerations as a citizen, he would not hesitate to sacrifice Necker rather than the assembly; that he did not believe the kingdom would be in danger even if M. Necker were in error; but on the other hand, the public safety would be sacrificed if the assembly lost its credit, and failed in a decisive operation. He then proposed an address to excite the national patriotism, and to support the minister.

He was applauded, but the debate was not at an end. A thousand different propositions were made and rejected, and the time wasted in vain subtleties. Wearied with so many contradictions, and impressed with the emergencies of the occasion, he ascended for the last time the tribune, seized the point, put the question once more with admirable clearness, and showed the impossibility of withdrawing from the necessity of the moment. Becoming more animated as he proceeded, he painted the horrors of a bankruptcy with wonderful force; described it as a disastrous tax, which instead of weighing lightly on all, only bears upon a few whom it crushes; he represented it as a gulf, into which living victims were precipitated, and which does not even close after having devoured them; for one does not owe the less by a refusal to pay; finally, filling the assembly with terror, "the other day," said he, "in reference to a ridiculous motion of the Palais Royal, the people cried out, Catiline is at the gates, and yet you deliberate! and certainly there was neither Catiline, nor danger, nor Rome; but to-day here is an hideous bankruptcy, which threatens to devour yourselves, your honour, and your fortunes, and yet you deliberate!"

At these words, the assembly in a transport of emotion, rose up and uttered cries of enthusiasm. A deputy wished to reply; he advanced, but, as if alarmed at his own efforts, stood stock still and silent. The assembly immediately declared, that having heard the report of the committee, they adopted in confidence the plan of the minister of finance. This was the effect of a happy burst of eloquence, which could only happen to one who had at the same time the abilities and the passions of Mirabeau*.

* These debates took place at the sittings from the 22nd to 24th September, 1789.

CHAPTER IV.

COURT INTRIGUES—ENTERTAINMENT GIVEN BY THE OFFICERS OF THE LIFE-GUARDS AND THE FLANDERS REGIMENT AT VERSAILLES—EVENTS OF THE FOURTH, FIFTH, AND SIXTH OF OCTOBER; RIOTOUS AND SANGUINARY OCCURRENCES—ATTACK OF THE PALACE OF VERSAILLES BY THE MOB—THE KING FIXES HIS ABODE AT PARIS—POSITION OF POLITICAL PARTIES—DUKE OF ORLÉANS QUITS FRANCE—NEGOTIATIONS OF MIRABEAU WITH THE COURT—THE ASSEMBLY TRANSFERS ITSELF TO PARIS—THE ESTATES OF THE CLERGY BILL—OATH OF CIVISM—COALITION OF MIRABEAU WITH THE COURT—BOUILLE—TRIAL OF FAVRAS—COUNTER-REVOLUTIONARY SCHEMES—CLUBS OF THE JACOBINS AND FEUILLEANS.

WHILST the assembly thus laid their hands on every part of the edifice of the constitution, great events were in preparation. By the assembling of the orders the nation had recovered its legislative and constitutional omnipotence; and by the affair of the 14th of July, it became armed to support its representatives. Thus the king and the aristocracy remained alone and unarmed, having nothing left to them but that notion of their rights in which no one participated, and placed in the presence of a nation ready to conceive anything and carry it into execution. Nevertheless the court, retired within a little town entirely peopled by its servants, was in some measure out of the range of popular influence, and was rather in a situation to attempt a design upon the assembly. It was natural that Paris, situated a few leagues from Versailles, the capital of the kingdom, and the habitation of an immense populace, should wish to bring back the king into its own circle, for the purpose of withdrawing him from all aristocratical influence, and recovering the advantages which attach upon a town when it becomes the seat of the court and of the government. After having reduced the authority of the king, it only remained to secure his person. To this the course of events tended, and from all sides was heard the cry of Le Roi à Paris. The aristocracy thought no longer of defending themselves from new defeats. They underrated too much the advantages they still possessed, to trouble themselves about preserving them, and desired a violent change as much as the popular party. A revolution is inevitable when both parties concur in desiring it; in that case both contribute to the event, and the stronger secures the advantage resulting from it. Whilst the patriots hoped to bring the king to Paris, the court meditated carrying him to Metz. In that strong fortification, he could have carried all his designs, or rather what others had designed for him, into execution. The courtiers, therefore, formed plans, and set schemes on foot, sought to enlist every one in them, and relying upon vain hopes, betrayed themselves by their imprudent designs. D'Estaing, formerly so celebrated at the head of our squadrons, commanded at this time the national guard of Versailles. It was his ambition to be, at once, faithful to the nation and the king, a difficult part to play, and as being always subject to aspersions, requiring great firmness of character to render his position respectable. When he was informed therefore of the conspiracies of the court, and learnt by witnesses the most worthy of credit, that persons of the highest rank were involved in them, he wrote a very celebrated letter to the queen, in which he represented with a respectful firmness, the impropriety and danger of such designs. He disguised nothing, and named all parties concorned *. The letter did no good. The queen should not have been astonished at remonstrances which were provoked by the encouragement she gave to such enterprises.

At about the same period numerous strangers appeared at Versailles; and strange uniforms were observed. The company of the body-guard, the term of whose service was expired, were retained; and some dragoons and light horse of the Trois Evêchés were added to them. The French guards, who had quitted the service of the king in disgust, because the care of his person was entrusted to others, now desired to resume their former situation, and advanced to Versailles for that purpose. They had undoubtedly no reason to complain, as they had abandoned this service voluntarily; but they were particularly induced so to do. At the time it was said, that it was the work of the court faction, who wished, by this means, to frighten the king, and draw him to Metz. A single fact sufficiently proves this intention; since the riots of the Palais Royal, Lafayette, in order to defend the passage from Paris to Versailles, had stationed a detachment at Sèvres, but was obliged to withdraw it on the demand of the deputies of the right side. However, Lafayette succeeded in stopping the French guards, and diverting them from their design; he then wrote confidentially to the minister Saint-Priest, informing him of what had passed, and assuring him that all was then safe. Saint-Priest, abusing the confidence of this letter, shewed it to D'Estaing, and he communicated it to the officers of the national guard of Versailles, and to the municipality, as a means of informing them of the jeopardy to which the town had been already exposed, and to put them on their guard against similar dangers in future. It being proposed to send for the Flanders regiment, a great number of battalions of the guard stationed at Versailles set themselves against it; but the municipality did not less press its requisition, and the regiment was sent for. This, it is true, was too small a force to be directed against the assembly, but it was strong enough to carry off the king, and cover his escape. D'Estaing informed the national assembly of the measures that had been taken, and obtained its approbation. The regiment arrived; the military stores which followed it, although inconsiderable, did not fail to excite murmurs. The body-guard and courtiers welcomed the officers, and loaded them with attentions; and, as before the 14th of July, the court and troops appeared perfectly to understand each other, and to entertain great expectations.

The self-confidence of the former augmented the suspicion of Paris; and the fêtes, which were held shortly after, exasperated the misery of the people. On the 2nd of October the life-guards made preparations for giving an entertainment to the officers of the garrison. This entertainment took place in the saloon of the theatre. The boxes were filled with spectators of the court party. The officers of the national guard were among the number of guests. The most lively gaiety prevailed during the repast, which wine quickly converted to inebriation. The soldiers of the regiments [quartered at Versailles] were introduced. The guests with drawn swords in their hands, drank the health of the royal family; that of the nation was refused, or at least omitted; the trumpets sounded the charge; the boxes were escaladed with shouts, and this expressive and well-known song was thundered forth; O, Richard! à mon roi! l'univers l'abandonne! Every one pledged himself to die for the king, as if he were in the greatest danger, and the excitement of the assembly knew no bounds. Black or white cockades, but all of a single colour, were distributed on every side, and the youth of both sexes felt themselves animated by the most chivalrous associations. At this moment it was said the national cockade was trampled under foot. It is true this was afterwards denied, but does not wine render every thing credible, nay, quite excusable? Besides, what object is there in such meetings, which can only produce on the one side a false devotion, and on the other side a real and terrible exasperation. Whilst the enthusiasm of the party was at its height, some persons are despatched to fetch the queen, who consented to join the entertainment. The king, who had just returned from hunting, is also over-persuaded to attend; and they both receive the most lively demonstrations of regard from the revellers, and then are re-conducted as it were in triumph to their apartments. Doubtless it must have been pleasing to the king, when he believed himself destitute and menaced, to find friends; but why deceive himself concerning his rights and the strength of his means?

The report of this fête was quickly spread abroad; and undoubtedly the imagination of the people, in propagating the facts connected with it, added its own exaggeration to that which inebriation had produced. The promises made to the king were considered as so many menaces against the nation; the prodigality of the entertainment as an insult to the poverty of the people; and the cries à Versailles, became more violent than ever. Thus trivial causes conspired to aid the effect of general causes. Some young people were seen at Paris with black cockades; they were pursued; one of them was dragged through the streets by the multitude; and the commune found themselves obliged to forbid the wearing cockades of a single colour.

The day following this fatal entertainment, a new scene, nearly similar, took place at a breakfast given by the body-guard at the Ride. The revellers presented themselves again to the queen, who told them how gratified she had been by the entertainment of Thursday. Whatever the queen said was eagerly attended to, because, being less reserved than the king, the nation expected to hear from her the sentiments of the court; and her words were repeated. The public exasperation was then at its height, and no event was too violent to be expected. The king was the object on which the desires of the people and the court both centred; the people wished to have the possession of his person, and the court, by working on him by fear, to carry him off to Metz. This last project suited also the views of the duke of Orleans, who might expect to obtain the lieutenancy of the kingdom if the king should absent himself; it was even said that he went so far as to hope for the crown, which is scarcely credible, for it required a bolder spirit than his to entertain such lofty ambition.

The advantages which he had reason to anticipate from this new insurrection, have occasioned him to be accused of having participated in it; however, there is nothing to show that he did. He could not have directed the impulse of the public mind, for it resulted from uncontrollable events; the utmost he could have done was to encourage it; but on this point, a long scrutiny, and time which reveals everything, have not brought to light a single trace of a preconcerted plan. Without doubt, in this instance, as during the whole revolution, he followed the popular impulse, scattering, perhaps, a little gold, and affording occasion for surmises, but having no settled expectations on the subject.

The people, excited by the discussions upon the veto, irritated by the black cockades, annoyed by continual patrols, and suffering from hunger, were stirred up to rebellion. Bailly and Necker had done all that could be done to provide food; but either from the difficulty of transporting it to the capital, or from the plunder which took place on the road, and above all, from the impossibility of compensating for the spontaneous action of commerce, the supplies of flour failed. On the 4th of October the agitation of the populace was greater than ever. They talked of the departure of the king to Metz, and of the necessity of seeking him at Versailles; black cockades were every where seen; bread was loudly called for. Numerous patrols kept the people within bounds, and that night was sufficiently quiet. On the morning of the next day, the 5th, vast crowds were gathered together. The women thronged the bakers' shops, and finding no bread, ran to the Hotel de Ville, to complain of it to the representatives of the commune. The commune had not commenced their sittings; and a battalion of the national guard was drawn up round the court-yard. Some men soon joined this female gang, but they were unwilling to admit them, saying, that men did not know how to act: they then rushed upon the battalion, and made them retreat by throwing stones at them. At this moment a gate having been broke open, the Hotel de Ville was taken by force; the brigands, armed with pikes, rushed in with the women, and endeavoured to set it on fire. Means were taken to dislodge them, but yet they got possession of the gate which led to the great clock tower, and sounded the alarm bell (le tocsin). The faubourgs were now in motion. A citizen named Maillard, one of those who had signalized themselves at the taking of the Bastille, consulted the officer who commanded the battalion of the national guard, concerning the best means of delivering the Hotel de Ville from these furious women. The officer did not dare to approve of the method he proposed; it was that of assembling them together under the pretext of going to Versailles, but without taking them thither. Nevertheless, Maillard decided on the expedient, and by the beating of a drum, soon drew them in his train. They carried in their hands, clubs, handles of brooms, firelocks, and short swords. With this extraordinary army, he went down to the quai, crossed the Louvre, was obliged in spite of himself to lead them across the Tuilleries, and came to the Champs Elysees. There he contrived to disarm them, by persuading them that it was more suitable to present themselves to the assembly as suppliants, rather than as furies in arms. They agreed to this, and he was obliged to lead them to Versailles, for it was no longer possible to divert them from their resolution. Every thing now seemed to lead to a crisis: several groups were seen setting out for Versailles dragging cannon; others surrounded the national guard; and the national guard itself beset its chief, urging him to march them to Versailles, the main object of their determinations.

Meantime the court still remained in tranquillity; but the assembly, whilst yet in the greatest agitation, received a message from the king. They had presented the constitutional articles, and the declaration of rights for his acceptance. The answer should have been a simple acceptance, with the promise of their promulgation. But for the second time, the king, without entering into any clear explanations, addressed some observations to the assembly, and gave his "accession" to the constitutional articles, but without approving of them; he said there were many good principles contained in the declaration of rights, but they required qualifications; and, to sum up in a word, he said the entire could not be decided upon until the formation of every part of the constitution had been accomplished. This was undoubtedly a defensible opinion, and many public writers entertained the same; but was it expedient to declare it at the present period? The reading of this declaration was scarcely finished, when it called forth a general expression of complaint. Robespierre said that it was not the business of the king to criticise the assembly; Duport, that his answer should have been countersigned by some responsible minister. Pétion took this opportunity of noticing the circumstance of the fête of the body-guard, and declared that at that fête imprecations had been directed against the assembly. Grégoire dwelt upon the scarcity of provisions, and noticed the circumstance of a letter having been written to a miller, with a promise of two hundred pounds per week if he would cease grinding. This letter proved nothing, for it might have been written by one party as well as another; nevertheless it caused great excitement, and Mons. de Mouspey called upon Pétion to sign his impeachment. Then Mirabeau, who disapproved of the conduct of Pétion and Grégoire, came forward to answer Mons. de Mouspey. "I have disapproved of, from the very first," said he, "these impolitic denunciations; but since it is insisted on, I myself will denounce; and I will sign, when it shall be declared that there is nothing inviolable in France but the king." At this terrible apostrophe the assembly were silent, and returned to the answer of the king. It was eleven o'clock in the morning. The report of the commotions of Paris was brought to the assembly. Mirabeau advanced towards the president Mounier, who had been recently elected in spite of the Palais Royal, and displayed on this fatal day an unyielding resolution. Mirabeau approached him. "Paris," said he to him, "is marching upon us; feign yourself ill, go to the palace, and tell the king to accept purely and unconditionally." "Let Paris march, so much the better," replied Mounier, "let them slaughter us all, yes, all; and the state will be the gainer."—"A very pretty notion this," replied Mirabeau, and returned to his place. The discussion continued till three o'clock, when it was decided that the president should go the king to demand his pure and unconditional acceptance. At the moment when Mounier was setting out to go to the palace, a deputation was announced; it was Maillard, and the women who had followed him. Maillard demanded admittance that he might speak to the assembly. He was introduced, and the women, rushing after him, entered the chamber. He related all that had passed, the want of bread, and despair of the people; he spoke of the letter which had been addressed to the miller, and said, that a person he had met on the road, had declared that a curate was commissioned to accuse him before the assembly of it. This curate was Grégoire, and, as has been seen, he made his impeachment. A voice then accused Juigné, archbishop of Paris, of being the author of the letter. Expressions of indignation were raised to repel the imputation from the virtuous prelate. Maillard and his deputation were called to order. He was answered, that means had been taken to supply Paris with provisions; that the king had omitted nothing; and that they were now going to pray him to take new measures; and the speaker added, that the women must now retire to their homes; that disturbances were not the means of making the scarcity cease. Mounier now set out for the palace, but the women surrounded him, and insisted on accompanying him. This he refused to allow at first, but was afterwards obliged to admit six. He passed through hordes of people who had arrived from Paris, armed with pikes, axes, and clubs tipped with iron. It rained heavily. A detachment of the body-guard charged on the crowd who surrounded the president, and dispersed them; but the women soon rejoined Mounier, and he arrived at the palace, where the Flanders regiment, the dragoons, the Swiss, and the national guard of Versailles, were drawn up in order of battle. Instead of six women, he was obliged to introduce twelve. The king received them with the greatest kindness, and lamented their distress; they were moved; and one of them, a young and beautiful female, was so overcome by the sight of the monarch, that she could scarcely pronounce the word "some bread." The king, powerfully affected, embraced her, and the women returned softened by this reception. Their companions received them at the gate of the palace, but would not believe their report, said they had suffered themselves to be seduced, and were about to tear them to pieces, when the body-guard, commanded by the Count de Guiche, hastened to their rescue. Musket shots were fired from many directions; two guards fell, and many women were wounded. Not far from this, one of the popular demagogues, at the head of some women, forced his way through the ranks of the battalions, and advanced so far as the gate of the palace. Mons. de Savonnières pursued them, but he received a shot which fractured his arm. These skirmishes produced on both sides the greatest irritation. The king, being informed of the danger, ordered the guards not to fire, and to retire to their quarters. Whilst they were retiring, some shots were exchanged between them and the national guard of Versailles; but from which side the first shot came could not be distinguished.

Whilst this disturbance was taking place the king held a council, and Mounier awaited impatiently for his reply. He repeated every moment that his public functions called him to the assembly; that the news of the sanction would act as a sedative; that he would retire if he received no answer, and that he could no longer absent himself from his post. The question agitated in the council was whether the king should depart; it lasted from six till ten o'clock in the evening; and the king, it is said, would not consent to leave his palace vacant for the Duke of Orleans. The court, however, wished to make the queen and children set out; but the crowd stopped the carriages the instant they appeared, and, what was more, the queen had courageously determined not to separate herself from her husband. Finally, towards ten o'clock, Mounier received a pure and unconditional acceptance, and returned to the assembly. The deputies had by this time separated, and the women now occupied the chamber. Mounier informed them of the acceptance of the king, which they received without any expression of satisfaction, and asked if it would make their lot any better, or provide them with bread. He replied to them in the mildest manner he could, and had all the bread that could be procured distributed among them. During this night, the blame of whose events it is so difficult to fix upon any one, the municipality were certainly liable to censure, for not providing for the necessities of this famished multitude, whom want of bread had driven from Paris, and who had not been able to procure any on the roads.

Almost immediately after, news came of Lafayette's arrival from Paris. He had struggled against the national guard for more than eight hours, who desired to go to Versailles. One of his grenadiers said to him, "General, you do not deceive us, but you yourself are deceived. Instead of turning our arms against women, let us go to Versailles, and fetch the king, and assure ourselves of his good dispositions, by placing him in the midst of us." Lafayette, however, still resisted the entreaties of his troops, and the tumults of the multitude. His soldiers were not attached to him by victory, but by opinion, consequently had their good opinion abandoned him, he could no longer have commanded them. Nevertheless he succeeded in delaying their departure till the evening, but his voice was confined to a small circle, and beyond that nothing checked the fury of the populace. His life was frequently menaced, yet still he held out. But, as he knew that hordes of people departed continually from Paris, and the insurrection was thus transferred to Versailles, he felt it his duty to follow it. Finally, the commune ordered him to go thither, and he accordingly went. On the road he halted his army, and made them take an oath to be faithful to the king; he arrived at Versailles at about midnight, and assured Mounier that the army had promised to fulfil their duty, and that nothing should be done contrary to law. He then hastened to the palace, and with respect and grief in his countenance, acquainted the king with the precautions that had been taken, and assured him of the devotion both himself and the army bore to his cause. The king appeared tranquillized, and retired to rest. The guard-house of the palace had been refused Lafayette; none but outside quarters were assigned them. The other quarters were occupied by the Flanders regiment, of whose fidelity some doubts existed, and the Swiss and body-guard. These regiments had received orders to return into the country, but they were afterwards countermanded; not, however, being able to agree, very few were ever found together at their posts. In the midst of the disturbances which every where prevailed, all accessible points to the palace had not been defended; even a gate had been left open: Lafayette therefore occupied the outside quarters which had been confided to him, and not one of these posts were forced or even attacked.

During this time the assembly, notwithstanding the tumult that was every where raised, had resumed their sitting, and entered into a discussion on the penal laws, in the most impressive manner. From time to time the people interrupted the debate by demanding bread. Mirabeau, harassed, called out in a loud voice, that the assembly would not allow itself to be dictated to by any one, and that the galleries should be cleared. The people drowned his exclamation with plaudits; and it was not prudent for the assembly to resist them any further. Lafayette having by this time communicated to Mounier that all appeared to him tranquil, the assembly separated at about midnight, and adjourned till the next day, the 6th, at eleven o'clock.

The people were now dispersed here and there, and Lafayette, who had good reason to assure himself of the implicit fidelity of his army, in which he had never been deceived, and particularly relying upon the general appearance of tranquillity which seemed to prevail, had secured the quarters of the body-guard, had sent out numerous patrols; and at five o'clock in the morning he was still up and about; thinking that all danger was over, he drank a glass of wine and threw himself on his bed, to take that repose of which he had been deprived for four-and-twenty hours*.

At about this time the people began to stir about, and already some were roaming about the environs of the palace. A quarrel took place with a life-guardsmen, who fired from the window. The brigands darted from their hiding places, ran through the gate which had remained open, mounted a staircase which they found unoccupied, and were finally stopped by two guards, who defended themselves heroically, and fought every step of their ground, as they retired from door to door. One of these generous servants of the king was Mionandrea. "Save the queen," cried he. The cry was heard, and the queen saved herself by flying trembling to the king. Whilst she fled, the brigands rushed on, and finding the royal couch abandoned, endeavoured to penetrate further; but they were stopped again by the life-guard, who were collected in great numbers at this point. At this moment the French guards belonging to Lafayette, and posted near the chateau, hearing the uproar, hastened to the chateau, and dispersed the brigands. They presented themselves at the door behind which the body-guard were collected. "Open to us," cried they; "the French guards have not forgotten that at Fontenoi you saved their regiment!" The door was immediately opened, and they embraced one another.

All was uproar without; Lafayette, who had scarce lain down a few minutes, and who was not yet asleep, heard the noise, sprang upon the first horse he could find, rushed into the middle of the fray, and found many of the life-guard on the point of being slaughtered. Whilst he rescued them, he ordered his troop to hasten to the palace, and remained nearly alone in the middle of the brigands. One of them took aim at him; Lafayette, perfectly composed, commanded the people to take him away; and they immediately seized the culprit, and, before the eyes of Lafayette, dashed his brains out against the pavement. Lafayette, after having saved the soldiers of the life-guard, flew to the palace with them, and found his grenadiers already arrived there, who immediately surrounded him, and pledged themselves to die in defence of the king. At this moment, the soldiers of the life-guard, who had been snatched from death, cried out, Vive Lafayette! The whole court, who saw themselves saved by him and his troop, acknowledged that they owed their life to him; these testimonies of acknowledgment were general. Madame Adelaide, aunt of the king, ran to him, and taking him in her arms, said, "General, you have saved us."

The people now loudly demanded that Louis XVI should go to Paris. A council was held. Lafayette was invited to take part in it, but refused, that he might not be a restraint upon its freedom of discussion. It was finally decided that the court should yield to the wishes of the people; and billets, making known this determination, were thrown out of the window. Louis XVI. then presented himself at the balcony, and was received with cries of Vive le Roi! But it was not thus with the queen; menacing voices were raised against her. Lafayette approached her. "Madame," said he, "what is it your intention to do?" "To accompany the king," replied the queen, courageously. "Follow me, then," resumed the general, and he conducted her in a state of astonishment to the balcony. Some threatening expressions were uttered by the popular demagogues. A fatal blow might hit her; words could not be heard; it was necessary to make a sudden impression: bending down, therefore, and taking the hand of the queen, the general kissed it respectfully. The people were transported at this sight, and confirmed their reconciliation by cries of Vive la Reine! Vive Lafayette! Peace was still to be made with the body-guard. "Will you do nothing for my guards?" said the king to Lafayette. He immediately conducted one of them to the balcony, and embraced him, at the same time fixing on him his bandolier. The people again express their satisfaction, and confirm this second reconciliation by acclamation.

The assembly had not considered it consistent with their dignity to attend the monarch, although it had been required. They contented themselves with sending a deputation of thirty-six members to wait upon him; and as soon as they were informed of his departure, they passed an act, rendering themselves inseparable from the person of the monarch, at the same time appointing a hundred deputies to accompany him to Paris. The king received the decree, and set out on his journey.

* See note 2 in the Appendix.

Most of the gangs of wretches had already departed; Lafayette ordered a detachment of the army to follow them to prevent their return. He also gave orders for disarming the brigands, who carried the heads of two life-guardsmen on pikes. This horrible trophy was torn from them; and it is not true that it was carried before the carriage of the king.

Louis XVI. finally arrived in the midst of an immense concourse of people, and was received by Bailly at the Hotel de Ville. "I return with confidence," said the king, "to the midst of my people." Bailly reported these words to those who were able to hear them, but he forgot the word confidence. "Add with confidence," said the queen.—"You are more fortunate," said Bailly, "than if I had pronounced these words."

The royal family took up their abode at the Palace of the Tuilleries, which had not been inhabited for a century, and in which there had been no time to make the necessary preparations. The guard was confided to Parisian militia, and Lafayette found himself bound to answer to the nation for the person of the king, which was the subject of dispute with all parties. The nobles desired to get him into their keeping, that they might convey him to some strong place, and under his name to keep up despotism; and the popular party, who never conceived the idea of not gratifying their desires, wished to have the custody of the king's person for the purpose of perfecting the constitution, and to deprive civil war of a leader. Therefore the malice of the privileged orders has given to Lafayette the name of gaoler; and yet his vigilance proves but one thing—his sincere desire to have a king.

From this period, parties began to assume a different character. The aristocracy, driven, as it were, from the protection of Louis XVI. and not being able to execute any enterprise in their own favour, dispersed themselves abroad in foreign countries, and the provinces. It is from this period that emigration commenced on a large scale. Great numbers of nobles fled to Turin, to the Count d'Artois, whose father-in-law afforded him an asylum. There their policy consisted in exciting the departments of the south to insurrection, and feigning that the king was not free. The queen, who was Austrian, and a decided enemy to the new court formed at Turin, turned her hopes towards Austria. The king, in the middle of these plots, saw every thing, prevented nothing, and awaited his preservation from whatever quarter it might come. Meantime he made the retractions required by the assembly; and in point of fact was no more really free, than he would have been at Turin or Coblenz, nay, not more than he would have been under Maurepas; for it is ever the fate of weakness to be dependant.

The popular party, henceforwards triumphant, was subdivided between the Duke of Orleans, Lafayette, Mirabeau, Barnave, and the Lametths. The public rumour accused the Duke of Orleans and Mirabeau of having been the authors of the last insurrection. Witnesses, who were not unworthy of credit declared that they saw the Duke and Mirabeau on the calamitous scene of action of the 6th of October. These facts were disproved afterwards;

but at the moment they were believed. The object of the conspirators was to make the king fly, and even to assassinate him, said the boldest calumniators. The Duke of Orleans, it was added, had aimed at the lieutenancy of the kingdom, and Mirabeau was to have been his minister. Neither of these projects having succeeded, Lafayette in appearing to have thwarted them by his presence, passed for the deliverer of the king, and as conqueror of the Duke of Orleans and Mirabeau. The court, who had not yet time to become ungrateful, acknowledged him as their deliverer, and at this period the power of the general appeared to be immense. The high patriots were startled, and already murmured the name of Cromwell. Mirabeau, who, as will be shortly seen, had no common interest with the Duke of Orleans, was jealous of Lafayette, and called him Cromwell Grandison. The aristocracy backed his suspicions, and added their imputations to his; but Lafayette was determined, in spite of all obstacles, to support the king and the constitution. For this purpose, he resolved to get rid of the Duke of Orleans, whose presence gave occasion to many reports, and might furnish, if not the means, at least the pretext, for further disturbances. He therefore had an interview with the prince, intimidated him by his firmness, and obliged him to consent to absent himself. The king, who took part in this project, pretended, with his usual weakness, to be forced to it; and in a letter to the Duke of Orleans, told him that it was necessary that either he or Mons. de Lafayette should retire; that in the present state of the public opinion the choice could not be doubtful, and that consequently he gave him a commission for England. It has since been ascertained, that Mons. de Montmorin, minister for foreign affairs, in order to free himself from the ambition of the Duke of Orleans, had directed him to the Netherlands, then in insurrection against Austria, and inspired him with hopes of the title of the Duke of Brabant*. His friends, when they heard of this determination, were indignant at his weakness. Being more ambitious than he was, they were unwilling that he should yield; and engaged Mirabeau to complain in the assembly of the violence which Lafayette practised against the prince. Mirabeau, already jealous of the popularity of the general, informed both him and the Duke that they would both be impeached at the tribune if the departure for England took place. The resolution of the Duke was shaken; but a new summons from Lafayette decided him; and Mirabeau, when he received in the assembly the note which announced the departure of the prince, cried out with indignation, He does not deserve the trouble which is taken for him†. This expression, and many others equally as inconsiderate, have caused him to be frequently accused of being one of the agents of the Duke of Orleans, although in reality he never was. His pecuniary distresses, his indiscreet language, his familiarity with the Duke of Orleans, (although he was on the same terms with every one else) his proposition in respect of the Spanish succession, and, finally, his opposition to the departure of the Duke, all naturally excited sus-pleion ; yet it is nevertheless true that Mirabeau was without any party, and even without any other object than that of the destruction of the aristocracy and arbitrary power.

The authors of these suppositions should have learnt, that Mirabeau was at that time obliged to borrow the most paltry sums, which certainly would not have been the case had he been the agent of a prince immensely rich, and who is supposed to have been nearly ruined by his partisans. Mirabeau had already a presentiment of the approaching dissolution of the state. A conversation which he held with an intimate friend, in the park of Versailles, which lasted nearly the whole night, determined him to adopt a plan entirely new ; and he resolved, for his own glory, for the safety of the state, and, finally, for the purpose of making his fortune, (for Mirabeau was a man who could attend to all these interests together,) to remain firm and immovable between the demagogues and the throne, and to consolidate the monarchy, by providing a place in it for himself. The court had endeavoured to gain him over, but made its attempts awkwardly, and without those suitable regards so necessary for a man of such lofty pride, and who was determined to preserve his popularity in lieu of that private esteem which his character could not command. Malouet, the friend of Necker, and allied by party to Mirabeau, endeavoured to bring about an interview between these two characters. Mirabeau, certain that he could never agree with the minister, frequently refused, but at last consented. Malouet introduced him, and the incompatibility of these two characters was still better understood after this interview, in which, as it was allowed by all present, Mirabeau displayed all the advantages he possessed in conversation as well as in the tribune. It was reported that he wished to have been bought, and that Necker, having made him no overture, he said as he went out, The minister shall hear from me. This again is a party interpretation, but it is false. Malouet had proposed to Mirabeau, who was known to be satisfied with the measure of liberty already acquired, his placing himself on a good footing with the minister, and nothing more. Besides, it was at this period, that a direct negotiation was entered into with the court. A foreign prince, allied with men of all parties, made the first overture. A friend of Mirabeau, who acted as go-between, gave the Court to understand that Mirabeau would sacrifice none of his principles ; but if the court were determined to adhere to the constitution, they would find in him a most unshaken support ; that, as to conditions, they were dictated by his situation ; that it was necessary, even for the interest of those who wished to employ him, to render his situation honourable and independent, that is to say, to pay his debts ; and that, finally, it was requisite to attach his interests to that of the new social compact, and without actually giving him the ministry, allow him to hope for it at some future time†. These negotiations were not entirely finished till two or three months after, that is, till the beginning of the year 1790. Some historians, uninformed of these details, and deceived by the perseverance of Mirabeau in opposing government, have fixed the time of this treaty at a later period. Nevertheless it was all but concluded about the commencement of 1790, which we will show in its place.

Barnave and the Lameths could only rival Mirabeau by a more disinterested patriotism ; being informed, therefore, of the negotiations which were carrying on, they gave credit to the report already afloat, that the ministry was about to be conferred upon him, resolved to deprive him of the power of accepting it. An opportunity of throwing an obstacle in his path to office very soon presented itself. Ministers were not allowed to speak in the assembly, and Mirabeau was not willing to lose, on arriving at that dignity, his right of speech, with him the most influential acquirement ; and besides, he wished to lead Necker to the tribune, that he might overwhelm him by his eloquence : he proposed, therefore, giving a deliberative voice to ministers. The popular party, in alarm, opposed him without assigning sufficient reasons, and appeared to fear ministerial corruptions ; but their fears were unfounded, for it is not by their public communication with the chambers that ministers generally corrupt the national representation. The proposition of Mirabeau was rejected, and Lanjuinais, pushing the severity of his principles still further, proposed prohibiting the admission of deputies to the ministry altogether. The discussion was violent. Although the motives of these propositions were known, they were not avowed ; and Mirabeau, to whom dissimulation was not possible, at length cried out, that it was not necessary on account of one man to take a measure fatal to the state ; that he would agree to the decree, on condition that admission to the ministry should be prohibited, not to all the actual deputies, but to Mons. de Mirabeau, deputy of the jurisdiction of Aix. Such frankness and boldness produced its effect, and the decree was unanimously adopted.

The division of the state parties between the emigrés, the queen, the king, and the several popular chiefs, such as Lafayette, Mirabeau, Barnave, and the Lameths, has already been shown. It was impossible that any decisive event, such as that of the 14th of July, or the 5th of October, could again occur for a long time. New disagreements between the court and the people, necessarily exasperated both parties, and led to a grand rupture.

The assembly had transferred itself to Paris*, after having received reiterated assurances of tranquillity on the part of the "commune," and the promise of perfect freedom in their debates. Monnier and Lally-Tolendal, indignant at the events of the 5th and 6th of October, had given in their resignation, saying, that they would neither be spectators nor accomplices of the crimes of faction. But they ought to have regretted this desertion of the public cause, especially when they saw Māury and Cazalès, after having been driven from the assembly, return to it immediately, to defend courageously and to the end, the cause which they had espoused. Monnier retired to Dauphiné, and assembled the states of the province; but they were soon unresistingly dissolved by a decree of the assembly. Thus Mounier and Lally, who at the period of the union of orders, and of the oath of the tennis court, (Jeu de Paume) were the heroes of the people, no longer possessed any degree of popularity. The parliaments had been the first who were pulled out by the power of the people; Mounier, Lally, and Necker were the second; and many others were soon to follow them.

The scarcity of provisions, an exaggerated but nevertheless real cause of the troubles which prevailed, occasioned the commission of a dreadful crime. A baker named François was murdered by some brigands; Lafayette succeeded in seizing the culprits, and delivered them to the Châtelet, which was invested with an extraordinary jurisdiction concerning all crimes which were caused by the revolution. There, Besenval, and all those who had been accused of taking a part in the conspiracy of the 14th July, were brought to trial. This court was conducted according to the new forms; till juries were established, the assembly had ordered publicity, a peremptory defence, and every form of procedure tending to protect innocence to be observed. The assassins of François were condemned; and the public tranquillity re-established. Lafayette and Bailly proposed putting in force martial law on this occasion. This was strongly opposed by Robespierre, who from this time became the constant apologist of the people and the poor; but the measure was nevertheless adopted by the majority*. By virtue of this law the municipalities were made responsible for the public tranquillity; in case of riots, they were empowered to call in the aid of the troops or the militia; and after three summonses were enabled to make use of military force against seditious meetings. A committee of inquiry was also established at the commune and in the national assembly, to watch over those numerous enemies whose stratagems beset them in all directions; and all these methods were not more than sufficient to thwart the host of adversaries who had conspired against the new revolution.

The labours of the assembly in the formation of a constitution were pursued with activity. They had abolished the feudal system, but there remained still to take final measures for the destruction of those great bodies, who had been as so many enemies constituted in a state to be in conflict with the state. The clergy enjoyed immense possessions. They had received them from princes under the title of feudal grants, and from the faithful under the title of legacies. If the property of individuals, the fruit and reward of labour, ought to be respected, that which had been bestowed on a body of men on conditions altogether different, ought to yield to the empire of the law. It was for the service of religion that they had been given, or at least under this pretext; but religion being a public service, the law might provide means of accomplishing this object in any way deemed most advantageous to the public interest. The abbé Maury, on this question, displayed his imperturbable genius; he sounded the alarm to proprietors, menacing them with an approaching invasion; and pretended to believe that the provinces would be sacrificed to the stock-jobbers of the capital. His sophism is sufficiently singular to be recorded. He said, that it was to pay the public debt that the property of the clergy was disposed of. The creditors of this debt were the great capitalists of Paris; the property to be devoted to their payment was in the provinces; and from hence this undaunted reasoner concluded that the provinces were to be sacrificed to the capital; as if the provinces did not, on the contrary, gain by a new division of those immense territories, reserved hitherto for the luxury of certain lazy ecclesiastics. All his efforts were useless; the Bishop of Autun, author of the proposition, and the deputy Thouret, overturned these vain sophistications. Already were the assembly about to decree, without further delay, that the goods of the clergy belonged to the state; nevertheless the opposers of the motion insisted on the question of property being more fully discussed. This question was met thus; admitting the right of property to be in the clergy, it was maintained that it might still be seized on by the state, as in periods of urgent necessity had often been done. This the ecclesiastics did not deny. Taking advantage, therefore, of this avowal, Mirabeau proposed that the word belong should be changed into are at the disposal of the state, and the discussion was terminated immediately by a great majority*. In this manner the assembly destroyed the formidable power of the clergy, and the luxury of the dignitaries of that order; and secured to itself those immense financial resources which so long supported the revolution. At the same time the inferior clergy were provided for, and it was enacted that their salaries should not be less than twelve hundred francs; and that besides, they should have the enjoyment of a parsonage-house and a garden. Religious vows were no longer sanctioned, and freedom was given to all cloisters, allowing, at the same time, to all who wished it, the liberty of continuing the monastic life. And inasmuch as their property was taken away, pensions were substituted. Pushing even their foresight still further, the assembly established a distinction between the rich and mendicant orders, and proportioned the provision of each to their former situations. They acted in the same manner with regard to the pensions granted to the clergy; and although the Jansenist, Camus, wishing to bring things back to their evangelical simplicity, proposed reducing them all to the same standard, which was excessively small, the assembly, on the motion of Mirabeau, reduced them only in a relative proportion to their actual value, having regard also to the former condition of the pensioners. Tenderness for the respective situations of all religious orders could not have been extended further, and it is in this feeling that true respect for property consists. In the same spirit, when the expatriated protestants, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, reclaimed their property, the assembly only restored that to them which remained unsold.

Although prudent and full of consideration for persons, the measures of the assembly were bold, particularly in constitutional matters. The prerogatives of the highest authorities were already fixed. The question of the division of the kingdom was the next that came forward. Hitherto it had been divided into provinces, which had been successively united to ancient France. These provinces, differing in laws, privileges, and manners, formed a most heterogeneous assembly. Sieyès conceived the idea of confounding them together by a new division, which would destroy all the ancient landmarks, and restore all parts of the kingdom to the same laws and the same principles. This was effected by the division into departments. The departments were divided into districts, and the districts into municipalities; and in all these sub-divisions, the right of representation was admitted. The administration of the departements, that of the districts, and that of the communes, were confided to one deliberating and another executive council, each of which was elective. These different authorities mutually aided each other, and had, in the extent of their jurisdiction, the same privileges. The departments regulated the subdivision of taxes among the districts, and the districts among the communes, and the communes among individuals.

The assembly then defined the quality of a citizen enjoying his political rights. To be constituted a citizen, in the full sense of the word, it was necessary to be twenty-five years of age, and to have contributed the silver mark. Every citizen possessing those qualifications, had the title of an active citizen, and those who had not were called passive citizens. These simple denominations were much ridiculed, for names are always attacked when things are to be depreciated; yet they were natural appellations, and expressed their signification very well. The active citizen took part in elections, either for the formation of administrations, or for that of the assembly. The elections of deputies had two divisions. No condition was necessary to be eligible; for as it was declared in the assembly, every man was an elector by his existence in society, and every one ought to be eligible solely by the confidence of the electors.

These proceedings, interrupted by a thousand discussions as to the details of the measure, were nevertheless hurried on with extreme activity. But the right side contributed nothing but their opposition to these acts, and were anxious only to lose no opportunity of disputing any accession of influence to the nation. The popular deputies, on the contrary, although forming different parties, united together or separated, following their own personal opinions, without mutual conflict. It was easy to perceive, that among them conviction governed their alliances. Thourét, Mirabeau, Dupont, Sieyès, Camus, and Chapelier, might be seen alternately supporting or opposing each other. As to the members of the nobility and clergy, they never shewed themselves except in party questions. If the provincial parliaments had passed decrees against the assembly or any writers attacked it, they stepped forward immediately in their defence. They supported the military commanders against the people, and the negro merchants against the negroes. They voted against the admission of Jews and protestants to the enjoyment of the common rights of the citizen; and finally, when Genoa rose against France, on account of the emancipation of Corsica, and the junction of that island to the kingdom, they were for Genoa against France. In a word, being estranged from and indifferent to all useful discussions, they paid no attention to them, but conversed among themselves whilst such discussions lasted, and never rose but when the rights or liberties of the nation were to be opposed*.

We have already stated that it was no longer in the power of the royal party to concert any grand conspiracy, since aristocracy had been put to flight, and the court was surrounded by the assembly, the people, and the national militia. Partial operations therefore were all that the malcontents could effect. They fomented the discontent of those officers who were attached to the ancient order of things, whilst their soldiers, who expected to profit by any change, favoured the new. Violent quarrels frequently happened between the army and the populace, and the soldiers several times delivered up their officers to the fury of the multitude, who butchered them; sometimes, however, on other occasions, jealousies were happily pacified, and peace entirely restored when the commandants of cities had been cautious enough to use a little address, and had taken the oath of fidelity to the new constitution. The clergy inundated Brittany with protestations against the alienation of their property; and endeavoured to rekindle the dormant fanaticism of those provinces where ancient superstition still prevailed. The provincial parliaments were also resorted to, and the effect of a last effort of their authority tried. They were now on the eve of a final dissolution, and to avoid all contest with them, the assembly had prorogued their recesses; in the meanwhile justice was administered by the vacation chambers. In spite, however, of this precaution, the parliaments of Rouen, Nantes, and Rennes met, and passed decrees, in which they deplored the ruin of the ancient monarchy, and the violation of the laws, and without attributing these grievances to any particular party, seemed to point their censures against the assembly. They were called to the bar of the assembly, and mildly reproved. The parliament of Rennes, as the most culpable, was declared incapable of fulfilling its functions. That of Metz had insinuated that the king was not a free agent. This, as we have before shewn, was the policy of the discontented: not being able to avail themselves of the king's person, they represented him as in a state of duress, and the acts to which he had given his consent as of no validity. He himself seemed to second this policy. He still remained guarded by the national militia; and knowing himself in perfect safety under their protection, intentionally neglected to recall his body guard; his policy was to appear in captivity. This stratagem, however, was entirely defeated by the commune of Paris, who solicited him to recall his life guard. This he refused to do under vain pretences, through the interference of the queen†.

The year 1790 was now on the point of commencing, and a general agitation pervaded all ranks of society. Three months had quietly enough elapsed since the 5th and 6th of October, but the troublesome state of the nation seemed to be renewed. Great agitations were followed by periods of tranquillity, and these by petty events leading to a still more momentous crisis. The clergy, the nobility, the court, and even England, who ordered her ambassador to justify her, were accused of being the authors of these troubles. The paid companies of the national guard were themselves tainted with the general dissatisfaction. Some soldiers who had met at the Champs Elysées demanded an augmentation of pay; Lafayette, with his usual activity and firmness, quickly dispersed and punished them, and re-established order among his troops, who, in spite of these slight interruptions of discipline, were always faithful to him.

But the public mind at this period was chiefly occupied with the conspiracy of the Marquis de Favras against the assembly and the municipality. He was openly arrested and delivered over to the Châtelet. A report was immediately propagated that Bailly and Lafayette were to have been assassinated; that twelve hundred cavalry were ready at Versailles to carry off the king; and that an army, composed of Swiss and Piedmontese, were to receive him, and then march upon Paris. The alarm spread wide; it was said that Favras was only the secret agent of still more exalted personages. Suspicion attached to Monsieur, the brother of the king; Favras had been in his guards, and had besides negotiated a loan on his account. Monsieur being intimidated by the public indignation, presented himself at the Hotel de Ville, explained his connections with Favras, dwelt upon those dispositions so favourable to the people, which he had formerly manifested in the assembly of the notables, and begged to be judged of, not by the public reports, but by his known and undeniable patriotism*. His discourse was received with great applause, and the multitude carried him home in triumph.

The trial of Favras was still continued. This person had travelled all over Europe, married a foreign princess, and entered into many projects to re-establish a broken fortune. He had made some attempts, with this intention, on the 14th of July, the 5th and 6th of October, and in the concluding months of 1789. The witnesses who accused him, stated the particulars of his last plan. The assassination of Bailly and Lafayette, and the carrying off the king, appeared to make part of it; but there was no proof as to the twelve hundred cavalry who had been got for this occasion, nor that the Swiss and Piedmontese army had been in motion. Circumstances, however, were unfavourable to Favras. The Châtelet had just enlarged Besenval and others, implicated in the plot of the 14th of July, which occasioned great public dissatisfaction. Nevertheless Lafayette endeavoured to remove the apprehensions of the judges of the Châtelet, called upon them to be just, and promised them, that let their sentence be what it would, he would ensure its execution.

This trial renewed the suspicions of the nation against the court. These new designs made it appear incorrigible; it was manifest, that even in the very heart of the metropolis conspiracies from the royal quarter still continued to be carried on. To avoid the public suspicion, therefore, the king was advised to take some decisive step on the occasion, and to put his favourable dispositions to the people beyond the reach of doubt. On the 4th of February, 1790, the assembly were astonished to see many changes in the arrangement of the chamber. A carpet, in which lilies were interwoven, covered all the steps to the table (bureau). The chairs of the secretaries were placed in a lower situation than usual, and the president stood by the side of a seat where he usually sat. Suddenly the door-keepers announced the king; and Louis XVI. entered the chamber the instant after. The assembly rose at his presence, and he was received in the midst of applauses. A crowd of spectators rushed rapidly in, occupied the galleries, filled every corner of the chamber, and awaited with the greatest impatience the royal address. Louis XVI. spoke standing, while the assembly sat. He spoke first of the troubles to which France had fallen a prey, the efforts which had been made to calm them, and to provide subsistence for the people; he recapitulated the proceedings of the assembly, glancing at the efforts he himself had made to attain the same objects in the provincial assemblies; and he showed, finally, that he had all along manifested a desire for those measures which had been lately adopted. He added, that he thought it particularly incumbent on him to ally himself more closely to the representatives of the nation, at the moment when decrees had been submitted to him, destined to establish a new system of government in the kingdom. He would endeavour to promote, he said, with all his ability, the success of this vast organization; and declared that every attempt against it should be considered by him as highly criminal, and punished by every legal means. At these words, plaudits resounded through the chamber. The king continued his speech; and noticing the sacrifices he himself had made, he called upon all those who had lost any of their privileges to imitate his resignation, and to consider themselves indemnified for their losses by the advantages which would accrue to France from the new constitution. After having promised to defend the constitution, he added, that he would go still further, and that, in concert with the queen, he would early instil into his son a love for the new system of government, and habituate him to expect his happiness from the happiness of France. At these words, exclamations of devotion burst from all parts; every hand was stretched towards the monarch, and every voice demanded the queen and her son; these transports of joy were universal. The king finally terminated his discourse, recommending concord and peace to that good people, the assurance of whose love could console him in the midst of his calamities*. These last words called forth bursts of grateful acclamations from all present. The president made a short answer to the king's speech, in which all the distracted feelings which prevailed in the assembly were well described. The king was carried in triumph to the Tuilleries by the multitude, and the assembly passed a vote of thanks to him and the queen. A new consideration presented itself: the king had just promised to maintain the constitution; this was an appeal to the deputies to enter into the like engagement on their part. The civic oath was proposed, and every deputy swore to be faithful to the nation, the law, and the king, and to maintain to the utmost of his power the constitution as decreed by the national assembly, and accepted by the king. The commissioners of supply, and the deputies of commerce asked to take their oath in their turn; the galleries and amphitheatres imitated them; and from all sides nothing was heard but these words—I swear it.

* See note 14 in the Appendix.

* See note 15 in the Appendix.

This oath was repeated at the Hotel de Ville and from commune to commune throughout France. Public rejoicings were ordered, and the effusion of joy appeared general and sincere. This was the time undoubtedly to commence a new line of conduct, and not to nullify this reconciliation as all the previous reconciliations had been; but on that very evening, whilst Paris was illuminated in celebration of the happy event, the court had resumed its old state of feeling, and the popular deputies met with a reception at the palace far different from that experienced by the deputies of the nobles. In vain Lafayette, whose advice, full of good sense and zeal, had not been followed, repeated every day at court, that it was no longer time to hesitate, that the king should attach himself entirely to the popular party, and be determined on gaining its confidence; that for this purpose it was not only necessary to proclaim his intentions at the assembly, but to manifest them in the smallest actions; that he should receive with indignation every proposition of the least equivocal signification, and repel every doubt intimated of the sincerity of his intentions; that he should neither show constraint or discontent, and leave no shadow of hope to the aristocracy; and that, finally, his ministers ought to be united to, and not be in controversy with, the assembly, and so oblige it continually to have recourse to the public opinion. In vain did Lafayette repeat this prudent advice, with the most respectful earnestness. The king highly esteemed him, and received his letters as tokens of regard. The queen, however, rejected them with ill-temper, and even appeared offended with the general. She received in a much more gracious manner Mirabeau, whose manners were more captivating, but whose life certainly was less irreproachable than Lafayette's.

The communications of Mirabeau with the court continued. He had even entered into some negotiations with Monsieur, whose opinions rendered him more accessible to the popular party, and he expressed to him that which he ceased not to repeat to the queen and to Mons. de Montmorin, that the monarchy could only be saved by liberty. Mirabeau finally settled his negotiations with the court, by means of a go-between. He declared his principles in a kind of confession of faith; declared he would never swerve from them; and promised to support the court so long as it maintained the same line of conduct. In return, the court granted him sufficiently advantageous terms. Morality undoubtedly condemns such negotiations, and demands the performance of duty for its own sake. But did Mirabeau sell himself? A weak man would have sold himself, without doubt, by sacrificing his principles; but the powerful Mirabeau, far from sacrificing his, brought the court to embrace them, and received from it, in exchange, that assistance, which his pressing wants, and his disorganized passions, rendered indispensable for him. Unlike those who sell at a great price feeble talents and cowardly conscience, Mirabeau, firm to his principles, opposed alternately his party and the court, as if he did not depend upon the first for his popularity, and upon the second for the means of his existence. He carried his opposition to such an extent, that many historians, not believing that he was allied to the court which he opposed, have fixed the time of his negotiation in the year 1791, which however was nevertheless in the first months of 1790. Mirabeau, immediately after this negotiation, was presented to the queen, who was charmed by his superiority, and gave him a welcome which flattered him extremely. This extraordinary man was open to all pleasurable sensations; as well those of vanity as those of the passions. It was necessary to make use both of his strength and weakness, and employ him for the advantage of the common cause. Besides Lafayette and Mirabeau, the court still possessed Bouillé, whom it is now time should be introduced to the reader.

Bouillé, courageous, upright, and full of talent, identified himself with the prejudiced of the aristocracy, and was only distinguished from other members of that body by a greater liberality of mind, and greater skill in business. Having retired to Metz, and being there commandant of a vast extent of frontier, and of a great part of the army, he endeavoured to sow discord between his troops and the national guard, that he might keep his soldiers faithful to the court*. Placed there, as it were, on the watch, he alarmed the popular party, and appeared the general of the monarchy, as Lafayette was of the constitution. Nevertheless, being displeased with the conduct of the aristocracy, and disgusted with the weakness of the king, he had intended to resign his command, but was induced by the pressing entreaties of the king to retain it. Bouillé was a most honourable man. His oath being once taken, he devoted himself to serve the king and the constitution. The object of the court, therefore should have been to unite Lafayette, Mirabeau, and Bouillé. By this means it would have possessed the national guards, the assembly, and the army, that is, the three dominant powers of the time. It is true, there were some private causes which disunited these three personages. Lafayette, full of good will to all, was ready to go hand in hand with any one, who desired to serve the king and the constitution; but Mirabeau was jealous of his power, and feared the purity of his life, so extolled, and which seemed to reproach him. Bouillé hated the high-minded conviction with which Lafayette maintained his opinions, and, perhaps, considered him an irreproachable enemy; he preferred Mirabeau, whom he thought more manageable, and less rigorous in his political faith. It should have been the business of the court to unite these three men, by destroying their particular motives of alienation. But there was only one method of doing this, viz. by a free monarchy. The king should therefore have resigned himself up to it without hesitation, and have promoted it with all his ability. But being in a continual state of uncertainty, without absolutely repelling Lafayette, he received him coldly; paid Mirabeau, who alternately opposed and supported him; encouraged the dislike of Bouillé against the revolution; looked to Austria with hope, and concerted the emigration to Turin. Such is the character of weakness: it looks out for outlets of hope, instead of commanding success; and brings ruin on itself, by giving rise to suspicions, which irritate parties quite as much as would the reality itself, for it is better to strike at once than play the swaggerer.

In vain did Lafayette, who wished to do that which the court left undone, write to his relation, Bouillé, to persuade him to serve the throne in conjunction with himself; and by the only means possible, those which freedom and liberty suggested. Bouillé, under the evil instigation of the court, answered him coldly, and in an evasive manner; and without attempting any thing against the constitution, still continued to render himself formidable by the secrecy of his intentions, and the strength of his army.

The reconciliation of the 4th of February, which ought to have had such important effects, was therefore vain and useless. The trial of Favras was concluded; the Châtelet, either through fear of the people, or real conviction, found him guilty, and sentenced him to be hung. This unfortunate man displayed in his last moments a firmness more worthy of a martyr than a conspirator. He protested his innocence, and requested permission to make a declaration of it before his death. His scaffold was placed on the Place de Grève. He was conducted to the Hotel de Ville, where he remained till the night. The people longed to see a marquess hung; and waited with impatience for this example of equality of punishments. Favras confessed that he had had communications with a grandee of the state, who had persuaded him to gain over the affections of the people to favour the king; and as it was necessary to incur some expenses, that this grandee had given him a hundred louis, which he had accepted of. He declared that his crime terminated here, but mentioned no names. Meanwhile, he asked if the publication of the names of the parties could save him, but the answer he received not satisfying him, "In that case," said he, "I shall die with my secret;" and he advanced towards the place of execution with great firmness. The night was perfectly dark, but up to the gibbet itself there was torch light. The people rejoiced at this spectacle, and were delighted to find that equality extended even to the scaffold. They indulged their cruelty in atrocious raileries, and made the execution of the unfortunate Favras the subject of several brutal songs. His body was given to his family; and new events soon obliterated the recollection of his death from the minds both of those who had punished, and those who had employed him.

The clergy, now driven to desperation, employed themselves in exciting petty disturbances all over France. The nobility had great expectations from their influence over the minds of the people. Whilst the assembly contented itself with placing their property at the disposition of the nation, they still hoped that the execution of the decree would never take place; and to render it needless, devised a thousand measures for providing for the necessities of the treasury. The abbé Maury suggested a tax upon all articles of luxury, and the abbé de Salsède answered him by proposing that no ecclesiastic should have an income of more than a thousand crowns. The rich abbé was silenced by such a proposition. On another occasion, in the discussion of the national debt, Cazalès proposed examining, not only the validity of the titles of each debt, but the debts themselves, their origin and consideration; which was in effect to renew the national bankruptcy, by the odious means so often resorted to by the intemperately zealous chambers. The clergy, being enemies of the state-creditors, to whom they fancied themselves sacrificed, supported this motion, in spite of the severity of their principles with regard to property; and Maury was so carried away by the violence of his passions, that he failed in proper respect for the assembly, declaring that some of its members only possessed that courage which springs from shame. The assembly were offended, and meditated expelling him; but Mirabeau, although he might have applied this attack to himself, represented to his colleagues, that every deputy belonged to his constituents, and that, consequently, they had not the right of expelling any one. This moderation displayed true superiority, and consequently succeeded; Maury was more effectually punished by a censure than he would have been by exclusion. All these expedients, devised by the clergy for substituting the state creditors for themselves, came to nought; the assembly decreed the sale of the value of 400 million francs of demesne and church territory. The clergy, now losing all hope, scattered pamphlets among the people, in which they spread the report that the project of the revolutionists was to attack the catholic religion. It was in the provinces of the south that they hoped to obtain the greatest success. It has been seen that the first emigrations were directed towards Turin. With Languedoc, therefore, and Provence, they kept up their principal communications. Caloine, so celebrated under the notables, was the minister of the fugitive court. It was split between two parties; the object of the greater nobility was to maintain their own power, and they dreaded the intervention of the provincial nobility, and above all of the citizens. Therefore they did not wish to have recourse to foreign aid for the re-establishment of the throne. Moreover, to make use of the pretext of religion, as the emissaries of the provinces had suggested, appeared ridiculous to those who, during the whole of that century, had been accustomed to amuse themselves with the witticisms of Voltaire. The other party, composed of the lesser nobility and expatriated citizens, conceived the idea of opposing the desire of liberty by a still stronger passion, that of fanaticism; and to gain the victory by their sole endeavours, without placing themselves at the mercy of a stranger. The former endeavoured to exclude the intervention of foreigners, on the plea of the horrible personalities of civil war. The latter maintained that a civil war allowed the spilling of blood, but that it did not follow as a matter of inevitable consequence, that it was to be identified with treason. It was impossible, however, for these latter, who were not only more courageous, more patriotic, but more ferocious, to succeed in a court where Calonne was to preside. Nevertheless, as no assistance was to be neglected at this period, the communications between Turin and the south provinces were still continued. It was at last decided, that the revolution should at the same time be attacked by a foreign and also civil war, and to forward this last purpose, the ancient fanaticism of the south provinces was rekindled by every possible means *.

The clergy neglected nothing to second this plan. The protestants of the south provinces excited the jealousy of the catholics. The clergy took advantage of these feelings, especially at the solemnities of Easter; and at Montpellier, Nîmes, and Montauban, the ancient fanaticism was effectually revived.

Charles Lameth complained that the solemnities of Easter were abused by the priests; and that they endeavoured to excite the opposition of the people against the new laws. At these words, the clergy made a movement, as if for the purpose of quitting the assembly. The bishop of Clermont threatened to do so; and a great number of ecclesiastics, already on their legs, were on the point of departing, when Charles Lameth was called to order, and order was restored. In the meantime, the sale of the church property was proceeded with; this had greatly embittered their feelings; and they lost no opportunity of showing their resentment. Dom-Gerle, a Carthusian friar, sincere both in his religious and patriotic feelings, one day requested to be heard, and then proposed declaring that the catholic religion should be the only religion of the state†. Many deputies immediately acceded to this proposition, and wished to vote it by acclamation, saying, that the present was the time for the assembly to clear itself from the reproach which had been cast upon it, of attacking the catholic religion. Nevertheless, what object could such a proposition have? Either the proposed decree must give a privilege to the catholic religion, which no religion ought to possess, or it was a declaration of a matter of fact, that the majority of the French nation were catholic; but this fact had no need of declaration. Such a proposition, therefore, could not be received. In spite, then, of all the efforts of the nobility and clergy to hurry on the question, the debate was adjourned till the next day. On this day, the assembly was unusually crowded, and surrounded by throngs who could not obtain admittance; Lafayette, being informed that some malcontents had determined to excite disturbances, doubled the guard. The debate was opened; one priest threatened the assembly with ecclesiastical malediction; Maury bellowed forth his accustomed exclamations. Menou answered all their reproaches with the utmost calmness, and declared that the assembly could not be reasonably accused of wishing to abolish the catholic religion, at the very time when it was placing the expenses of its worship among those of the state. He then proposed passing to the order of the day. Dom-Gerle, convinced of his error, withdrew his motion, and expressed his regret at having been the cause of so much tumult. Mons. de Laroche-foucauld placed the same question in a new light, and his motion succeeded to that of Menou. But suddenly a member of the right side rose up, and complaining that he was under constraint, challenges Lafayette, and asks of him why he had doubled the guard. His motive in this was not suspected; for it was not the left side who could dread the people, and it was not his friends that Lafayette sought to protect. This question augmented the disorder; the debate however was not discontinued. During the debate, an act of Louis XIV. was cited: "I am not astonished," exclaimed Mirabeau, "that that reign is cited, in which the edict of Nantes was revoked; but from this very tribune whence I speak, I perceive the fatal window from which a king, the assassin of his people, mixing his worldly interests with those of religion, gave the signal for the massacre of Saint Bartholomew!" This terrible apostrophe did not terminate the discussion, which was still prolonged. The proposition of the duke de Laroche-foucauld was finally adopted. The assembly declared that their sentiments on this subject were well known, but that out of respect for liberty of conscience, they neither could nor ought to deliberate upon the proposition which had been submitted to them.

A few days had hardly elapsed, when a fresh plan was devised to overawe and dissolve the assembly. The new organization of the kingdom having been accomplished, the people were about to be summoned upon the election of their magistrates, and it was suggested that they should nominate fresh deputies at the same time, to replace those who composed the present assembly. This measure had been proposed and debated once before, and had been repelled. It was again revived in April 1790. Some of the papers had limited the powers to one year, and in fact it was nearly a year since the assembly had met; it opened in May 1789, and April 1790 was close at hand. Although these papers had been annulled, yet the assembly had entered into an engagement not to separate till a constitution was established: these men, for whom there had been neither act passed, or oath taken, when they set about fulfilling the very object of their election, proposed to choose other deputies, and to give place to them. Maury, who took upon himself the task of enforcing this motion, acquitted himself with his usual boldness, and more than his ordinary address. He appealed to the sovereignty of the people, and said, that the assembly could no longer occupy the place of the nation, and prolong the possession of those powers which were only temporary. He wished to be informed by what title the assembly were invested with sovereign attributes; he maintained that the distinction between the legislative and constituent power was a chimerical distinction; that a sovereign convention could not exist except in the absence of all government; and that if the assembly was this convention, it had only to depose the king, and declare the throne vacant. Loud exclamations interrupted these expressions, and manifested the general indignation. Mirabeau then rose up. "Information is required," said he, "as to how long since it is when the deputies of the people became the national convention? I answer, since the day when they found the entrance of the chamber blocked up by soldiers, and they betook themselves to the first place where they could assemble, and in that place to take an oath rather to perish than betray or abandon the rights of the nation. Our powers, whatever they might originally have been, have changed in their nature from that day; and whatever may be the powers we have exercised, our efforts and labours have rendered them lawful, and the consent of the whole nation has sanctified them. You all recollect the expression of that great man of antiquity who had neglected legal forms to save his country. Being summoned by a factious assembly to declare if he had observed the laws, he replied, 'I swear that I have saved my country.' Gentlemen," then exclaimed Mirabeau, addressing himself to the deputies, "I swear that you have saved France!"

"This spirit-stirring adjuration," says Ferrières, "carried away the whole assembly, as if by sudden inspiration; the discussion was closed, it was decreed that the electoral convocations should not elect new deputies."

Thus this new device was frustrated, and the assembly were enabled to continue their labours. But the disturbances throughout France were by no means abated. The commandant De Voisin was murdered by the people; the forts of Marseilles were carried by the national guard; movements of a contrary description took place at Nîmes and Montauban. The delegates from Turin had excited the Roman catholics. They presented addresses, in which they declared the monarchy to be in danger, and demanded that the Roman catholic religion should be declared the only religion of the state. It was in vain that a royal proclamation answered them; they replied. The protestants now came to close quarters with the Catholics, and the latter, waiting in vain for the aid which had been promised them from Turin, were at last overthrown. Many regiments of national guards put themselves in motion to assist the patriots against the rebels; the struggle was thus commenced, and the Viscount de Mirabeau, the declared adversary of his illustrious brother, in announcing civil war from the tribune, appeared, by his gestures and words, to threaten the assembly with its consequences.

Thus, whilst the most moderate party of the deputies endeavoured to appease the revolutionary ardour, an indiscreet opposition excited a fever which tranquillity might have subdued, and furnished the popular orators with the most powerful pretext for violence. The clubs now became more extravagant than ever. That of the Jacobins, the offspring of the Breton club, which was first established at Versailles, and afterwards at Paris, by its superiority in number, talents, and violence, took the lead of all the others*. Its sittings were regulated in the same manner as those of the assembly; all the questions which were discussed by the former were taken up by the latter; its anticipated decisions were published, which even at this time informed legislators themselves how they were to act. There indeed the principal popular members of the assembly were accustomed to meet, and there it was that the most opinionated found strength and exciting influences. Lafayette, to oppose the terrible influence of this association, in concert with Bailly and some of the most enlightened citizens, formed another club, first called the 89, afterwards the Feuillans†. But this expedient was feeble; an association of a hundred calm and enlightened men could never appeal to the mob as the Jacobins did. Forcefully to prohibit such associations was the only method of destroying their influence; but the court possessed too little sincerity, and inspired too much suspicion, for the popular party to think of employing this remedy. The Lameths ruled supreme in the Jacobin club. Mirabeau attended both; it was evident to all that his place was between the two parties. An occasion soon presented itself in which the part he intended to play was more clearly developed, and in which he gained a memorable advantage for the monarchy, as we shall presently observe.

* This club, called the Friends of the Constitution, was transferred to Paris in October, 1789, and was known at that time by the name of the Jacobin Club, (Club de Jacobins), because they held their meetings in a hall of the Convent of Jacobins, in the Rue St. Honoré.

STATE OF POLITICS AND INCLINATIONS OF FOREIGN POWERS IN 1790—DEBATES UPON THE RIGHT OF MAKING WAR AND PEACE—INTRODUCTION OF PAPER MONEY, OR ASSIGNATS—JUDICIAL ORGANIZATION—CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY—ABOLITION OF TITLES OF HONOUR—ANNIVERSARY OF THE 14TH JULY—FEEL OF THE FIRST FEDERATION—MUTINY OF THE MILITARY AT NANCY—RETIREMENT OF NECKER—THE CAMP AT JALLÉS FORMED—OATH OF CIVISM DIRECTED TO BE TAKEN BY ECCLESIASTICS.

At the period to which we have now arrived the French revolution began to attract the regard of foreign sovereigns; its language was so elevated and so firm, that it possessed a character of universality which seemed to render it not unsuited to other nations, so much so that foreign potentates began to fear its attraction. They had looked upon it at first as a passing insurrection, but the success of the assembly, its firmness, and unexpected perseverance, and above all the ultimate object which it had in view, not only for France, but for all other nations, drew upon it the attention and hatred of foreign potentates, and entitled it to the honour of consideration from foreign cabinets. Europe was then divided into two grand hostile confederacies; the Anglo-Prussian confederacy on one side, and the imperial courts on the other.

Frederick William had succeeded the great Frederick to the throne of Prussia. This feeble and fluctuating prince, renouncing the policy of his illustrious predecessors, had abandoned the alliance of France for that of England; United to this power, he formed that famous Anglo-Prussian league, which attempted such great things, and executed nothing; which raised up Sweden, Poland, and the Porte in arms against Russia and Austria; abandoned all those it had excited, and contributed even to despoil them by the partition of Poland.

The joint object of England and Prussia had been to ruin Russia and Austria in stirring up Sweden, then governed by the chivalrous Gustavus; Poland, still suffering from the effects of her first partition; and the Porte, harassed by Russian invasions. The real object of England, in this league, was to take vengeance on France for the assistance she had afforded the American colonies, without expressly declaring war with her. By promoting war between the Russians and Turks, this was accomplished: for France could not remain neuter between these two nations without alienating the Turks (who counted on her assistance), and losing all commercial power in the Levant. On the other hand, by taking part in the war, she lost the alliance with Russia, with whom she was about concluding a treaty highly advantageous to France, and which would have secured to her timber and all those articles of commerce in reference to shipping, which the North so plentifully supplies. Meanwhile England prepared her forces, and put them in readiness for employment in case it should be necessary. But observing the disorder of the finances under the notables, and the popular disturbances under the constituent assembly, she altered her plan of operations, and preferred ruining France by means of its intestine troubles than by the force of arms. This was generally believed to be the motive of England's policy at this period; therefore it is, that she has been accused of fomenting the disorders of the nation.

This Anglo-Prussian league caused its ministers to engage in several battles, with tolerably even success. Gustavus came out of the contest, in which he had engaged merely as an adventurer, as a hero. Holland, which was in a state of insurrection, had been forced to submit to the stadtholder, by the intrigues of England and the arms of Prussia. Thus, the skilful policy of England had deprived France of a powerful maritime alliance; and the Prussian monarch only sought for such success as might gratify his vanity and avenge an outrage perpetrated by the states of Holland against the wife of the stadtholder, who was his own sister. Poland, having settled its internal constitution, took up arms. Turkey had been beaten by Russia. But the sudden death of Joseph the second, emperor of Austria, which happened in January, 1790, changed the face of events. The enlightened and pacific Leopold, whose happy reign was blessed by the whole of Tuscany, succeeded him. Leopold, with as much skill as prudence, attempted to put an end to the war; and to accomplish his object, endeavoured to seduce the fickle imagination of Frederick William. He represented to that prince the sweets of repose, the evils of war, which had so long afflicted his people, and, finally, the dangers of the French revolution, which proclaimed such fatal principles. He awakened in his mind dormant ideas of absolute power, and even made him conceive the hope of chastising the French revolutionists as he had those of Holland. Frederick William allowed himself to be seduced by these representations at the very moment when he was about to reap the advantages of the confederacy, which had been so daringly conceived by his minister Hertzberg. It was in July 1790, that the peace was signed at Reichenbach. In August, Russia also made peace with Gustavus, and was now only at war with Poland, by no means very formidable, and with the Turks, who were beaten in every encounter. We shall enlarge on these events by-and-by. The attention of these several powers had for its object the closely watching the progress of the French revolution.

Some time before the peace between Prussia and Leopold, while yet the Anglo-Prussian league menaced the two imperial courts, and was directed secretly against France as well as Spain, our constant and faithful ally, some English ships were seized in Nootka Sound by Spanish vessels. The most indignant remonstrances were urged against this capture, and were followed by a general naval armament in all the ports of England. Upon this, Spain, according to the articles of treaty, demanded aid from France, and Louis XVI. ordered the equipment of fifteen vessels. England was accused on this occasion of endeavouring to augment our embarrassments. The clubs of London, it is true, had many times complimented the national assembly, and the English government allowed a few philanthropists to indulge in their philosophical flow of soul; but, at the same time, paid, it was said, those demagogues, who to the astonishment of all, suddenly re-appeared every where, and cost the national guard of the kingdom so much trouble to suppress the riots they excited. These disturbances were greatly increased at the moment of the general armament, and it was impossible not to observe some connexion between the threats of England and the renewal of internal discord. Above all, Lafayette, who spoke but little in the assembly, except on subjects which concerned the public tranquillity, declared, at the tribune, that he believed there was some secret influence which excited the people to outrages. "I cannot help pointing out to the assembly," said he, "this new and combined insurrection, which reaches from Strasbourg to Nîmes, from Brest to Toulon, and which the enemies of the people would without purpose attribute to them, since it carries with it all the appearance of secret influence. If we endeavour to establish peace in the departments, the country is laid waste. If neighbouring powers take arms, disorder is immediately spread in our ports and arsenals." Many commandants had in fact been murdered; and were it by chance or design, our best naval officers had been the victims. The English ambassador was ordered by his government to rebut these imputations; but we know very well the credit which such messages deserve. Calonne had also written to the king* to justify England, but Calonne, when speaking in favour of a foreigner, exposed himself to distrust. He said, but in vain, that every expense of a representative government was known, that even the secret service money was avowed as such, and that there was no item of this kind in the English budget. But experience has shown that responsible ministers are never destitute of the command of money. The argument in favour of England is, that time which discovers every thing, in respect to this accusation has developed nothing, and that Necker, who had the means of forming a correct judgment, never believed in any secret influence*.

The king, as we have just seen, had notified to the assembly the equipment of fifteen sail of the line, conceiving, he said, that they would approve of this measure, and vote the necessary supplies. The assembly received this message with the greatest good temper, but perceived in it a constitutional question, which they thought should be settled before they answered the king. "The measures have been already taken," said Alexander Lameth, "our discussion, therefore, cannot retard them; it therefore first becomes necessary to ascertain to whom the right of making peace or war belongs, whether to the king or the assembly." In truth, this was nearly the last prerogative of importance to be settled, and one of those which excited the most lively interest. The popular imagination was so pre-occupied with the errors of courts, and their alternations of ambition and weakness, that it was generally desired that the king should not have the power either of plunging the nation into dangerous wars, or dishonouring it by pusillanimities. Nevertheless, of all acts of government, the responsibility of making peace or war is one which mostly consists in action, and necessarily belongs to the executive authority. To ensure, therefore, a voluntary and able execution of such measures, great latitude and liberty should be allowed to him with whom they are entrusted. The opinion of Mirabeau on this question, who was said to have been gained over by the court, was pronounced beforehand. The present occasion was a favourable one for depriving this orator of his so much envied popularity. The Lameths perceived it, and incited Barnave to bear down Mirabeau. The right side of the chamber stood aloof, as it were, and left the field open to these two rivals.

The debate was anxiously looked for and commenced†. After a few speakers had launched some preliminary ideas, Mirabeau was heard, and he put the case altogether in a new light. War, he said, was almost always unforeseen; hostilities preceded threats. It was the duty of the king, who was charged with the maintenance of public safety, to repel them; and thus the war commenced before the assembly could intervene. The case was the same with respect to treaties: the king alone could seize upon the proper moment for negotiation, conference, or disputation with foreign powers; the assembly could do no more than ratify the conditions which were obtained. In both cases the king only could act, and the assembly approve or disapprove. Mirabeau, therefore, proposed that the executive power should be confined to the ratification of hostilities already commenced; and that the legislative power should, according to circumstances, either permit the continuation of war, or require peace. This opinion was applauded, as the opinions of Mirabeau always were. Nevertheless Barnave replied, and passing over other speakers, answered no one but Mirabeau. He agreed that the sword was often drawn before the nation could be consulted, but maintained that hostilities were not war, and that the king should repel them, and immediately inform the assembly, which then, as sovereign, would declare its intentions. Therefore the whole distinction is purely verbal; for Mirabeau gave to the assembly the right of disapproving of war, and requiring peace; Barnave, that of declaring both the one and the other: but, in both cases, the will of the assembly was obligatory, and Barnave gave it no more latitude than Mirabeau; yet for all this Barnave was applauded, and carried in triumph by the people, whilst it was reported that his adversary had sold himself, and a pamphlet was hawked about the streets of Paris, intitled The High Treason of Count de Mirabeau. The moment was decisive. Every one expected a terrible effort from this redoubtable champion; he demanded the liberty of reply, and having obtained it, ascended the tribune in the midst of an immense crowd who had collected, together to hear him, and declared that he would either descend it dead or victorious. "I also," said he, in the commencement of his speech, "have been carried in triumph, and nevertheless to-day the people cry out, The High Treason of the Count de Mirabeau. I had not need of this example to know that there is but one step from the Capitol to the Tarpeian rock. But these falls from the greatest height to the lowest depth shall not arrest me in my career." After this impressive exordium, he declared that he should only reply to Barnave, and that from the commencement. "Explain yourself," said he; "you have, in your opinion, reduced the king to the mere notification of hostilities already commenced, and you have given to the assembly alone the right of declaring, in this instance, the national will. On this point I stop you short, and refer you to our established principles, which divide the expression of the national will between the king and the assembly. By attributing this singly to the assembly, you have violated the constitution; I call you to order. —You cannot answer.—I continue."

There was, in fact, nothing to rejoin to this; Barnave remained exposed during a long reply to this thundering rhetoric. Mirabeau answered him article by article, and showed that his adversary had given nothing more to the assembly than he had given himself; but that, in reducing the king to a simple declaration, he had deprived him of his necessary assent to the expression of the national will. He finished at last, by reproaching Barnave with having excited a criminal rivalry between men who ought to live together as true companions in arms. Barnave had enumerated the partisans of his opinion; Mirabeau, therefore, enumerated his in turn, and pointed out among them those moderate men who were the first founders of the constitution, and who had maintained liberty for the French; whilst their vile calumniators sucked the milk of courts, (he alluded to the Lameths, who had received benefits from the queen); "Such men," added he, "will boast even to the grave of their friends and their enemies."

Mirabeau sat down in the midst of the most unanimous applause. There was in the assembly a considerable number of deputies, who belonged neither to the right nor left side of the chamber; and who, unattached to any party, decided according to the impression of the moment. It was through their medium that genius or reason triumphed, because, by joining either the one side or the other, they created the majority. Barnave wished to reply, but the assembly opposed it, and called loudly for the vote. The motion of Mirabeau, after having been improved in a most superior manner by Chapelier, was finally adopted to the general satisfaction; for these rivalries did not extend beyond the circle in which they originated, and the popular party believed themselves as much conquerors with Mirabeau as with the Lameths.

This act conferred on the king and the nation conjointly the right of making peace or war. The king was intrusted with the disposition of the forces, was to notify the commencement of hostilities, call together the assembly, if they were not met, and propose the question of peace or war; the assembly was to deliberate on his proposition thus expressed, and the king immediately to sanction their decision. The express proposition and definitive sanction was an amendment of Chapelier's. This decree, which was conformable to the principles already established by the assembly, excited the sincere joy of the constitutionalists, and silly expectations among the counter-revolutionists, who thought that public feeling was about to change, and that this victory of Mirabeau would in fact be theirs. Lafayette, who on this occasion agreed with Mirabeau, wrote to Bonille, pointed out to him the hopes he entertained of tranquillity and moderation; and endeavoured, as he always did, to reconcile him to the new order of things.

The assembly continued its financial labours. These consisted in disposing of the property of the clergy to the best possible advantage; and its sale, which had been a long time decreed, could not be delayed either by their protestations, mandates, or intrigues. To deprive a powerful body of men of a great part of their landed property, then divide it in the most advantageous manner, so as to increase its produce by the division; to render thus a considerable portion of the population proprietors, who had not been so before; finally, to liquidate, by the same operation, the national debt, and to re-establish order in the finances, was the object of the assembly; and it appreciated too well its utility to be frightened at obstacles. The sale of the value of four hundred millions of demesne and church property had already been ordered; but it was necessary to find a method of selling it without incurring the risk of its undervaluation by bringing all to sale at once. Bailly, in the name of the municipality of Paris, proposed a well-conceived scheme, and this was, to transfer this property to the different municipalities, that they might make purchase of the whole, in order to dispose of it by a gradual resale, so that the total sale should not take place at one time. The municipalities, not having funds to pay for this purchase immediately, entered into engagements for an appointed time, and gave the state creditors bonds on the communes, which they engaged successively to pay. These bonds, which were called in the discussions municipal paper, gave the first idea of assignats. Following the plan of Bailly, the assembly laid hands on all ecclesiastical property, which was divided among the communes, and the state creditors had a nearer prospect of payment, by acquiring a claim upon the municipalities instead of the state. Their security was also augmented as the time of their payment approached; and it depended on themselves to effectuate this, since with their bonds or assignats they might acquire a proportional value of the property brought to sale. Much therefore had been done for them, but all was not yet accomplished. They might not wish to convert their bonds into land, either from scruples of conscience, or some other motive; in which case they were obliged to keep them; and as they had not the circulation of money, they thus became simple titles not reduced into possession. In this extremity there was only one measure to be taken: that of giving the bonds or titles the property of circulation; then they would become a true circulating medium; and the creditors, being able to pay with them, were in fact paid by them. There was another important consideration—the scarcity of coin; this was attributed to emigration, which carried a great deal of specie out of the country; to the payments which had been made to foreign nations; and, finally, to the desire which some evil-minded men had acted on, of driving things to their worst extremity. The true cause was the want of confidence which the troubles of the kingdom produced. Coin is apparent by circulation; when public confidence prevails, the activity of exchange is extreme; coin then circulates rapidly, is seen in abundance every where, and appears more considerable than it really is, because it is unsparingly used; but when public disorders have spread distrust, capitals stagnate, and the circulation of coin creeps: it frequently vanishes altogether, and its absence is without cause made a subject of complaint.

The necessity of supplying the deficiency of a metallic currency, of giving to the state-creditors something more than a mere claim, and of meeting many other present wants, induced the assembly to give to the bonds, or "assignats," the current value of money. The creditor was thus paid, as he could enforce the reception of the paper which was given him, and supply by it all his wants. If he did not wish to purchase land, those who received the circulating paper from him, in the course of its circulation, could do so. The bonds which, in this manner, were rendered current, were destined to be afterwards destroyed; the lands of the clergy would in a short time be disposed of, and the paper money suppressed. Interest at so much per diem accrued on the bonds, and they consequently increased in value by remaining in the hands of their possessors.

The clergy, who perceived in the proposed project, a method of putting the decree against their property into execution, opposed it violently. Their allies, both the nobility and others, hostile to every measure which facilitated the progress of the revolution, cried out against paper money. The name of Law resounded through the chamber, and the recollection of his bankruptcy was awakened. But the comparison was not just; for the paper of Law was pledged upon expected successes from the East India Company, whilst the bonds, at present in question, rested upon a territorial capital, actually existing and easily available. Law had involved the country in a mist of deception, and exaggerated greatly the presumed value of the capital of the company; the assembly, on the contrary, could not contemplate, with the new forms just established, the possibility of similar frauds. And besides, the sum of the created assignats was only a very small part of the capital which was appropriated to their redemption. But it is true that the paper, however secure it might be, was not, like silver, a substantive reality, or, according to the expression of Bailly, an "actualité physique." Coin carries in itself its own value; paper, on the contrary, requires another operation, either a purchase of land, or some other realization. It ought, therefore, to be above coin in value; and, from the very moment it is so, coin, which no one will give for paper, will shun the market, and finally disappear. Besides all this, if disorders should take place in the administration of the property, or immoderate issues of paper should destroy the proportion between the effects in circulation and the capital, public confidence would in all probability vanish; the nominal valuation of the paper would still be the same, but its real value would cease; he who gave this conventional money would rob him who received it, and a grand crisis must necessarily take place. All this was very possible, and with a little more experience would have appeared a certainty. As a financial measure, the issue of assignats might be found very questionable; but as a political measure, it was absolutely necessary, for it furnished means for providing for the pressing wants of the state, and divided property without the aid of an agrarian law. The assembly therefore could not prudently hesitate; and, in spite of Maury and his party, it decided on the issue of four hundred millions of assignats bearing interest. (1st April, 1790.)

Necker had long ago lost the confidence of the king, the accustomed deference of his colleagues, and the enthusiasm of the nation. Engrossed in his calculations, he nevertheless entered sometimes into discussion with the assembly. His reserve on the subject of extraordinary expenses, was the occasion of calling for the red book, that famous register, wherein, it was said, were to be found an account of all secret expenses. Louis XVI. yielded it up with reluctance, but waivered down the leaves, in which the expenses of his predecessor Louis XV. were detailed. The assembly respected his delicacy, and confined themselves to the expenses of his reign. In this book nothing objectionable was found personal to the king himself; all prodigalities bore reference entirely to the courtiers. The name of the Lameths was inserted there for a bounty of sixty thousand francs, dedicated by the queen to their education. They were compelled to return that sum to the public treasury. Pensions for a double proportion of services, or as equivalents for former situations held by individuals, were reduced. The assembly displayed in every instance the greatest moderation; it prayed the king to fix the amount of the civil list himself, and voted unanimously the twenty-five millions he demanded.

This assembly, strong in its numbers, genius, power, and acts, had conceived the mighty project of regenerating all parts of the state, and had just regulated the new system of administering justice. The judicial tribunals were distributed in the same manner as the several administrations — by districts and departments. The judges were left to popular choice. This last measure had been strongly opposed. Political metaphysicians again exerted their abilities to prove that judicial authority heightened the executive power, and that the king should appoint the judges. Many arguments in support of this opinion were gathered from different quarters; but the only one proper to enforce on the assembly, who professed the intention of establishing a monarchy, was, that royalty, successively deprived of all its prerogatives, became a simple magistrature, and the state a republic. But to define clearly the nature of a monarchy was too bold an undertaking; it requires concessions too great for a newly-awakened people to consent to. It is the lot of nations to demand either too much or else nothing. The assembly wished sincerely the continuance of the king, were full of respect for him as an individual, and proved it on every occasion; but whilst they cherished the person of a sovereign, they, without knowing it, destroyed royalty.

After this uniformity had been introduced into the courts of justice and the administration, it remained to regulate the service of religion, and to distribute its establishments in the same manner as the others. Thus, when a tribunal of appeal, and a superior administration had been established in each department, it was only natural to fix a bishopric there also. How indeed could certain bishoprics be permitted to embrace fifteen hundred square leagues, whilst others comprehended no more than twenty? or certain cures to contain ten leagues of circumference, whilst others hardly counted fifteen houses? How could it be suffered that many curates should have at most an income of seven hundred livres, whilst beneficed clergymen, living in the same neighbourhood, enjoyed revenues of ten or fifteen thousand. But the assembly, in reforming these abuses, did not intrench upon ecclesiastical doctrines, or with the papal authority, knowing that temporal power has always been confined within due limits. Their object was to form a new division of church establishments, and to subject the curates and bishops to a popular election; but even in this they encroached only upon temporal power, as it was the king who nominated, and the pope who instituted the ecclesiastical dignitaries. This act was called the civil constitution of the clergy, and brought more scandal on the assembly than all it had before done, although it was the work of the most pious deputies. Camus and some other Jansenists, wishing to establish religion in the state, endeavoured to put it in harmony with the new laws. It is certain that, equity having been introduced into every department, it would have been strange if the ecclesiastical administration had been neglected. Yet except Camus and a few others similarly disposed, most of the members of the assembly, educated in the school of the philosophers, would have treated Christianity as all other religions admitted into a state, and not have troubled themselves about it. But adhering to those opinions which, in our new morals, it is the custom not to oppose, even when they do not accord with our own sentiments, they assisted the sincerely Christian and religious project of Camus. The clergy, however, took their interference in very ill part, pretended that the spiritual authority of the pope was encroached upon, and appealed to Rome. The fundamental articles of the project were nevertheless adopted *, and immediately presented to the king, who demanded time to refer them to the chief pontiff. The king, whose enlightened religion perceived the wisdom of this plan, wrote to the pope with the sincere desire of gaining his consent, and of destroying by every method the objections of the clergy. The intrigues which hindered the accomplishment of these wishes will shortly be seen.

The month of July was at hand; it was now nearly a year since the taking of the Bastille, when the nation had obtained possession of supreme authority, and by the organ of the assembly had pronounced her decisions, and was executing them by herself or her delegates. The 14th of July was considered as the commencement of a new era in the national existence, and the people were determined to celebrate its anniversary by a great national solemnity. The provinces and cities had already given an example of forming federations, to resist in common the enemies of the revolution. The municipality of Paris proposed on the 14th of July a general federation of all France, to be celebrated in the midst of the capital, deputies of all the national guards, and of the entire body of the army. This design was received with enthusiasm, and great preparations were made to render the fête worthy of its subject.

Foreign nations, as has been seen, had for a long time fixed their eyes upon France; sovereigns began to hate and fear, the people to esteem us. A society of foreign enthusiasts presented themselves at the assembly, each in the costume of his own nation. Their prolocutor, Anacharsis Clootz, a Prussian by birth, a man of extravagant ideas, demanded, in the name of the human race, to take part in the federation. Scenes like these, which would appear ridiculous to those who did not witness them, deeply affected those who assisted at these ceremonies. The assembly granted their request; and the president assured the foreigners that they should be admitted, if it was only that they might relate to their countrymen what they had seen, and teach them the joys and blessings of liberty.

The emotion caused by this scene led to another. An equestrian statue of Louis XIV. represented him trampling under foot the allegorical picture of many conquered provinces: "We must not suffer," said one of the Lameths, "these monuments of slavery in these days of liberty. It is not fitting that the Franche-Comptois, on arriving at Paris, should see their image in chains." Maury opposed this unimportant measure, which it was necessary to grant for the satisfaction of the general enthusiasm. At the same instant a voice proposed the abolition of the titles of counts, marquesses, and barons, &c.; the prohibition of liveries, and the destruction of all hereditary titles. The young Montmorenci maintained this proposition. A noble asked what could be substituted for these words; "Such an one has been made count for service rendered to the state?" "It will be recorded simply," replied Lafayette, "that such an one has saved the state on such a day." The motion was adopted *, in spite of the extraordinary irritation of the nobility, who were more galled by the suppression of their titles, than by the more substantial losses they had sustained during the whole revolution. The most moderate party of the assembly wished, in abolishing titles, not to prohibit their assumption by those who desired it. Lafayette hastened to warn the court of this step, before the decree was sanctioned, and endeavoured to persuade the king to return it to the assembly, who consented to amend it. But the king delayed not a moment to give it his assent, and many believed they saw in his conduct the sinister intention of driving things to the worst.

The object of federation was, the civic oath. The question was agitated, whether the confederates and the assembly should receive the oath from the king, or whether the king, considered merely as the first public functionary, should swear simultaneously with the other public authorities upon the altar of the country (autel de la patrie). The last method was preferred; the assembly thus succeeded in putting its ceremonial in harmony with its other laws; and the king was in this ceremony on the same level as he was in the constitution. The court, to whom Lafayette was, at this period, the object of constant suspicion, alarmed itself at a report that had gained ground, of his being on the point of being nominated commandant of all the national guards of the kingdom. These suspicions, to those who did not know Lafayette, were very natural; and his enemies on all sides endeavoured to augment them. How indeed could people persuade themselves that a man enjoying so much popularity, and general of a very considerable force, would not abuse his power? Nevertheless he had not the most distant idea of it; he was resolved to be nothing more than a mere citizen; and whether it were virtue, or a well-directed ambition, the merit is the same. Human pride must have some object, and virtue consists in placing it in the exercise of benevolence. Lafayette, foreseeing the fears of the court, proposed that the same individual should not command more than the guard of one department; the decree was passed with acclamation, and the disinterestedness of the general received its full meed of applause. He was appointed to make all the preparations for the fête, and nominated chief of the federation, in his capacity of commandant of the Parisian guard.

As the day approached, preparations were made with the greatest activity. The fête was to take place on the Champ-de-Mars, an extensive plain, which extends itself between the military school and the banks of the Seine. It had been determined to carry the earth from the middle of this plain to the sides, so as to make an amphitheatre sufficient to contain the mass of spectators. Twelve thousand labourers worked at it without intermission; and yet it was doubtful if it would be finished by the 14th of July; the inhabitants therefore joined the labourers. Suddenly the whole population was transformed into workmen. The religious, the military, and men of all classes, seized the shovel and the spade; and even elegant females contributed to the work. This enthusiasm soon became general; the populace hastened to the Champ de Mars by sections, with banners of different colours, and at the sound of the drum. When there they mixed together, without any distinction, and all partook of the common labour. When the night came on, the signal for departure was given, and every one joined his company, and returned to his home. This delightful harmony prevailed to the end of the work. During this time the federalists arrived continually, and were welcomed with the greatest eagerness, and the most amiable hospitality. The effusion of joy was general and sincere, in spite of the alarms which a small number of men, who remained inaccessible to these sensations, endeavoured to excite. It was said, that the briyands would take advantage of the moment when the people were at the consideration to rob the city. The Duke of Orleans, who had returned from London, was suspected of mischievous projects; nevertheless the national gaiety was unchanged, and none of these ill-boding prophecies were accredited.

The 14th at last arrived: all the federalists deputated from the provinces and the army, ranged under their officers and banners, set out from the place of the Bastille, and met at the Tuilleries. The deputies of Bearn, in passing by the place de la Feronnerie, where Henry IV. had been assassinated, did homage to his memory, which, in this hour of enthusiasm, manifested itself by tears. The federalists being arrived at the garden of the Tuilleries, received the municipality and the assembly into their ranks. A battalion of young children, armed like their fathers, preceded the assembly; a group of old men followed it, and forcibly recalled to every mind the ancient recollections of Sparta. This train advanced, accompanied by the shouts and applauses of the people. The quays were covered, and the houses filled with spectators. A bridge that had been, within a few days, thrown over the Seine, conducted the procession by a road strewed with flowers from one bank side to the other, and led them opposite the plain destined for the reception of the confederation. The procession then passed through, and each band occupied its particular station. A magnificent amphitheatre had been prepared at the bottom of the plain, for the reception of the national authorities. The king and the president were seated by the side of each other on seats of equal height, inlaid with golden lilies. A balcony raised behind the king, contained the queen and the court. The ministers were seated at some distance from the king, and the deputies were ranged on each side. Four hundred thousand spectators occupied the sides of the amphitheatre; sixty thousand armed federalists went through their evolutions in the plain that was before them; and in the centre rose the magnificent altar of the country (autel de la patrie) on a base of twenty-five feet. Three hundred priests, clothed in white garments and tri-coloured scarfs, occupied the passages to it, and were appointed to officiate at the mass.

The arrival of the federalists lasted three hours. During this time the sky was black and lowering, and the rain fell in torrents. The heavens, whose brightness is so accordant with human felicity, at that time were destitute of serenity and light. One of the battalions, after their arrival, laid down their arms, and struck up a dance; all the others immediately imitated them, and in a moment the plain was covered with sixty thousand men, soldiers and citizens, whose gaiety formed a striking contrast to the storminess of the weather. At last, the ceremony commenced: the weather by a happy chance cleared up, and the sun shone propitiously on this solemn scene. The Bishop of Autun began the mass; the choristers accompanied the voice of the pontiff; and the cannon mingled its roar with these sacred sounds. The sacrifice being finished, Lafayette dismounted from his horse, ascended the passage to the throne, and attended to receive orders from the king, who handed him the form of the oath. Lafayette carried it to the altar, and instantly every banner was unfurled, and every sabre flashed in the air. The general, the army, the president, and the deputies, all cried out at once, "I swear it!" The king, standing up, his hand pointing to the altar, said, "I, king of France, swear to employ the power which the constitutional act of the state has conferred upon me, to maintain the constitution framed by the national assembly, and accepted of by me." The queen, now inspired by the general enthusiasm, took in her arms the august infant, heir to the throne, and from the top of the balcony, where she was seated, showed him to the assembled nation. This action excited the most extraordinary exclamations of joy, love, and enthusiasm, both towards the mother and the child, and every one seemed captivated with her. It was at this moment that all France, assembled from the eighty-three chief cities of the departments, took the same oath to love the king who loved them. Alas! on such occasions as this, even hatred must melt into softness, pride must sink into humility, and all must feel happy in the general felicity, and jealous of the dignity of all. How is it that these deeply felt joys of unanimity are so soon consigned to oblivion?

This august ceremony being completed, the procession marched back; and the people abandoned themselves to the public joy. The public rejoicings lasted many days. A general review of the federalists took place; and sixty thousand men under arms, presented a magnificent spectacle, at once military and national. In the evening Paris was enlivened by most delightful fêtes. The principal places of assemblage were the Champs Elysées, and the Bastille. On the ground where that ancient prison stood, which had been converted into a Square, the words "ici on danse," was written in large characters. Brilliant illuminations, arranged in the form of garlands, supplied light as clear as day. Opulence was forbidden to disturb this peaceful fête by the presence of carriages. Every one had to make himself one of the people, and to consider himself happy in so doing. The Champs Elysées presented an affecting scene. Every one rambled about without noise, without tumult, without rivalry or hatred. All classes, intermingled indiscriminately, promenaded, or danced, under the soft light of illuminations, and appeared happy in being together. Thus in the very bosom of advanced civilization, the times of primitive fraternity seemed to be revived.

The federalists, after having assisted at the splendid discussions of the national assembly, the pomps of the court, and the splendid entertainments of Paris; after having been witness to the graciousness of the king, whom they all visited, and from whom they received the most affecting expressions of attachment, returned to the provinces intoxicated with joy, and full of the purest sentiments and happiest illusions. The historian, having already related so many heart-rending scenes, and on the point of recounting scenes still more terrible, lingers with pleasure over these evanescent seasons of joy, when all hearts were filled with one sentiment—that of love for their country*.

This fête of the federation, though so affecting a spectacle, excited only a momentary emotion. On the next day all hearts returned to their old antipathies, and the war of parties was renewed. Petty ministerial quarrels recommenced. The assembly complained that a passage had been given to the Austrian troops, who had taken up their quarters in the country of Liège. Saint-Priest was charged with having favoured the escape of many of those who were accused or suspected of counter-revolutionary machinations. The court, in retaliation, again brought forward the proceedings commenced at the Châtelet, against the authors of the disturbances of the 5th and 6th of October, in which the duke of Orleans and Mirabeau were implicated. This singular proceeding, which was several times abandoned and resumed, laboured under the contradictory influences under which it had been first set on foot. It was full of inconsistencies, and made good no sufficient charge against the two principal persons accused. The court, although it had conciliated Mirabeau, had no settled plan with regard to him. It caressed and discarded him alternately, and endeavoured rather to quiet him than follow his counsels. In renewing the proceedings of the 5th and 6th of October, he was not the object of resentment, but the duke of Orleans, who had been loudly applauded since his return from London, and harshly repelled by the court when he begged to be restored to the good graces of the king†. Chabroud was charged to lay the report of the Châtelet before the assembly, that they might judge if there were or were not sufficient grounds for an accusation. It was the wish of the court that Mirabeau should maintain silence, and abandon the Duke of Orleans, who alone was the object of its pursuit. Nevertheless he spoke, and showed how ridiculous were the imputations which were levelled against him. In point of fact, he was accused of warning Mounier that Paris was treading upon the heels of Versailles, and of having added these words:—"We wish for a king, but what signifies it whether it is Louis XVI. or Louis XVII.;" of having traversed the ranks of the Flanders regiment, sword in hand and of having cried out, "this j... f..... does not deserve the trouble which is taken for him." Nothing was more futile than such complaints; Mirabeau in demonstrating their weakness and absurdity, said only a few words respecting the Duke of Orleans, and exclaimed at the end of his speech, "Yes, the secret of this infernal proceeding is finally out; it all originates from that quarter," said he (pointing at the right side), "it is from the influence of those whose testimonies and calumnies have woven the tissue of its falsehoods; it is from their resources that the enemies of the revolution have been furnished with matter; it is . . . it is but in the hearts of the judges, such as it will shortly be graven in history, by the most just and implacable vengeance."

Shouts of applause accompanied Monsieur Mirabeau to his place; the two accused were excused by the assembly, and the court had the disgrace of an ineffectual attempt to criminate popular characters.

The revolution made progressive advances every where, in the army as well as among the people. The army, as the last stronghold of power, was also the last object that excited the fear of the popular party. All the military commanders were enemies of the revolution, because, being the exclusive possessors of rank and favour, they observed that personal merit would be placed on the same footing with themselves. From a contrary motive, the soldiers were inclined to the new order of things; and, undoubtedly, a dislike to discipline, and the desire of higher pay, acted as powerfully upon them as the love of liberty. A dangerous spirit of insubordination manifested itself nearly throughout the army. The infantry especially, perhaps because they mixed more with the people, or had less military pride than the cavalry, were in a state of complete insurrection. Bouillé, who saw with pain his army slip away from him, employed every possible means to stop the contagion of this revolutionary spirit. He had received from Monsieur Latour-du-Pin the fullest powers, which he took advantage of by changing the quarters of his troops continually, and so preventing them becoming familiarized with the people, by a long stay in the same place. He prohibited especially the frequenting of clubs, and neglected nothing to maintain military subordination. Bouillé, after a long resistance, had finally sworn to be faithful to the constitution; and being a man of honour, from that moment he appeared determined to devote himself to its service, at the same time preserving his fidelity to the king. His aversion to Lafayette, whose disinterestedness he could not mistake, had been overcome; and he seemed more disposed to come to some understanding with him. The national guards of the vast country over which his command extended, offered to make him their general; but he refused to accede to their wishes, from feelings of pique and discontent, which, however, he afterwards regretted, when he contemplated the good such an authority would have enabled him to do. Nevertheless, and in spite of his being irreconciled to the clubs, he still enjoyed the popular favour.

Revolt first broke out at Metz; the soldiers

there imprisoned their officers, seized upon the colours and money-chests, and endeavoured even to make the municipality contribute to the latter. Bouillé exposed himself to the most imminent danger, but succeeded in repressing this seditious demonstration. Shortly after, another revolt of the same description took place at Nancy. In this the Swiss regiments were implicated, and it was to be feared, that if such out-breakings were not promptly checked, the whole kingdom would become shortly a prey to the combined excesses of the soldiery and the populace. The assembly itself trembled at this prospect. An officer was charged with the execution of the sentence passed against the rebels, but he was unable to enforce obedience to his orders, and Bouillé was obliged to march upon Nancy to support the authority of the law by force. He had only a few soldiers in whom he could trust, but happily the troops who had formerly revolted at Metz, feeling humbled because they were not confided in, offered to march against the rebels; the national guards made the same offer, and Bouillé advanced upon Nancy with this combined force, and a sufficiently numerous band of cavalry. His situation was embarrassing, not being able to bring his cavalry into action, and his infantry not being strong enough to attack the rebels, aided as they were by the populace. Nevertheless he addressed them with the greatest firmness, and succeeded in making an impression upon them. They were even on the point of yielding, and evacuating the city, conformably to his orders, when some shots were fired from an unknown quarter. An engagement now became inevitable. The troops of Bouillé, thinking themselves betrayed, fought with the greatest ardour; but the action was obstinate, and they were obliged to advance step by step across a most destructive fire*. Having at last made himself master of the principal places, ensured the subordination of all the regiments, and made them evacuate the city; he freed the officers and authorities who were imprisoned, selected the principal criminals, and delivered them over to the national assembly.

This victory spread universal joy, and calmed the fears which had been entertained for the tranquillity of the kingdom. Bouillé received from the king and the assembly congratulations and praise. At a later period, he was calumniated, and accused of cruelty. Nevertheless his conduct was irreproachable, and at the moment was applauded as such. The king at this period enlarged Bouillé's command, which made it very considerable, extending from Switzerland to the Sambre, and comprehending the chief part of the army. Confiding more in the cavalry than the infantry, he now fixed his quarters on the banks of the Seille, which falls into the Moselle; he here possessed the advantage of plains whereon to exercise his cavalry, forage to feed them, strong places to entrench himself in, and above all a very scanty population to fear. Bouillé was determined to do no act repugnant with the constitution, but he distrusted the patriots, and took precautions to aid the king, if it should become necessary.

The assembly had abolished parliaments, instituted juries, destroyed corporate monopolies, and was about to order a new issue of assignats. The property of the clergy giving an immense capital, and the assignats rendering it always convertible, it was nothing else than natural that the assembly should turn it to account. All the objections already urged were renewed with still more violence on this occasion; the Bishop of Autun himself opposed this new issue, and foresaw, with great sagacity, all its financial results*. Mirabeau, chiefly regarding its political consequences, insisted obstinately and successfully on its necessity. The issue therefore of eight millions of assignats was ordered; but on this occasion it was arranged that they should no longer bear interest. It was useless in fact to attach interest to that which was money. For nothing can be more just than that interest should attach on a mere security, which is not negotiable as currency, and remains idle in the hands of its holder; but to do so with respect to that which became of actual value by its forced circulation, was an error which the assembly could not a second time commit. Necker also raised objections against this new issue, and made a report to the assembly to which no one paid attention. The times were much changed with him; he was no longer that minister, to the preservation of whom the people attached so much importance a year before. Deprived of the confidence of the king, and embroiled with all his colleagues except Montmorin, he was neglected by the assembly, and did not receive that consideration which he might justly have expected. The error of Necker was in believing that reason was sufficient for every thing, and that when displayed with a mixture of sentiment and logic, it would triumph over the pride of the aristocrats, and the vehemence of the patriots. He possessed that high-minded faculty of reasoning talent, which can form a judgment of the deviations of the passions from wisdom, and censure them, but he wanted another species of talent more elevated, and less haughty, which does not confine itself to censure, but knows how to give them a proper direction. Thus to all parties he was more an annoyance than a restraint. Since the departure of Mounier and Lally he had remained without any partisan, except the vapid Malouet. He wounded the self-pride of the assembly, by recalling its attention incessantly to the most difficult of all tasks, that of the finances; besides, he drew upon himself ridicule by the manner in which he spoke of himself. His resignation was accepted of with pleasure by all parties. His carriage was stopped on his leaving the kingdom, by the same people who had formerly drawn him in triumph; and an order from the assembly was requisite to obtain him an egress from Paris. This was immediately given him, and he retired to Coppet, to contemplate at a distance a revolution which he was fitter to moralize upon than conduct †.

The ministry was now reduced to the nullity of the king himself, and nothing but a few intrigues, either useless or criminal, engaged their attention. Saint-Priest communicated with the emigrants; Latour-du-Pin gave himself up to the will of the military commanders; Montmorin possessed the confidence but not the esteem of the court, and was made the medium of carrying on intrigues with the popular chiefs, to whom his moderation recommended him. New conspiracies breaking out, they were all made the subject of accusation by the assembly. "I also," said Cazalès, "would accuse them, if it were generous to persecute men so destitute of resources; I would also accuse the minister of finances of not having enlightened the assembly as to the true resources of the state, and for not having conducted to a termination that revolution which he first promoted; I would accuse the minister of war for having allowed the army to become disorganized; the ministers of the provinces for not having compelled obedience to the orders of the king; and, finally, all of them for their mere nonentity, and for the dastardly counsels, they have given their master." Supineness is a crime in the eyes of parties eager to attain their object: therefore the right side condemned the ministers, not for what they had done, but for what they had left undone. Nevertheless, Cazalès and his party in condemning them entirely, yet opposed the proposal for requesting their dismissal of the king, because they regarded this request as an infringement on the royal prerogative. This recoil of the ministers was not requested, but (with the exception of Montmorin) they all successively sent in their resignations, and were succeeded by others of more popular character. Duport du Tertre, a plain honest advocate, was appointed keeper of the seals; and Duportail, who was recommended to the king by Lafayette, and showed himself more favourably disposed towards the popular party, replaced Latour-du-Pin in the war department. One of the first measures of the latter was to deprive Bouillé of the general discretion he exercised in his command, and particularly of the power of changing the quarters of his troops at his own pleasure, a power which Bouillé had availed himself of, to hinder the soldiers from fraternising with the people.

The king had particularly studied the history of the English revolution. The fate of Charles the First had always forcibly struck him, nor could he help entertaining fears of a like termination to his own career. He had especially remarked the causes which led to the condemnation of that monarch: this was civil war; and he had consequently imbibed an invincible horror against every measure which could cause the shedding of blood, and constantly opposed all projects of flight which were proposed by the queen and the court.

During the summer of 1790, which he spent at St. Cloud, he could certainly have made his escape, but would never suffer it to be spoken of. Such a measure was as much feared by the popular party as himself, as it would in all probability have led to a civil war. The aristocrats alone desired it, because, becoming masters of the king's person by withdrawing him from the assembly, they flattered themselves they should be able to govern in his name, and re-enter the capital with him at the head of foreign troops, not considering that it must have been their fate merely to follow in their train. To the aristocrats were joined, perhaps, some few persons who had begun to entertain some rambling notions of a republic, a thing which as yet had hardly entered into the mind of any one, and of which even the name was never mentioned, except perhaps by the queen, in her transports of anger against Lafayette and the assembly, whom she accused of favourably regarding such a termination. Lafayette, the chief of the constitutional army, and of all the sincere friends of liberty, watched constantly over the person of the sovereign. The two ideas—absence of the king and civil war were so closely associated in the minds of all men since the commencement of the revolution, that his departure was looked upon as the greatest calamity they had to fear.

Nevertheless the expulsion of a ministry, who, if they possessed not the confidence of Louis XVI. were at least of his own choice, alienated him from the assembly, and made him fear the entire loss of his executive power. The new religious debates, to which the double dealing of the clergy had given rise, in respect of their civil constitution, also alarmed his timorous conscience, and from that moment he contemplated flight. It was towards the end of 1790, that he intimated his designs to Bouillé, who resisted them at first, but afterwards yielded, that his zeal might not be suspected by the unfortunate monarch. Mirabeau, on his part, had digested a plan to support the monarchical cause. His communications with Montmorin had been continually kept up; but he had hitherto undertaken nothing serious, because the court, hesitating between foreign aid, emigration, and the national party, entered into nothing with sincerity, and of all projects feared that most which imposed upon it a man so sincerely constitutional as Mirabeau. Nevertheless, up to this period, the court and Mirabeau were upon the most perfect understanding with each other. Every thing was promised him if he succeeded, and all possible resources were placed at his disposal. Talon, the lieutenant-civil at the Châtelet, and Laporte, recently called into the councils of the king for the administration of the civil list, were ordered to communicate unreservedly with him, and to lend themselves to the execution of his plans. Mirabeau condemned the new constitution. For a monarchy it was, he said, too democratic, and for a republic it had too much of the king. Observing, too, the daily encroachments of the popular power, he determined to put a stop to them. At Paris, under the empire of the multitude and an all-powerful assembly, such an attempt was impossible. He perceived but one resource, and that was, to remove the king from Paris, and fix him at Lyons; there he could have explained himself more freely, and have energetically expressed the reasons which made him condemn the new constitution, at the same time proposing another, which was already prepared. At the very same time, a first legislative assembly could then have been convoked. Mirabeau, in a written conference with the most popular members, artfully contrived to wring from them all disapproval of one article of the present constitution. By joining together all these dissentient voices, the whole constitution stood condemned by its authors themselves*. It was his intention to attach this avowal to the manifesto of the king, and thus make the necessity of a new constitution the more clearly perceived. All his appliances were not communicated; all they knew was, that, by means of the police government of Talon, the lieutenant-civil, he had managed matters with the pamphletters, the orators of clubs and mobs; and by his extensive correspondence, he was enabled to ascertain the dispositions of the thirty-six departments of the south. Without doubt he reckoned on the aid of Bouillé, but would not place himself in his power. While that general was encamped at Montmédy, he would have the king remain at Lyons; and he himself should, according to circumstances, transport himself to Paris, or to Lyons. A foreign prince, a friend of Mirabeau's, visited Bouillé, on the part of the king, and communicated to him this project; but not with the privity of Mirabeau*, who never thought of Montmédy, whither the king set out, but too late. Bouillé, struck with the genius of Mirabeau, declared that every effort should be made to secure the success of such a man; and that as for himself, he was ready to second all his plans.

Monsieur de Lafayette was not privy to this project. Although sincerely attached to the person of the king, he had not the confidence of the court, and, besides, excited the envy of Mirabeau, who was unwilling to associate with himself such a companion. In addition to this, Lafayette, it was known, would not deviate from the straight path; and the plan in contemplation was too bold for his character, and swerved too much from those lawful views which were conformable to his ideas of rectitude. But however this might be, Mirabeau was determined to be the sole executor of his own project; and, in reality, he alone conducted its operations from the winter of 1790 to 1791. Whether he would have finally succeeded cannot undoubtedly be known; but it is certain, that if he had not turned the torrent of the revolution, he would, at least, have altered its direction, and without changing its inevitable result, would have modified its events by his powerful opposition. It may still be asked, whether, supposing him to have succeeded in subduing the popular party, he could also have rendered himself master of the aristocracy and the court. One of his friends proposed this objection to him:—"They have promised me every thing," said Mirabeau.—"But if they don't keep their word with you?"—"If they forfeit their word, I will turn republican."

The principal articles of the civil constitution, viz. as to the new division of bishoprics, the abolition of some, the institution of others, and the election of all ecclesiastical functionaries, had at last passed the assembly.

The king referred this decree to the pope, and received an answer of mingled severity and friendliness, his holiness at the same time appealing in his turn to the clergy of France. The clergy took advantage of the opportunity thus presented, and pretended that the spiritual interests of the church were injured by the measures of the assembly. They also published mandates, forbidding dispossessed bishops to retire from their sees except when constrained by force, enjoining them to hire houses, and continue to pursue their ecclesiastical functions; and commanding those of the faithful who still remained, not to acknowledge any other than themselves. La Vendée, and certain departments of the south, were the principal theatres of these intrigues, where they also concerted their plans with the emigrants. A federalist camp was at this time formed at Jalliez*; and under the pretext of federalism, the pretended federalists aimed at establishing there a central point of opposition against the measures of the assembly. The popular party became exasperated by these conspiracies, and feeling themselves strong in power, and being weary of moderation, determined to employ decisive measures to put them down. We have already seen the causes which brought about the adoption of the civil constitution. This constitution was promoted by the most sincere Christians of the assembly, who, being irritated by the unjust opposition of the ecclesiastics, were determined to meet and overbear it by some measure of decisive operation.

It has been already observed, that a decree of the assembly obliged all public functionaries to take an oath of fidelity to the new constitution. But whenever the question of this civic oath had been discussed, the clergy had always endeavoured to make a distinction between the political and ecclesiastical constitution, and their attempts had hitherto been overlooked; on the present occasion, however, the assembly were determined to subject the ecclesiastics to a more rigorous oath, which would either oblige them to retire, if they refused it, or faithfully to fulfil their duty if they took it. They also took care to declare, that it was not their intention to force the conscience of any, and that they should respect the sincerity of those who, believing religion compromised by the new laws, declined taking the oath; but at the same time insisted on the necessity of knowing who these persons were, that they might not be intrusted with clerical authority in the new episcopacy. In this instance the pretensions of the assembly were just and candid. It was further provided, that those who refused to take the oath should be deprived of their situations and salaries; and, moreover, to show that they were in earnest, all those ecclesiastics who were deputies, were called upon to take the oath in the assembly, eight days after it received the sanction of the king.

The right side opposed this measure. Many gave way to his accustomed violence, and endeavoured to provoke the assembly to interrupt him, that he might have cause of complaint. Alexander Lameth, however, who occupied the chair, defended his liberty of speech, and thus deprived him of the pleasure of being driven from the tribune. Mirabeau, more eloquent than ever, defended the assembly. "You," cried he, "the persecutors of religion! You who have honoured it with the most noble and affecting homage, in the most excellent of your decrees! You who consecrated public money to its service, of which your prudence and justice have rendered you so economical! You who have provided for religion in the division of the kingdom, and planted the sign of the cross

* Bouillé seems to think in his Memoirs, that it was on the part of Mirabeau and the king that these overtures were made to him. But this is a mistake. Mirabeau was ignorant of this double plan, and never thought of putting himself in the hands of Bouillé.

on the limits of all the departments ! You, finally, who know that God is as necessary to men as liberty !”

The act for taking the oath was passed * The king referred it immediately to Rome. The bishop of Aix, who had at first opposed the civil constitution, perceiving the necessity of a pacification, joined the king and some of his most moderate colleagues in soliciting the consent of the pope. but the emigrants of Turin, and the opposition bishops of France, wrote to Rome with a contrary intention, and the pope, under several pretexts, deferred his answer. The assembly, irritated by these delays, insisted upon having the sanction of the king, and he, having made up his mind to give way, had recourse to the ordinary subterfuges of weakness. He wished to appear to be forced, that it might seem that he did not act freely. He therefore waited till disturbances took place, and then hastened to grant his sanction. The decree being sanctioned, the assembly were anxious to put it into immediate execution, and obliged its ecclesiastical members to take the oath in their presence. But multitudes of both sexes, who until then had shown themselves little attached to religion, suddenly made every effort to incite the ecclesiastics to refuse †. Some bishops and some curates took the oath ; but the greater number refused, with a feigned moderation, and an apparent attachment to their principles. The assembly did not the less delay to proceed in the nomination of new bishops and curates, and was fully seconded by the several administrations. The ancient ecclesiastical functionaries still enjoyed the liberty of exercising their worship privately, and those who were acknowledged by the state, took their place in the churches. The dissidents, therefore, hired the church of the Théatins at Paris, to perform their divine services. This the assembly permitted ; and the national guard afforded them all the protection in its power against the rage of the populace, who by no means permitted them to exercise their separate ministry in peace. The assembly has been censured for having given rise to this new schism, and for having added a fresh cause of discord to those that already existed ; but as to their rights, it is evident to every unprejudiced mind, that they did not exceed them in interfering in the temporal concerns of the church. As to prudential considerations, it may well be said that they did not add materially to the difficulties of their position, and in point of fact, that the losses of the court, the nobility, and the clergy, and the acquisitions of the people, were quite sufficient to render them irreconcilable enemies, in order that the revolution should produce its inevitable consequences, setting aside the consequences of the new schism. Besides this, when all other abuses had been destroyed, could the assembly consistently suffer those of the ancient ecclesiastical organization to remain ? Could they suffer lazy bishops to live in luxury, whilst the pastors, the only useful members of the church, scarcely possessed the necessaries of life ?

CHAPTER VI.

INCREASE OF EMIGRATION—THE PEOPLE IN OPEN REBELLION ATTACK THE DUNGEON OF VINCENNES—CONSPIRACY OF THE CHEVALIERS DU POIGNARD—DEBATES UPON THE EMIGRATION BILL—DEATH OF MIRABEAU—COUNTER-REVOLUTIONARY INTRIGUES—FLIGHT OF THE KING AND HIS FAMILY; HE IS STOPPED AT VARENNES AND BROUGHT BACK TO PARIS—INCLINATION OF FOREIGN POWERS—PURPOSES OF THE EMIGRANTS—THE DECLARATION OF PILNITZ—PROCLAMATION OF MARTIAL LAW AT THE CHAMP DE MARS—THE KING ACCEPTS THE CONSTITUTION—CLOSE OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

THIS long and last struggle between the national party and the privileged order of the clergy, the chief points of which we have just related, broke up all unity. Whilst the clergy exerted their influence in the provinces of the west and the south, to stir up the inhabitants to insurrection, the emigrants of Turin made various attempts of a like nature, which their weakness and anarchy rendered futile. A conspiracy was entered into for this purpose at Lyons. The arrival of the princes was announced, an abundant distribution of pardons took place, and the city itself was promised to be converted into the capital of the kingdom instead of Paris, which had deserted the court. The king being informed of these plots, not believing, and perhaps not desiring, that they should succeed, for he despaired of being able to govern a victorious aristocracy, did all he could to prevent it. This conspiracy was discovered towards the end of 1790, and its principal agents delivered over to the tribunals of justice. This last reverse of fortune decided the emigration to remove from Turin to Coblenz, where they established themselves in the territory of the elector of Trèves, and at the expense of his authority, which they entirely invaded. It has been already observed, that the nobility who escaped from France were divided into two parties ; the one, composed of the old servants of the crown, maintained by grants from the crown, and composing what is generally termed the court, whilst they derived support from the nobility of the provinces, were unwilling that they should divide their influence with them, and therefore rather looked to foreign aid ; the other party, trusting more to the sword, endeavoured to promote insurrection in the provinces of the south by awakening their fanaticism. The first transmigrated, and fixed themselves at Coblenz on the northern frontier, there to await their foreign allies. It was in vain that those who desired to make the south the scene of battle, insisted on the necessity of calling in the aid of Piedmont, Switzerland, and acclamations accompanied his last words. Nevertheless the adjournment was carried, but by so small a majority, that its decision was contested, and a second collection of votes demanded.

Mirabeau, on this occasion, astonished all who heard him by his audacity: perhaps he never more imperiously dominated over the assembly; but his end was approaching, and these were his last triumphs. Presentiments of death mingled with his vast projects, and sometimes arrested their course. Nevertheless his conscience felt satisfied, the public esteem had incorporated his own; and if he had not performed sufficient for the safety of the state, he had at least done enough for his own glory. His pale countenance and deep sunk eyes spoke plainly of the ravages of disease, and his appearance in the tribune, where he was frequently seized with fainting fits, caused a general anxiety. The excesses of pleasure and business, and the violent emotions he experienced in the assembly, had gradually broken down his strong constitution. The baths also he was accustomed to use, which contained a solution of sublimate, had given that greenish hue to his complexion, which is generally considered as the effect of a poison. The court was terrified, and all parties astonished; and even before his death the cause of his illness was eagerly inquired into. The last time he spoke, he addressed the assembly in five different speeches, but left it exhausted, and never appeared there again. His death-bed received him but to yield him up to the Pantheon. He begged Cabanis, his attendant, not to call in physicians; but in this he was disobeyed, and on their arrival they found death fast approaching, which had already seized upon his feet. His head was the last part of his body attacked, as if nature permitted his genius to shine on to the last moment. An immense crowd, preserving the most profound silence, thronged round his dwelling. The court sent messengers after messengers to inquire of his state; bulletins of his health were transmitted from mouth to mouth, and spread grief among the people at every new progress of his disorder. He himself, surrounded by his friends, expressed some regret at the interruption of his projects, and at the same time some pride in his last labours. "Support," said he to his servant, "support this head, the ablest head in all France." The anxiety of the people affected him; the visit of Barnave, his enemy, who came in the name of the Jacobins, gave him a pleasing sensation. He gave some thoughts to public affairs. The assembly was about to be engaged on the question of testaments; he therefore called for Monsieur de Talleyrand, and handed to him a discourse which he had written on the subject. "It will be pleasant," said he, "to hear a man speak against testaments who is no more, and who ought to be making his own." The court, indeed, wished him to make one, and promised to take upon itself the payment of all his legacies. Speaking of his views on Europe, and guessing the projects of England; "That Pitt," said he, "is the minister of preparations; he governs by menaces; I would give him some trouble if I lived." The curate of the parish came to offer his services, he thanked him with politeness, and said, smiling, that he would have accepted of them willingly, if his superior ecclesiastic, the Bishop of Autun, had not been in the house. He then begged to have the windows opened: "My friend," said he to Cabanis, "I shall die to-day: envelop me in perfumes, crown me with flowers, and surround me with music, so that I may deliver myself up peaceably to sleep." Poignant pains interrupted from time to time these noble discourses. "You have promised," said he to his friends, "to spare me useless suffering," and he immediately demanded opium with great eagerness. This being refused, he insisted on compliance with his accustomed violence; for the purpose of satisfying him, his attendants deceived him, and gave him a cup which they persuaded him contained opium. He received it calmly, swallowed the beverage which he believed mortal, and appeared contented. A moment after he expired. This was on the 20th of April, 1791. The news of his death immediately reached the court, the city, and the assembly. All parties had placed their hopes in him, and all, except the envious, grieved at his death. The proceedings of the assembly were suspended, a general mourning ordered, and a magnificent funeral prepared. Some deputies being invited to attend, "We will all go," exclaimed the whole assembly. The church of Saint Genéviève was remodelled as a Pantheon, with this inscription, which, at the time I relate these passages, no longer exists:

AUX GRANDS HOMMES LA PATRIE RECONNAISSANTE*.

Mirabeau was the first that was admitted there, and was laid by the side of Descartes. His funeral took place the day after his death. All the authorities, the department, the municipalities, the popular clubs, the assembly, and the army, accompanied the procession, and this simple orator obtained more honours than ever had been conferred on the pompous funerals which had gone in procession to Saint Denis. Thus terminated the career of this extraordinary man, who, after having attacked and vanquished the old generation, had turned round upon the new generation who had contributed to his victory, arrested their course by his eloquence, and commanded their admiration even while he provoked their hostility: in fine, this man, who acted up to his duty by the conviction of reason, by the impulse of genius, not for the gold thrown as a bribe to his passions, enjoyed the singular honour (since popularity is generally followed by a popular disgust) of seeing the admiration of the people descend with him to the tomb. But could he have imparted resignation to the court, or moderation to the ambitious? Could he have said to the popular tribunes, eager to distinguish themselves, Remain in your obscure faubourgs? Could he have said to Danton that Mirabeau of the populace, Remain in your present situation, and mount no higher? This question cannot be solved; but at the time of his death, all these uncertain interests were placed in his hands, and depended upon him. His death was long regretted; and in the confusion of disputes which arose shortly afterwards, many cast their eyes on the place which he had formerly occupied, and seemed to invoke his presence who had so often terminated their doubts by some decisive burst of eloquence. "Mirabeau is no longer here," bawled out Maury one day, when ascending the tribune, "therefore I shall not be prevented from saying my say."

The death of Mirabeau deprived the court of all resolution, and new events hurried on its resolution to escape by flight. On the 18th of April the king attempted to pay a visit to Saint Cloud. It was immediately reported, that being unwilling to avail himself of the offices of a priest who had taken the oath, for the services of Easter, he had determined to absent himself during the Easter week. Others declared that he designed to make his escape. The people assembled in crowds, and stopped his horses. Lafayette hastened to his rescue, entreated the king to remain in his carriage, and assured him that he was about to open a passage for his departure. The king, however, got out, and would not permit him to make the attempt; this was his old policy, of not appearing free from restraint. Afterwards, by the advice of his ministers, he complained to the assembly of the outrage he had encountered. The assembly received him with their usual attention, and promised that every thing which depended on them should be done to secure him his liberty; and Louis XVI. quitted the chamber amidst the applauses of all except the right side. On the 23rd of April, according to advice that had been given him, he wrote, through M. de Montmorin, a letter to the foreign ambassadors, in which he denies the intentions which were attributed to him abroad, declares to foreign powers that he would adhere to the oath which he had taken, to be faithful to the constitution, and avows those to be his enemies who insinuated any thing to the contrary. The expressions of this letter were voluntarily exaggerated, in order that it might appear to have been forced from him by violence; this is what the king himself acknowledged to the envoy of Leopold. That prince was then travelling through Italy, and at that period was at Mantua. Calonne was in negotiation with him. Monsieur Alexander de Dufort, an envoy from his court, was despatched to the king and queen, to ascertain their real dispositions. He questioned them first as to the letter which had been written to the ambassadors; and they assured him, that as to its language, he might well see that it had been forced from them. He then questioned them as to their expectations, and they answered that they entertained none since the death of Mirabeau; and, finally, as to their inclination towards the Count d'Artois, and they declared them to be most favourable.

To comprehend the motive of these questions, it must be known that the Baron de Breteuil was the declared enemy of Calonne; that his hostility had not terminated with emigration; and that, though charged with full powers to treat with the court of Vienna by Louis XVI., he thwarted every measure of the princes. He assured Leopold that the king was unwilling to be saved by the emigrants, because he dreaded their encroachments, and that the queen was personally embroiled with the Count d'Artois. His projects for the re-establishment of his throne were always exactly contrary to those of Calonne, and he omitted nothing to destroy the effect of his new negotiation. The Count de Dufort returned to Mantua; and on the 20th of May, 1791, Leopold promised to send thirty-five thousand men into Flanders, and fifteen thousand into Alsatia. He declared, also, that an equal number of Swiss were ready to march to Lyons, as many Piedmontese on the Dauphiné, and that Spain was about to muster twenty thousand men. The emperor likewise promised the co-operation of the King of Prussia, and the neutrality of England. A protest, made in the name of the house of Bourbon, was to be signed by the King of Naples, the King of Spain, the infant of Parma, and the expropriated princes. Until then, it was to be kept perfectly secret. Louis was also recommended not to think of flight, of which he had frequently expressed a desire; while Breteuil, on the contrary, advised him to escape. It is possible that, on both sides, the advice was sincere; but it must be remarked, that in this each party consulted his own interest. Breteuil, who was bent on opposing the negotiations of Calonne at Mantua, counselled departure; and Calonne, who would have lost his ascendancy had Louis XVI. reached the frontier, suggested to him that it was better to remain where he was. Be that as it may, the king decided on departure, and often ill-humouredly declared afterwards, that it was Breteuil who persuaded him*. Being resolved upon flight, he informed Bouillé that he would defer no longer. His intention was, not to leave the kingdom, but to retire to Montmédy, where he should, in case of need, derive support from Luxembourg, or receive foreign aid. The route of Châlons, by Clermont and Varennes, in spite of the advice of Bouillé, was preferred, and all preparations for departure were ready by the 20th of June. The general assembled those troops in whom he most confided, prepared a camp at Montmédy, procured forage, and gave as a pretext for all these preparations, the movements which he perceived to be taking place on the frontier. The queen had got everything in readiness for her journey from Paris to Châlons, and Bouillé the same from Châlons to Montmédy. Several small bodies of cavalry, under the pretence of escorting a treasure, were ordered to approach Châlons in different directions, and fall in with the king on his line of road. Bouillé himself intended to advance to some distance from Montmédy. The queen had constructed a secret door to lead out of the palace; and the royal family were to travel under a foreign name, and with a feigned passport. Everything was ready for the 20th; nevertheless, fear retarded the journey till the 21st, a delay which was fatal to the unfortunate fugitives. Mons. de Lafayette was completely ignorant of the intended escape; Mons. de Montmorin himself, although in the confidence of the court, knew nothing of this secret; no one took part in it but those who were indispensably necessary for its execution. Some reports, however, of the intended flight, had been spread abroad, whether it were from the design getting wind, or whether it were one of those public apprehensions so common at that time. Whatever it were, the committee of inquiry had been forewarned, and the vigilance of the national guard was kept on the alert.

* See Bertrand de Molleville as to this fact.

* See Bertrand de Molleville.

On the 20th of June, near midnight, the king, the queen, Madame Elizabeth, and Madame de Tourzel, governess of the infants of France, successively quitted the palace in disguise. Madame de Tourzel, with the children, proceeded to the Petit Carousel, and got into a carriage which was driven by Mons. de Fersen, a foreign gentleman, disguised as a coachman. The king soon joined them; but the queen, who had quitted the palace with a garde-du-corps, caused them the greatest anxiety. Neither she nor her guide knowing the quarters of Paris, mistook their road, and did not reach the Petit Carousel till an hour afterwards. On her way she met the carriage of Mons. de Lafayette, whose people walked with torches. Being afraid of discovery, she hid herself under the wicket of the Louvre, and, having escaped this danger, succeeded finally in reaching the carriage, where she was impatiently expected. After being thus brought together, the whole family commenced their journey; they arrived, after a long ride, at the Porte St. Martin, and got into a berlin drawn by six horses, which was placed there in waiting. Madame de Tourzel, under the name of Madame de Korff, passed for a mother travelling with her children. The king assumed the character of her valet-de-chambre, and three disguised garde-du-corps preceded the carriage as couriers, or followed it as servants. The whole party finally departed, accompanied by the prayers of Mons. de Fersen for their success, who returned to Paris to take the road to Brussels. Meantime Monsieur was on his way to Flanders, pursuing a different route from Mons. de Fersen, that he might not excite suspicion, or meet with delays from want of horses.

The royal family travelled all night without their flight being known at Paris. Mons. de Fersen hastened to the municipality to see whether they knew anything about it; at eight o'clock in the morning it was still undiscovered; but soon afterwards the news got wind, and circulated with rapidity. Lafayette called together his aides-de-camp, and ordered them to depart immediately, in pursuit of the fugitives, saying at the same time, that they undoubtedly would not overtake them, but that it was necessary to do something. He took the responsibility of this order on himself, and affected to believe that the royal family had been carried off by the enemies of the public. This respectful presumption was adopted by the assembly, and all the authorities. At this period the people, who were hunting in all directions, all proached Lafayette with having favoured the escape of the king; and some time afterwards the aristocratic party accused him of having, towards the king, for the purpose of intercepting had allowed and thus ruining him by the vain attempt of his escape, had Lafayette combined at the first attempt. Yet would he have sent off two aides-de-camp to apprehend him before he received any order from the assembly; and if, on the contrary, any order from the aristocrats, he was to the supposition of for the mere purposes of allowing him to escape have given him notice of retaking him, would he by coach? The king was a whole night's travel and Lafayette. The people were very soon undeceived, and the king re-established in their good graces. The assembly met at nine o'clock in the morning, in a quite an imposing as during the earliest days of the revolution. The supposition they arrived at was, that Louis XVI. had been carried off. The most perfect calmness, and the greatest unanimity prevailed during this sitting. They approved of the measures which had been spontaneously taken by Lafayette. The people had arrested his aides-de-camp at the barriers, the assembly, every where obeyed, procured them a pass through the gates. One of those aides-de-camp, the young Romeuf, was the bearer of the decree which confirmed the orders of the general, and enjoined all public functionaries to stop (arrêter), by every possible means, the course of the said abduction, and to prevent the continuance of the journey. Romeuf instantly took the road to Chalons which had been pointed out by the people as the most probable route, and which they desired should be followed; a carriage drawn by six horses, which had been seen on that route, pointed it out as the right direction. The assembly then called in the ministers, and ordered them in future to receive their orders from them alone. Louis XVI., on his departure, had commanded the minister of justice to send him the seal of state. The assembly therefore countermanded this order, and retained the seal to affix to their decrees; they resolved, at the same time, that the frontiers should be put in a state of defence, and that the minister for foreign affairs should assure foreign powers, that the disposition of the French nation with respect to them remained unaltered.

Mons. de Laporte, comptroller of the civil list, was then heard. He had received several messages from the king, and among others a note, which he begged the assembly not to open, and a paper containing the motives of his departure. The assembly, respecting all the rights of society, restored the note which Mons. de Laporte did not wish to make public, without opening it, and ordered the other paper to be read. The perusal of this was listened to with the greatest tranquillity. It produced no impression. The king complained of his diminution of power uncompensated by sufficient dignity, and seemed as much hurt at the expenses of the civil list being reduced to thirty millions of francs, as at having lost all his other prerogatives. The assembly listened to his grievances with attention, lamented his weakness, and, to the order of the day.

At this period very few desired that Louis XVI. should be stopped. The aristocrats saw in his flight the very earliest of all their wishes realized, and flattered themselves with the prospect of approaching civil war. The most decided members of the popular party had already begun to be tired of him, and his absence afforded them a pretext for dispensing with royalty; and they conceived the idea and hope of a republic. All the moderate party, who at this time were ascendant in the assembly, hoped he would escape safe to Montmédy; and trusting to the natural equity of his disposition, flattered themselves that an accommodation between the throne and the nation would be facilitated by his flight. They were much less alarmed at this present time at the sight of a monarch menacing the constitution from the midst of an army. The people alone, upon whom this fear had been unceasingly impressed, still entertained this apprehension, which the assembly no longer shared with them, and ardently desired the arrest of the royal family. Such was the state of affairs at Paris.

The carriage of the fugitives, which departed on the night of the 20th and 21st had gone over great part of the route easily enough, and arrived without any obstacle at Châlons on the 21st, at about five o'clock in the afternoon. There the king, who was indiscreet enough to constantly put his head out of the window, was recognised; the person who made the discovery, at first wished to reveal the secret, but the mayor, who was a faithful royalist, prevented him. On arriving at the bridge of Sommeville, the royal family were disappointed in not finding the detachments which should have received them. These detachments had waited many hours for their arrival, but the rising of the people, who were alarmed at this movement of the troops, obliged them to retire. Nevertheless, the king reached Saint-Menehould. At that place, by constantly showing his head at the window he was discovered by Drouet the son of the postmaster and a violent revolutionist. This young man not having time to stop the carriage at St. Menehould, hastened to Varennes. A loyal quartermaster, who had noticed his eagerness, and suspected his motives, flew after him in order to stop him, but could not effect his purpose. Drouet made so much haste, that he arrived there before this unfortunate family. He immediately gave his information to the municipality, and made them take without delay every measure necessary for their being stopped. Varennes is built upon the banks of a narrow but deep river; a detachment of hussars were placed on guard there; but the officer, not seeing the treasure which had been expected arrive, ordered his troops to return to their quarters. The carriage arrived and passed the bridge; but scarcely had it proceeded to an arch under which it was obliged to pass, when Drouet, aided by another companion, stopped the horses. "Your passport?" cried he, and, with a firelock in his hand, bade the travellers advance at their peril. His order was obeyed, and the passport was delivered up. Drouet seized it with eagerness, and said that he must carry it to the commune to have it examined. The royal family was then conducted to the house of a solicitor, whose name was Sausse. Having examined the passport, and dissembled as if he had found it correct, he begged the king, with much politeness, to wait for a few minutes. In point of fact he waited for a considerable time, when Sausse, who had assembled a sufficient number of the national guard, laid aside all dissimulation, and told the king plainly that he was recognized and arrested. High words ensued. Louis pretended that he was not the person they supposed him to be, and the dispute became violent,—"Since you acknowledge him to be your king," cried the indignant queen, "address him with the respect you owe him."

The king, seeing denial was useless, gave up the idea of concealing himself any longer. The little parlour into which he had been conducted was filled with spectators. He addressed them with a warmth which was very uncommon to him, protested that his intentions were good, assured them that he had determined to go to Montmédy for no other purpose than to hear more freely the wishes of his people, by tearing himself from the tyranny of Paris; and demanded permission to continue his route, and a safe conduct to the end of his journey. This unhappy prince, overcome by his misfortunes, embraced Sausse, and implored him to save his wife and children. The queen joined her supplications to his, and taking the dauphin in her arms, conjured him to save them. Sausse was affected by this scene, but resisted all entreaties, and persuaded the king to return to Paris to prevent a civil war. The king, on the contrary, alarmed at the prospect of this return, persisted in his intention to proceed to Montmédy. At this critical moment, the Messrs. de Damas and de Goguelas arrived with the detachments, posted in several points of the city. The royal family thought themselves saved, but there was no reliance to be placed on the hussars. The officers informed their men that the king and royal family were arrested, and endeavoured to incite them to their rescue. But the soldiers replied that they were for the nation. At that very instant, the national guards, assembled from all the environs, arrived in crowds, and filled the streets of Varennes. The whole night elapsed whilst things were in this situation. At six o'clock in the morning, Romeuf arrived with the decree of the assembly. He found the carriage drawn by six horses, with their heads towards Paris. He went up stairs, and handed the act to the king with grief in his countenance. A cry of indignation burst from the whole royal family against Lafayette, who was the cause of their arrest. The queen even appeared astonished that he had not perished by the hands of the people. Romeuf replied to this remark, that both his general and himself had merely done their duty in pursuing the royal fugitives, but they had hoped not to overtake them. The queen, however, was not to be pacified; she seized the net, threw it on the bed of her children, then snatched it away, saying it would contaminate them. "Madame," said Romeuf, who was much attached to the queen, "would you not rather that any other but myself was witness to this passion?" Upon this, the queen came to herself, and regained her dignified bearing. The arrival of several corps, which had been placed in the environs by Bouille, was now announced. But the municipality ordered these troops to withdraw, and the royal family were obliged forthwith to get into their carriage, and again take road to Paris, that road so fatal and so much dreaded. Bouille being in the middle of the night informed of what had happened, immediately mounted a regiment of cavalry, and set out to rescue the king with shouts of Vive le Roi! This brave general, on the rack of anxiety, marched with all possible speed, and traversed nine leagues in four hours. On his arrival at Varennes, he there found many corps already assembled. But the king had left it more than an hour and a half; Varennes was barricaded and defended in a very able manner; the bridge had been broken down, and the river was not fordable. Thus, to save the king, Bouille had first to engage, and carry the barricades, then the river was to be crossed; and after this great loss of time, the carriage, which had the start of an hour and a half, was to be overtaken. These obstacles rendered the attempt impracticable; for nothing short of an impossibility could have stopped a man so devoted to the king, and so enterprising as Bouillé. He drew off, distracted with emotions of concern and grief.

When the news of the king having been stopped arrived at Paris, it was believed that he was already out of reach. The people exhibited extraordinary joy at this event. The assembly deputed three of its members, chosen from the three sections of the left side, to accompany the monarch, and reconduct him to Paris. The members were Barnave, Latour-Maubourg, and Pétion. They met at Châlons; and from the time they joined the court, all orders solely emanated from them. Madame de Tourzel occupied the carriage with Latour-Maubourg; Barnave and Pétion were placed in that of the royal family. Latour-Maubourg, a distinguished individual, was a friend of Lafayette, and like him as much devoted to the king as the constitution. In yielding to his two colleagues the honour of being with the royal family, his intention was to interest them in fallen grandeur. Barnave was seated in the back of the carriage between the king and the queen; Pétion in front, between Madame Elizabeth and the Princess Royale; the young dauphin reposed sometimes on the knees of one, and sometimes of the other. How rapid had been the course of events! a young advocate of two or three and twenty years of age, remarkable solely for his talent, and another, distinguished chiefly by his intelligence, but, above all, by the severity of his principles, were seated by the side of a prince, formerly the most absolute in Europe, and directed all his movements! The journey was slow, from the necessity of following the national guard. It took eight hours from Varennes to Paris. The heat was extreme, and clouds of dust raised by the crowd suffocated the travellers. The commencement of the journey was silent; the queen could not disguise her ill-temper, but the king entered, after some time, into conversation with Barnave. The conversation wandered to various subjects, and at last to the flight to Montmély. Both parties were astonished to find themselves so intimate. The queen was surprised at the superior genius and delicate politeness of the young Barnave. She lifted her veil, and joined in the conversation. Barnave was affected by the kindness of feeling exhibited by the king, and the graceful dignity of the queen. Pétion's behaviour was rather rude than otherwise, and showed, and consequently obtained, less respect and consideration. By the time the carriage arrived at Paris, Barnave had become devotedly attached to this unhappy family; and the queen, charmed with the merit of the young senator, had admitted him high in her esteem; and in all the communications she afterwards held with the constitutional deputies, he possessed the greatest share of her confidence. Parties would surely pardon one another if they could mutually place themselves in each other's situation*.

At Paris the reception to be given to the royal family had been already determined. A placard was fixed up in all quarters of the city, containing these words: Whoever applauds the king shall be beaten: whoever insults him shall be hanged. This order was executed to the letter, and neither applauses nor insults were heard. The travellers made a circuit to avoid traversing Paris, and entered by the Champs Elysées, which leads directly to the palace. An immense crowd received them covered and in silence. Lafayette, followed by a numerous guard, had taken every precaution to prevent disturbances. The three gardes-du-corps who had aided in the flight were seated on the coach-box exposed to the view and indignation of the people; yet no violence was offered them. The moment the carriage stopped, the royal family hastily got out, and passed through a double file of national guards placed there for their protection. The queen, who was the last to alight, found herself almost borne in the arms of Me-srs. de Noailles and D'Aiguillon, persons opposed to the court, but the generous sympathisers with the unfortunate. Seeing them approach, she had at first some doubt of their intentions, but put herself under their protection, and arrived safe and sound at the palace.

Such was this journey, whereof the fatal termination cannot justly be attributed to any of those who had planned it. An accident caused its failure; an accident might have insured its success. If, for instance, Drouet had been stopped by the quartermaster who followed him for that purpose, the king would have been saved. Perhaps also the king did not show sufficient energy when he was recognised. Under no circumstances ought the issue of this journey to be made a matter of reproach to any one, either to those who advised or those who executed it. It was the result of that fatality which always pursues the weakest side in every revolutionary crisis.

The effect produced by the journey to Varennes was to destroy all respect for the king, and by familiarizing the minds of men to dispense with the idea of royalty, to suggest the notion of a republic. On the morning of his arrival, the assembly passed an act to provide for this contingency. Louis XVI. was suspended from exercising his functions; a guard was appointed for the custody of himself, the queen, and the dauphin, and made responsible for their security*. Three deputies, D'André, Tronchet, and Dupont, were then ordered to receive the declarations of the king. The greatest delicacy was observed in their expressions, for the assembly was never wanting in conventional decencies, but the result was evident, and the king was provisionally dethroned.

The responsibility imposed upon the national guard made them severe, and often over-strict in their service towards the royal personages. Sentinels were placed on watch night and day at their door, and never lost sight of them. The king one day wishing to see if he was really a prisoner, went to a door; the sentinel prevented his passage. "Do you know who I am?" said Louis XVI. "Yes sire," replied the sentinel. The only liberty he enjoyed, was that of walking in the garden of the Tuilleries in the morning, before it was opened to the public.

Barnave and the Lameths now did the very same thing which they had so greatly reproached Mirabeau for doing; they came to the relief of the throne, and were admitted into the confidence of the court. It is true they received no money but it was not less the price of the alliance than the alliance itself, with which they had reproached Mirabeau; and after having been formerly so rigid in their principles, they now followed the common track of all popular leaders, that of taking up the defence of power in proportion as they got closer to it. Nevertheless, nothing was more praiseworthy, in the actual state of things, than the service which they rendered the king; and on no occasion did they display more address, ability, and talent. Barnave dictated the answer of the king to the commissioners appointed by the assembly. In this answer Louis XVI. declared the motive of his flight was to acquaint himself more perfectly with the public opinion; he assured the assembly that he knew it better since his journey than he had done before, and he proved by every kind of argument that he had never conceived the intention of going out of the kingdom. As to his protestations contained in the paper he had sent to the assembly, he said with reason, that they referred, not to the fundamental principles of the constitution, but to the means by which they were to be carried into effect. At present, he added, that as the general will of the nation was known to him, he should make no hesitation in submitting to every sacrifice necessary for the public welfare*.

To avert still further the indignation of the assembly from the king, and draw it upon himself, Bouillé addressed a letter to them, which might have been called foolishly extravagant, had it not been for the generous motive which dictated it. He avowed that he alone was the person who persuaded the king to escape, whilst in reality he had opposed it; he declared, in the name of the sovereigns of Europe, that Paris should be responsible for his safety, and that the slightest outrage offered to his person should be most amply revenged. He added, what he also knew was not the fact, that the military resources of France were very insignificant; that he knew that views of invasion were entertained by foreign powers; and that he himself would lead the armies of the enemy into the bosom of his country. The assembly affected to believe the truth of this generous bravado, and threw all the blame of the king's flight on Bouillé, who had nothing to fear, for he was already in a foreign country.

The court of Spain, fearing that the slightest demonstration would only irritate the French nation, and expose the royal family to still greater dangers, prevented a descent about to be fitted out against the south frontier, in aid of which, the knights of Malta had contributed two frigates. They now assured the French government, that their friendly dispositions were not changed with respect to them. The northern powers were less guarded in their conduct, and in this quarter the foreign powers, excited by the emigrants, assumed a threatening aspect. Envoys were despatched by the king to Bruxelles and Coblenz; their object was to keep up a good correspondence with the emigrants; to acquaint them with the favourable inclinations of the assembly, and of the hopes he had conceived of an advantageous arrangement. But they met with a most unworthy reception, and returned immediately to Paris. The emigrants now raised bodies of troops in the name of the king, and thus obliged him formally to deny them his authority. They then pretended that Monsieur, who was at that time with them, was regent of the kingdom; that the king being a prisoner, had no longer any will of his own; and that that which he expressed was merely the will of his oppressors. The peace of Catherine with the Turks, which was concluded about this time, added greatly to their senseless satisfaction; and they imagined they should have all the powers of Europe immediately at their disposition; and considering the disarmed state of all the strong places in France, and the disorganization of the army, abandoned by its officers, they could not think an invasion doubtful, or its term far distant, and that it would not be successful. Yet they had been absent from France two years; and though always flattering themselves with hopes of success, had not yet entered it victorious! Foreign powers seemed to promise much, but hitherto had performed nothing. Pitt appeared inclined still to delay; Leopold, exhausted by the war, and discontented with the emigrants, desired peace; the king of Prussia promised much, but had no interest to hold him to his engagements; Gustavus was ambitious of commanding an expedition against France, but he was too far distant; and Catherine, who ought to support him, was hardly delivered from the Turks, and had still Poland to suppress. And besides, to bring about this coalition, there were so many interests to be reconciled, that one could scarcely expect it could be brought about.

The declaration of Pilsnitz* ought to have enlightened the emigrants as to the zeal of the European sovereigns. This declaration, made by both the king of Prussia and the emperor Leopold, declared that the situation of the king of France was one of common interest to all sovereigns; that it called upon them all to make a combined effort for his relief, and thus to afford him the means of establishing a government suitable to the interests of the throne and the people; and that the king of Prussia and the emperor were ready to join the other princes of Europe, to accomplish this object. Meantime their troops were put in readiness for war. It has since been discovered that this declaration contained secret articles, declaring that Austria should not throw any obstacles in the way of Prussia's pretensions to a part of Poland; and thus called upon Prussia to abandon her more ancient connections in uniting herself with Austria against France. What was to be expected from a zeal excited by such means? And if it were so reserved in its expressions, what was to be looked for from its acts? France, it is true, was in a disarmed state, but a whole people rising to resist invasion are soon armed; and, as the celebrated Carnot afterwards said, what is not possible to twenty-five millions of men! It is true also, that the army was abandoned by its officers; but they were for the most part young men, and being appointed by court interest, were without experience, and disliked by the soldiery. The impulse, however, which had been given to every resource might be expected to produce both officers and generals. Yet, it must be confessed that the success of any resistance France might have opposed to an invasion, at a later period, might have been doubted even without the presumption of Coblenz.

Meantime the assembly sent messengers to the frontier, in order to make every necessary preparation. All the national guards requested to be put in action, many generals offered their services, and among others Durnouriez, who afterwards saved France in the defiles of the Argonne.

Whilst these preparations were making for the exterior safety of the state, the assembly hastened to finish their constitutional labours, and reinstate the king in the exercise of his functions, and, if possible, in some of his prerogatives.

All the subdivisions of the left side, except those who had assumed the new name of republicans, were advocates for a system of moderation. Barnave and Malouet were in perfect accord, both in their opinions and actions. Pétion, Robespierre, Buzot and some others had adopted the idea of a republic; but they were few in number. The right side still persevered in their imprudent conduct, and instead of joining the moderate majority, made protest. This majority did not the less govern the assembly. Their enemies, who would have branded them with infamy had they dethroned the king, now reproached them with having brought him back to Paris, and replaced him on a tottering throne. But what could they do? To substitute a republic for a king was too hazardous an enterprise. To change the dynasty would have been useless, for if they were determined to have a king, it was as well to keep the one they had; and, besides, the duke of Orleans could never be preferred to Louis XVI. In both cases, to dispossess the present king was to violate established rights, and to furnish the emigrants with a leader, who would have given them a weight of authority, which, as yet, they did not possess. On the other hand, the restoration of Louis XVI. to his authority, and his reinstatement in as many of his prerogatives as possible, was but to fulfil their constitutional task, and remove all pretext for a civil war; in a word, the assembly merely performed their duty; for, after all the engagements that had been entered into, they were certainly bound to establish a free, although monarchical form of government.

The assembly did not hesitate, but they had great obstacles to overcome. The new word republic had offended some opinions already somewhat absorbed in the words monarchy and the constitution. The absence and the suspension of the king had, as has been already observed, accustomed men's minds to dispense with his presence altogether. The journals and the clubs had stripped the person of the sovereign of that respect of which he had hitherto been the object. His departure, which, according to the terms of the decree concerning the residence of public functionaries, rendered his dethronement a matter of expectation, gave room to maintain that he was no longer king. Yet, according to this decree, nothing but an absolute departure out of the kingdom and resistance to the summons of the legislative body, could incur that penalty. But these circumstances were little regarded by men who entertained extreme opinions, and they declared the king criminal and ipso facto dethroned. The Jacobins and Cordeliers discussed this question with their usual violence, and affected not to comprehend how the nation, once freed from the burden of a king, could again charge itself with that form of government. Had the duke of Orleans ever conceived hopes of the crown, this had been the time for them to have awakened. But he must have seen how little influence was attached to his name, and how little a new sovereign, however popular he might be, was suitable to the present state of affairs. Some journalists, devoted to his service, perhaps without his knowledge, endeavoured, as Anthony did to Caesar, to place the crown on his head, and proposed giving him the regency; but he found himself compelled to disavow them by a declaration which met with as little consideration as his own person. No more king, was the general cry with the Jacobins and Cordeliers, and in all public places, and in the daily papers.

Addresses on this subject were presented from all parts of France, and republican placards were stuck up on all the walls of Paris, and even on those of the assembly itself. One was signed with the name of Achilles Duchatelet, a young colonel, and addressed to the French nation; it reminded them of the tranquillity they enjoyed during the journey of the monarch to Varennes, and reasoned from thence, that the absence of the king was more to be desired than his presence; it added, that his desertion of his post was an abdication; that the nation and Louis XVI. were therefore discharged from all mutual ties; and concluded by declaring that history was full of the crimes of kings, and that it was high time to disavow the intention of furnishing themselves with another.

This address, though attributed to the young Duchatelet, was the production of Thomas Paine, an Englishman, and a principal actor in the American revolution. It was reprobated by the assembly, who, after animated debates on the subject, deemed it proper to proceed to the order of the day, and, according to its constant practice, treat such opinions and scandalous libels with the most utter indifference.

Finally, the deputies who were ordered to make their report on the affair of Varennes, presented it to the assembly on the 16th of July. The journey, they declared, had nothing culpable in it, and even if that had been the case, that the person of the king was inviolable; and that a forfeiture could not result from it, because he had not remained long enough absent, and had not offered any resistance to the summons of the legislative body.

Robespierre, Buzot, and Pétion, repeated all the hackneyed arguments against the inviolability of the king's person. Duport, Barnave, and Salles, replied to them; and it was at last decreed that the king could not be brought to trial for his escape. Two articles merely were added to the act of inviolability. As soon as this decision was affirmed by the majority, Robespierre rose, and protested loudly against it, in the name of human nature.

On the evening which preceded this decision, a great disturbance had taken place at the Jacobins. A petition was there drawn up, addressed to the assembly, in which they were called upon to declare the king deposed, as a recreant and traitor to his oaths, and to provide a substitute for his authority by every constitutional means. It was resolved that this petition should be carried the next day to the Champ de Mars, and that every petitioner should sign it on the altar of the country. On the following day it was accordingly carried to the appointed place, and a great number of persons, drawn by curiosity to witness the scene, joined a mob of seditious individuals. But at this moment the act of restoration was passed, and the petition was therefore too late to answer any purpose. Lafayette now arrived, and broke through the barricades which the people had already raised for their defence. He was menaced, and even fired at, but, though within shot, remained unhurt. The municipal officers soon joined him, and at last prevailed upon the populace to retire; the national guard, however, were so stationed as to have an eye on their retreat, and hopes were entertained, for an instant, that the multitude had dispersed; but presently the disturbance recommenced. Two invalides, somehow or other, found under the altar of the country, were slaughtered, and then the disorder knew no bounds. The assembly called upon the municipality, and charged them to preserve the public tranquillity. Bailly immediately betook himself to the Champ de Mars, unfurled the red flag, and proclaimed martial law. The adoption of coercive measures, whatever may be said upon the subject, was perfectly right. Were new laws required, or were they not? If they were, it was necessary that they should be executed, and have some fixed authority, that insurrection might not be perpetual, nor the acts of the assembly controlled by the plebeians of the mob. Bailly was therefore right in enforcing the execution of the law. He advanced into the ranks of the insurgents with undaunted courage, and was several times fired at, but fortunately missed; and was unable, in the midst of the tumult, to make the legal requisitions. Lafayette then ordered his soldiers to fire in the air; upon this the crowd abandoned the patriotic altar, but soon rallied again. Being now reduced to the last extremity, he gave the word to fire. The first discharge killed some of the rebels. The number was exaggerated on both sides. One party reduced it to thirty, the other augmented it to four hundred; and the most furious to some thousands; the last computation was believed at the moment, and terror became general. This severe example quieted for a time the disturbers of the public peace*. As is generally the case, all parties were reproached with this outbreak, and it is probable that many had a hand in it, for the disorder suited many. The king, the majority of the assembly, the national guard, and the authorities, both of the municipalities and the departments, were agreed, however, at present, in their wish to establish constitutional order; and they had to combat with a democracy within, and the aristocracy from without. The assembly and the national guard composed the moderate, enlightened, and wise part of the nation, who desired the re-establishment of order and the laws; and they naturally should, at this moment, have allied themselves with the king, who appeared, on his part, to be contented with a limited power. But if it suited their views to stop at the point at which they had arrived, it did not suit those of the aristocracy, who desired a national convulsion, nor those of the populace, who were still greedy of further acquisitions and greater power. Barnave, as Mirabeau had formerly been, was the orator of this enlightened and moderate party; and Lafayette was its military chief. Danton and Camille Desmoulins were the orators, and Santerre the general, of this mob, who, in its turn, wished to exercise its power. A few fanatic and enthusiastic spirits represented this body, either in the assembly or the new administration, and hurried on their reign by their declamations.

The affair of the Champ de Mars was reproachfully attributed to Lafayette and Bailly. But considering it their duty to yield obedience to the law, and sacrificing their popularity and lives to its execution, they felt no regret, and entertained no fears from what they had done. The energy they had displayed silenced the factious, and the most prominent already thought of avoiding the blows which they believed were about to be dealt against them. Robespierre, who, until now, had advanced the most extravagant propositions, trembled in his obscure abode; and notwithstanding the inviolability of his person as a deputy, he sought an asylum from all his friends. Thus this example of severity had its effect, and, for the moment, the turbulent propensities of the rioters were subdued by the fear of retribution.

The assembly, at this period, entered into a determination which has since been greatly blamed, but which was not so fatal in its results as some have thought. It decreed that none of its members should be re-elected. Robespierre was the author of this proposition. Envy against his colleagues, excited by a sense of his own inferiority, was supposed to be the cause of his motion; it was at least natural that he should wish to exclude them from the legislative, having been always opposed to them in the constituent assembly; and considering the opinions he held, it is possible there might have been both conviction, envy, and hatred in his motives. Thus the assembly, which had been accused of wishing to perpetuate its powers, and had forfeited its popularity by its moderation, became most anxious to reply to all these attacks by a disinterestedness, perhaps somewhat affected, in deciding that its members should be excluded from the next assembly. The new assembly was thus deprived of men whose violence had given place to moderation, and whose legislative knowledge was ripened by the experience of three years. Nevertheless, by observing the causes of the revolutions which supervened, we may judge of the small importance of this measure, which has been so often condemned.

The present was the moment for the assembly to complete their constitutional labours, and terminate, during a season of tranquillity, their stormy career. The members of the left side had determined to revise certain parts of the constitution. For this purpose they resolved that it should be read through, that the assembly might thus be enabled to form a judgment of the whole, and harmonize its different parts. This process has been termed the "Revision," and progressed too slowly according to the notions of hot-headed republicanism. Barnave and the Lameths had concerted a plan with Malouet, for reforming certain articles which struck a blow at the royal prerogative, and at that which was termed the stability of the throne. It was even said that they went so far, as to meditate the establishment of two chambers. It was arranged that the moment the reading of the constitution was finished, Malouet should make his attack upon it; that Barnave should reply to him with vehemence, the better to conceal his intentions, but that, in defending the greater part of the articles, he should abandon some as evidently dangerous, and condemned by settled experience. Such was the project whose execution was prevented by the ridiculous and dangerous protests of the right side, who resolved now to withhold their votes from every question. No accommodation was any longer possible; the left side would hear nothing more; and when the proposed attempt took place, the cries which arose from all parts of the chamber hindered Malouet and his party from proceeding*. The reading of the constitution was therefore finished with precipitation, and presented to the king for his acceptance. From that moment he was restored to liberty, or, to speak more properly, the strict guard on the palace was taken away, and he could retire where-ever he wished, to examine and without personal restraint accept of the constitution. What therefore could Louis XVI. at this time do? Refuse the constitution? that would have been to abdicate in favour of the republic. The safest measure, therefore, even according to his own system of conduct, was to give his assent, and await, from the course of events, that reinstatement in power which he believed to be his due. He consequently, after a few days, declared his acceptance of the constitution (September 13). A burst of extraordinary rejoicing was the consequence of this intelligence; as if, in point of fact, they had dreaded some objection on the part of the king, or as if his consent had been the effect of an unlooked-for concession. He then went to the assembly, and was received with as much enthusiasm as in the days of his greatest popularity. Lafayette, who never omitted an opportunity of repairing the inevitable evils of political troubles, proposed on this occasion a general pardon for all crimes caused by the revolution. This was proclaimed in the midst of the shouts of the populace, and the prisons were immediately thrown open. Finally, on the 30th of September, Thouret, the last president, informed the chamber, that the constituent assembly had terminated its sittings.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

CHAPTER I.

REFLECTIONS UPON THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY—OPENING OF THE SESSION OF THE SECOND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY, STYLED THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY; ITS CONFORMATION—NOTICE OF THE CLUBS; THEIR INFLUENTIAL MEMBERS—PÉTITION, MAYOR OF PARIS—POLICY OF FOREIGN POWERS—EMIGRATION; ACTS PASSED AGAINST THE EMIGRANTS AND AGAINST THE NONJURING PRIESTS—CHANGE IN THE MINISTRY—PREPARATION FOR WAR STATE OF THE ARMIES.

THE constituent assembly had now finished its long and laborious career; and, notwithstanding the unflinching courage and perfect equity it had displayed, and the Herculean labours it had sustained, it was abhorred as revolutionary at Coblenz, and as aristocratical at Paris. To form a just judgment of this memorable assembly, where such a combination and variety of talent was concentrated, from whence issued such bold and energetic resolutions, and which displayed, perhaps for the first time, a convocation of all the enlightened men of a nation, assembled with the will and power of realizing the perfection of philosophy, it is necessary to consider the state in which it found France, and that in which it left it.

The French nation, in the year 1789, felt and understood the nature of all the evils which oppressed her, but had never conceived the possibility of their eradication. Suddenly, on the unexpected demand of the parliaments, the states-general were convoked; and the constituent assembly stood in the presence of a throne, bloated with the pride of its ancient power, and disposed, at most, to suffer only the redress of a few grievances. Having a strong sense of her rights, she states that she is a nation, and boldly announces it to the astonished government. Being menaced by the aristocracy, the court, the army, and not foreseeing popular insurrections, it declared itself inviolable, and forbade power to stretch forth her hand against her. Convinced of her rights, she addressed herself to her enemies, who were not convinced of their rights, and, by a simple expression of her will, gained the ascendancy over a power consolidated by a duration of many centuries, and an army of thirty thousand men. This was the sum of the revolution; this was its first act, the most noble of all; it was just, it was heroic; for never did a nation seek to gain its rights with greater justice and at greater peril.

Power being now reduced to weakness, it was necessary to re-establish it on a just and beneficial scale. But at sight of this social ladder, at the summit of which every thing was in abundance—power, honours, fortune; whilst at its foot every thing was wanting, even to bread for the support of life, the constituent assembly experienced a violent re-action in their minds, and naturally felt an inclination to level all distinctions. It decided, therefore, that the whole mass of citizens, placed on a complete equality, should express their will, and that the king should be charged with the burden of its execution.

Its error here was, not in reducing royalty to a simple magistrature, for the king had still sufficient power to maintain the laws, and more than magistrates can be said to possess in a republic; but, in believing that a king, with the recollection of what he had been, could submit to such a reduction of authority; and that a people, just awakened, and who had recovered a great portion of public power, would be content without the acquisition of the whole. History, in fact, proves that magistratures should be multifariously divided, or that if one chief magistrate is established, he should be so amply gifted, that no desire of usurpation should harbour in his mind. The kings of Denmark, Sweden, and Poland, being placed near the attainment of power, could not content themselves with a moderate share of it, but, in the end, grasped the whole.

When nations, greatly occupied with their private interests, feel it needful to charge their sovereign with all the cares of government, they may perhaps act wisely in appointing one; but it might follow, that this sovereign, like the kings of England, possessing the authority of convoking and dissolving national assemblies, not receiving their will as obligatory, nor sanctioning it but in proper cases, and although only prevented from committing excesses, yet possesses in reality the greatest portion of supreme power. The dignity of man may very well be upheld under such a government, so long as the law is rigorously observed, and so long as each citizen feels his own station, and knows that such great powers committed to the hands of his prince, are not the result of an abandonment of right, but a concession to human inability.

But it is not at the moment when a nation is suddenly recalled to a sense of its rights, that it can renounce all its prerogatives, be content to play a secondary part, and yield up its omnipotence to a sovereign, lest his ambition might prompt him to usurp it. The constituent assembly was as little inclined as the nation itself to make such an abdication. It reduced the king, therefore, to a simple hereditary magistrate, trusting that the nation would leave him in possession of that title, and that he would content himself with that magistrature, which still shone with honours, riches, and power.

But whether the assembly expected this or not, could they, on account of any doubt they might entertain, cut the question short? Could they dethrone the king, or give him all the power possessed by English monarchs?

In the first place, they could not depose Louis XVI.; for if it be always necessary to make the rule of justice an essential ingredient in a government, it is not to change its form when justice is parcel of its character, or suddenly convert a monarchy into a republic. In the next place, possession should always create respect; and if the assembly had dispossessed the reigning dynasty, what would not their enemies have said, who accused them of violating property when they attacked the feudal rights?

On the other side, they could not give the king the absolute veto, the nomination of the judges, and other like privileges, because the public opinion was opposed to it; and as public opinion constituted their whole strength, they were obliged to yield to it.

As to the establishment of a single chamber, their error, perhaps, was more substantial, but quite as inevitable. If it were deemed inexpedient to leave nothing but the recollection of having possessed power to a king who had been absolute, and that in the face of a people who were desirous of stripping him of what remained, it was certainly much more false in principle to acknowledge inequalities of rank and social gradations, since republics themselves admit them, and, among all nations, either an elective or hereditary senate will be found to exist. But we must not, at a particular period, exact from men and from opinion more than the spirit of the times will allow them to perform. How could the necessity of gradations of rank be admitted at the moment of revolt against its excesses? How could an aristocracy be constituted at the moment of war against the aristocracy? To maintain the necessity of royalty would have been more practicable, because, being placed at a greater distance from the people, the king had been less oppressive than the nobility, and, moreover, would have performed those functions which seem of most acknowledged necessity.

But, I repeat it, if these errors had not been predominant in the assembly, they would have existed in the nation; and the course of events will prove, that if the assembly had left with the king and the aristocracy all those powers of which they deprived them, the revolution would nevertheless have taken place, and proceeded to its worst excesses.

To be convinced of this, it is necessary to distinguish between those revolutions which burst forth among a people who have been long enslaved, and those which take place among a free people; that is to say, who possess a certain degree of political activity. At Rome, at Athens, and elsewhere, the people and their chiefs, we observe, often contended for the possession of more or less authority. But among modern nations, which have been totally divested of their rights, the course must be different. Being completely enslaved, they lie long dormant. Their awakening takes place first among the most enlightened classes; and these, by their energetic efforts, recover a portion of that power to which they are entitled. The awakening is gradual, and so is also the ambition: it reaches the lowest classes, and the whole mass of the population is thrown into a state of excitement. The enlightened classes, soon satisfied with their acquisitions, would wish to stop, but cannot, and are hurried on by those who follow after them. Those who do stop in their career, even if only one step above the lowest, become in their eyes an aristocracy, and are branded with the name. Thus the simple tradesman is called an aristocrat by the labourer, and is persecuted as such.

The constituent assembly present to our ideas that enlightened class of citizens, who first take up arms against authority still all-powerful. With discrimination enough to perceive what is due to those who possessed all, and to those who were utterly destitute, they would willingly have left to the former a portion of what they possessed, because they always had been in possession, and, above all, have procured for the latter those rights which would have secured to them liberty and enlightenment. But regret is with the one, and ambition with the other; regret desires to recover everything, ambition to conquer everything. Thus a war of extermination commences. The constituents then are those worthy characters, who shaking off the yoke, and endeavouring to establish a just mean, make the effort without alarm, and even accomplish this great undertaking, but at last fail by endeavouring to make the one party concede something, and the other not to demand everything.

The constituent assembly, in their equal repartition of rights and property, had shown a desire to spare their ancient possessors. Louis XVI. having the title of king of France, thirty millions of revenue, the command of the armies, and the right of suspending the national will, still possessed sufficiently powerful prerogatives. The recollection of absolute power could alone excuse his want of resignation to such a brilliant relic of authority.

The clergy, deprived of their immense property, which they had received for the purpose of administering to the necessities of the poor, whom they neglected, and of supporting the expenses of a worship, which they left to indigent curates, were no longer a political body. But their ecclesiastical dignities were preserved, their dogmas respected, and their scandalous riches reduced to a competent revenue, which might even be called profuse, for it was still sufficient to support great episcopal luxury. The nobility were no longer an order; they possessed no longer the exclusive rights of the chace, and others of a similar nature; and they were no longer exempt from taxes; but could these things be made objects of reasonable regret? for their immense properties were left untouched. Instead of enjoying the exclusive favour of the court, they might climb to the highest eminence by merit. They might still be elected representatives of the people; the gown and sword were the prizes held out to their talents. Why did not a generous emulation at once animate them? What a shameful acknowledgment of incapacity did their lingering regrets of past privileges demonstrate!

The ancient pensioners met also with like consideration; the ecclesiastics received compensations; every one obtained consideration; that equal lot which the constituent assembly had dealt to all, had it become so insupportable?

The constitution being now firmly established, there remained no hopes of the king recovering, by debates and conferences, those prerogatives, the loss of which he regretted. He had but one course left him, and that was, to resign himself to his loss, and to maintain the constitution, unless indeed he relied upon foreign powers; but he entertained little hope from their sympathy, and had little faith in the exertions of the emigrants. He appeared cordially to conform to the necessity of his situation, and his intention of pointing out to the assembly what he conceived to be the defects of the constitution, proved the sincerity of his views. He was however diverted from this intention, and determined to await, from the course of events, those restitutions of power, which he believed were his due. The queen was not less resigned. "Courage," said she to the minister Bertrand, who introduced himself to her, "all is not yet lost; the king will adhere to the constitution; this line of conduct is certainly the best;" and it may be believed that, if she had other thoughts to express, she would not have hesitated before Bertrand de Molleville*.

The first assembly being dissolved, some of its members returned to their families in the provinces, and some still continued in Paris. Some of the more influential members, such as Lameth, Duport, and Barnave, held constant communications with the court, and offered their advice; but Louis decided, that inasmuch as he was to adhere to the constitution, he ought not to suffer himself to be persuaded to follow the advice received from these counsellors; for they exhorted him, not only to abstain from violating the constitution, but to make it be believed, by his actions, that he was sincerely attached to it. These members of the former assembly, joined by Lafayette since the Revision, were the leaders of that revolutionary generation, who may be said to have first proscribed the limitations of absolute liberty, with the desire to adhere to them. They were at this period supported by the national guard, whose long services under Lafayette had entirely attached them to him and to his principles; the constituents then did themselves the injury of despising the new assembly, whom they irritated by their contempt. Indeed, a species of aristocratical vanity seems to have possessed these first legislators, and they appear to have thought that all legislative science had disappeared when they had ceased to be legislators.

The new assembly was composed promiscuously of all classes of men; among them were some enlightened partisans of the early period of the revolution. Ramond, Girardin, Vaublanc, Dumas, and others, who styled themselves constitutionalists, and occupied the right side, where there was no longer one single individual of the ancient privileged orders. Thus, by the natural and progressive course of the revolution, the left side of the first assembly had become the right of the second†. Besides these constitutionalists, the assembly contained many men of distinguished talents, but of exaggerated ideas, and heated imaginations. Having been witnesses of the proceedings of the constituent assembly, and possessing all the impatience of those who long to take an active part, they thought that enough had not yet been accomplished; they did not, however, dare to avow themselves republicans, because, from all sides, they were recommended to be faithful to the constitution; but the notion of a republic, which had been imbibed during the journey of Louis XVI.‡, and the suspected intentions of the court, occasioned that idea to unceasingly recur to their minds; and that state of continual hostilities with which they found themselves well opposed to the government, attached them still more powerfully to this notion of republicanism.

‡ The consequences of the king's journey to Varennes, was a discussion whether he had not forfeited his crown, ante, p. 70.

Among this new generation of talents, the deputies who were principally remarkable were those of the Gironde, from whom an entire party, though composed of men from all the departments, took its name, and were called Girondists. Condorcet, an author celebrated for the extent of his capacity and the severity of his principles and character, was its writer; and Vergniaud, an extempore speaker, who possessed a pure and flowing style of eloquence, its orator. This party, continually augmented by all who distrusted the court, were yet far from desiring such a republic as befel them in 1793; their minds were actively employed in producing such a republic, with all its illusory notions, its rigid virtues, and strict morality. Consequently enthusiasm and vehemence were the principal characteristics of such a republic.

Yet even this party must have its extremes; Chabot, Merlin de Thionville, and others, inferior in talent, went much beyond the other Girondins by more audacity, and became, after the overthrow of the throne, when they separated from the Gironde, the party of the Mountain. This second assembly also possessed, as did the first, an undetermined mass, who, without any predetermined engagement, voted sometimes with one party, and sometimes with the other. Under the constituent assembly, while substantial liberty prevailed, this body continued independent; but as its neutrality did not spring from conviction, but from indifference, in later assemblies, and during the reign of terror, its cowardly and contemptible conduct procured it the vulgar and degrading appellation of the belly (ventre).

The clubs*, at this period, acquired altogether a

* Clubs were then of recent introduction into France, and were evidently borrowed from the English. The first Club was established in Paris in the year 1782, and was little else than a newspaper reading room; politics being prohibited as a subject of conversation. On the breaking out of the Revolution, the avowed object of these associations was the discussion of political questions; they were formed with that view, and became of an exclusive character. The Baton Club was a meeting of those deputies of Brittany who sat in the States-General at Versailles, where this club was first formed in 1789, and where most of their members were admitted. After the national or constituent assembly had been transferred to Paris, this club took the appellation of the Club of the Friends of the Constitution (Club des amis de la Constitution) and at last obtained the name of the Jacobin Club (Club des Jacobins), from the locality of its meetings. The Club of 89; this Association was formed in the month of May, 1790, by Siéyès, Lafayette, Larochejaquelein, and others who were alarmed at the extravagancies which were exhibited by the Club of the Friends of the Constitution. This new club declared its object was to diffuse the true principles of liberty, and therefore was also styled Club de la propagande, The Impartial Club. This was a meeting formed in 1790, of the most moderate members of the right side; it held but two sittings when it became the Monarchical Club, the members became the object of hatred to the mob, who used them roughly, and it was soon closed by the municipal authority. The Club of the Feuillans; this club, in 1791 and 1792, opposed the republican opinions of the Jacobin Club. Its motto was: the Constitution, the whole Constitution, and nothing but the Constitution. The Cordeliers Club; this club was founded by Danton, Camille Desmoulins, Fabre d'Eglantine, and others. The Pantheon Club; this was an association of the Revolutionists formed during the Directory (1795); they held their meetings in the Pantheon. The Clichy Club; a monarchical club, which was formed new importance. Agitators under the constituent, they became domineering under the legislative assembly. The national representation not affording a theatre sufficiently ample to give scope to the ambition of all, those who could not gain admission there, took refuge in the clubs, where they formed a tribune and stormy debates. In these societies, all who possessed the faculty of public speaking, and all who loved discussion, and delighted in kindling the passions of party, that is, nearly the whole nation, were accustomed to assemble. The people crowded to this new spectacle, and occupied all the galleries; and found there, it is said, a lucrative employment, for orators began now to pay for applauses. The minister Bertrand acknowledged that he himself had paid for these venal acclamations.

The oldest of the clubs, that of the Jacobins, had acquired an extraordinary importance. The church where they assembled could scarcely contain their members and auditors. An immense amphitheatre, constructed in the form of a circus, occupied the spacious nave of the church of the Jacobins*. The "bureau" of the president and secretaries, where the votes of the society were collected, and its decisions registered, was placed in the centre; and an active correspondence stirred up the zeal of all the societies spread over the entire surface of France, these were styled affiliated societies (sociétés affiliées)†. This club, by its priority and organized violence, had constantly kept an ascendancy over all others, who wished to show themselves rather more moderate or more extravagant in their principles. The Lamouche, and all its most distinguished members, had, however, after the journey to Varennes, abandoned it, and gone over to the Feuillans. In this latter society the principles of all the moderate clubs were united; principles that never could have succeeded, because they were repugnant to the very purpose which induced them to run to these clubs, that of agitation. It was at the Feuillans that the constitutionalists, and all the partisans of the first revolution, were accustomed to meet. Thus the name of Feuillant became a title of proscription, with that of modéré.

Another club, that of the Cordeliers‡, endeavoured to rival, by its violence, that of the Jacobins. Camille Desmoulins was its writer, and Danton its leader. This last, although he had failed at the bar, succeeded in gaining the admiration of the multitude, on whom he produced a powerful effect by his violent gestures, sonorous voice, and extremely popular passions. The Cordeliers could not yet, with all their extravagances, gain the ascendancy over their rivals, to whom long custom carried the tide of the populace. Nearly all its members, however, belonged to the Jacobin club, and, on urgent occasions, assembled there, in the train of Danton, to determine a majority in favour of their principles.

Robespierre, who, as has been seen, distinguished himself in the constituent assembly by the severity of his principles, was excluded from the legislative by the decree of non-election, of which he himself had been the mover. He entrenched himself now among the Jacobins, where he domineered with absolute sway, by the dogmatism of his opinions, and a reputation for integrity, which had gained him the epithet of the incorruptible. Although panic-struck at the moment of the Revision, he afterwards regained his assurance, and persevered in acquiring popularity. He had met, however, lately two rivals, Brissot and Louvet, who provoked all his animosity; Brissot had been intimate with all the deputies of the first assembly; was the friend of Mirabeau and Lafayette, known to be a republican, and one of the most distinguished members of the legislative assembly; yet he possessed but little weight, although his talents were undoubtedly great. Louvet, who united to a warm temperament, a considerable degree of talent, and great civil intrepidity, was among the number of those who having been in the constituent assembly, had contemplated a republic, his lot therefore was naturally cast with the Girondists, and his contests with Robespierre confirmed this alliance. This party of the Gironde, which was without any particular purpose, formed by men who had too much merit to ally themselves to the populace, and sufficient splendour to be envied by the rabble and its chiefs, were being held together more by their relative situation than by any concerted combination: such a party must naturally have been brilliant though powerless, and must have fallen before the more organized factions which exalted themselves around it.

Such was then the state of France; the ancient privileged orders had retired beyond the Rhine. The partisans of the constitution occupied the right side of the assembly, the national guard, and the club of the Feuillans; the Girondins possessed the majority in the assembly, but not in the clubs, where plebeian violence carried the day: and finally, the most extravagant demagogues of this new epoch, seated on the highest benches of the assembly, and thence named "The Mountain," (La Montagne), were all-powerful in the clubs and with the mob.

Lafayette, who had divested himself of all military rank, was accompanied to his privacy by the homage and regret of his companions in arms. His command had not been delegated to a new general, but six captains commanded alternately the whole national guard. Bailly also, the faithful ally of Lafayette during three calamitous years, laid down the office of mayor. The opinions of the electors seemed divided between Lafayette and Pétion; but the court, who would not upon any consideration that the choice should fall upon Lafayette, although their private inclinations were favourable to him, preferred Pétion, republican as he was. The court had hoped to turn to advantage that frigid demennour in Pétion, mistaken for stupidity, (which it certainly was not,) and spent largely to secure him the majority, which he obtained, and he was appointed mayor. Pétion had an enlightened intellect, but in his mind and manners he was reserved, and seemed unmoved by anything but reason; he with considerable dexterity made himself useful to the republic against the court; a conformity of opinion attached him to the Girondins, and the envy which his new dignity excited in the Jacobins confirmed this alliance.

Nevertheless, in spite of these political inclinations, if the king could have been trusted, it is possible the suspicions of the Girondins might have been calmed, and then there being no pretext for any disturbances, the demagogue would have had no longer the means of inflaming the minds of the people.

The intentions of the king were certainly at this period decided; but, thanks to his weakness, they were at no time irrevocable. Proof of them was requisite before they could be believed; and before this proof could be displayed, he was exposed to more than one outrage. His character, although mild, was not without a certain disposition to resentment; his resolutions, therefore, might be easily shaken by the first errors of the assembly. This assembly having constituted itself, took the oath in an impressive manner upon the book of the constitution. Its first decree, relative to ceremonies, abolished the title of Sire, and of Majesty, usually given to the king, and enjoined, that when he appeared in the assembly, he should be seated on a chair exactly similar to that of the president*. These were the first effects of the republican spirit, and the pride of Louis XVI. was cruelly wounded by them. To avoid that which he considered as a humiliation, he resolved not to appear at the assembly, but to send his ministers to open the sessions. The assembly, however, regretting this first act of hostility, revoked its decree the next day, and thus gave a rare example of reconsideration. The king then met the assembly, and was received in the most gratifying manner. Unfortunately, however, it had been decreed that, if he sat down, the deputies might seat themselves also; this they did, and Louis XVI. saw in it a new insult. The plaudits he received could not heal this wound. He returned to the palace pale and with altered features, and so soon as he was alone with the queen, he threw himself on a seat, and with sobs exclaimed:—"Ah! Madame, you have witnessed this humiliation! What did you come to France to see!"—The queen endeavoured to console him, but his heart was deeply wounded, and his good resolutions shaken†.

Yet if, from henceforward, he meditated the having recourse to foreign powers, the inclinations of those powers could have given him but little hope. The declaration of Pillnitz had produced no effect, either from a coldness on the part of the sovereigns, or on account of the danger Louis XVI. would have run by their interference, having been, since his return from Varennes, the prisoner of the constituent assembly. The acceptance of the constitution was another motive for waiting for the results of experience before acting. This was the advice of Leopold, and the minister Kaunitz. Besides, when Louis XVI. notified to the foreign courts his acceptance of the constitution, and that it was his intention faithfully to observe it, Austria returned a very pacific reply, and Prussia and England did the same, professing their amicable relations. It is to be observed, that the neighbouring powers acted with more reserve than those who were more distant, such as Sweden and Russia, because they were more immediately compromised by a war. Gustavus, who contemplated a brilliant enterprise against France, replied to the notification, that he did not regard the king as free. Russia delayed explaining herself. Holland, the Italian principalities, and especially Switzerland, gave satisfactory answers. The electors of Trèves, and of Mayence, in whose territories were many emigrants, made unsatisfactory replies. Spain, besieged by emissaries from Coblenz, did not speak more plainly, and pretended that she desired time to ascertain if the king were really a free agent; but, at the same time, declared she had no intention of disturbing the tranquillity of the kingdom.

Such answers, none of which were decidedly hostile, the professed neutrality of England, the fickleness of Frederick-William, and the well-known pacific dispositions of Leopold, all seemed to tend to peace. It is difficult to know what passed in the vacillating mind of Louis XVI., but his evident interest, and the fears with which the idea of war inspired him at a later period, inclines us to believe, that he also desired the preservation of peace. In the midst of this general quiescence the emigrants alone breathed nothing but war, and made warlike preparations.

They assembled together in crowds at Coblenz, armed themselves with expedition prepared magazines, established markets of military stores, formed squadrons which were never completed, for none of these grandees would become soldiers, created captaincies which they sold; and, though they attempted nothing really dangerous, made great preparations, which they themselves thought formidable, and calculated to make an impression upon the people.

The great question now was, whether Louis XVI. inclined to them or not; and it was very difficult to believe that he was not very much disposed to encourage relations and subjects who armed themselves to restore him to his ancient privileges. Nothing less than the greatest sincerity, and the most continual proof, was necessary to convince the people to the contrary. The letters of the king to the emigrants invited, and even ordered, them to return to France, but he carried on, it was affirmed*, a secret intercourse, which bolied his public correspondence and destroyed its effect. It is undoubtedly true that secret communications were carried on with Coblenz, but there is no reason to suppose that Louis XVI. availed himself of them to annul the injunctions he had publicly given to the emigrants. It was evidently his interest that they should return. Their presence at Coblenz could be in no way useful, without they intended to commence hostilities immediately; and Louis XVI. feared a civil war more than any thing else. Not wishing, therefore, to employ their swords on the Rhine, it was much more to his advantage that they should be near him, that they might be at hand in case of need, and unite their efforts to those of the constitutionalists, to protect his person and his throne. Besides, their presence at Coblenz provoked the enacting of severe laws which he would not sanction; his refusal of the sanction would compromise him with the assembly; and it will be seen, that it was the use which he made of the veto which completely deprived him of all popularity, and made him looked upon as the coadjutor of the emigrants. It would have been strange if he had not perceived the justice of these reasons, which all his ministers felt. They unanimously considered that the emigrants should return, to be nearer his person, and thus afford him their protection, put an end to the alarms which were continually raised, and deprive the agitators of every justification for civil war. This was even the opinion of Bertrand de Molleville, whose inclinations were any thing but constitutional. "It is necessary," said he, "to employ all possible means to augment the popularity of the king. The most efficacious and most useful of all, at the present moment, is to recall the emigrants. Their return, so generally desired, would re-embody the royalist party, which the emigration has so entirely disorganized. This party, fortified by the discredit thus brought upon the assembly, and recruited by the numerous deserters from the constitutional party, and all the discontented, would soon become sufficiently powerful to render that explosion, which must sooner or later take place, decisively in favour of the king.*"

Louis XVI., in conformity with this advice of his ministers, addressed exhortations to the heads of the army and the officers of the navy, to recall them to their duty and their posts. But these exhortations were useless, and the desertion continued without interruption. The minister of war announced the desertion of nineteen hundred officers. The assembly could no longer restrain their indignation, and resolved to take vigorous measures in support of their authority. The constituent assembly had contented themselves with pronouncing the deprivation of public functionaries who left the kingdom, and with imposing a triple taxation on the property of the emigrants, to indemnify the state for the loss of their services during their absence. The new assembly proposed still more severe penalties.

Many bills were brought in. Brissot divided the emigrants into three classes; the instigators of desertion, public functionaries who abandoned their duties, and, finally, those who, through fear, fled from their native country. "It is necessary," said he, "to punish the former, and despise and pity the latter."

It is certain that the liberty of man does not permit of his being chained to his native soil; but when it is made plainly evident, that citizens who abandon their country do so for the purpose of assembling in a foreign land to assume an hostile attitude, it is clearly justifiable to take precautions against such dangerous projects.

The debate on the subject was protracted and obstinate. The constitutionalists opposed all the measures which were suggested, and maintained that the vain efforts of the emigrants should be despised by the assembly, as they had always been by their predecessors. Yet the Girondins carried their point, and a preliminary act was passed, which ordered Monsieur, the king's brother, to return to France in two months, in default of which he would lose his eventual right to the regency. The second act, against the emigrants in general, was more severe; it declared that the French assembled beyond the frontiers of the kingdom were suspected of a conspiracy against France; that if, on the first of January next, they still continued in a state of muster, they should be deemed conspirators, treated as such, and punished with death; and that the revenues of the contumacious should be received for the profit of the nation, without prejudice to the rights of women, children, or legitimate creditors*.

The act of emigration not being reprehensible in itself, it is difficult to define a case which renders it penal. All that the law could do was to warn the emigrants beforehand, that they would be deemed criminal in certain cases; and those who did not wish to be treated as such, had only to obey the law, and those who knew that prolongation of absence from the kingdom would constitute crime, and did not return, declared themselves content to be deemed criminals. Those who, without any motives of war or policy, were out of the kingdom, were bound to hasten their return; and an abridgment of a journey of pleasure or interest was a light sacrifice when put in comparison with the safety of the state.

Louis XVI., to satisfy the assembly and the public, consented to the decree which ordered the return of Monsieur, under pain of losing his right to the regency; but he placed his veto on the law against the emigrants. The ministers were ordered in a body to wait on the assembly to announce the will of the king†. Several decrees were first read, to which the sanction‡ was given; when that concerning the emigrants came to hand, a profound silence took place in the assembly; and when the keeper of the great seal pronounced the official formula, "the king will advise upon this" (Le Roi examinera) great discontent was manifest on all sides. The minister then wished to express the motives of the veto; but a multitude of voices were raised against this attempt, and he was told that the constitution gave the king the right of refusing his assent, but not of explaining his reasons. The minister was obliged therefore to retire, leaving the assembly in the greatest irritation. This first resistance of the king was a definitive rupture with the assembly; and although he sanctioned the decree which deprived his brother of the regency, they could not prevent themselves from observing that a marked affection for the insurgents at Coblenz was perceptible in his refusal to assent to the second decree. It was recalled to mind, that the king was their relative, their friend, and in some manner united to them by the same interest; and therefore it was concluded that it was impossible for him not to make common cause, with them against the nation.

On the next day Louis XVI. published a proclamation to the emigrants, and two private letters to each of his brothers. The arguments with which he enforced both of them are excellent, and possess the appearance of sincerity. He prayed them to destroy, by their return, the suspicions which ill-disposed people delighted in propagating. He implored them not to force him to use severe measures against them; and said that, as to his want of liberty, on the pretence of which many justified their disobedience, he gave them a proof to the contrary by the veto which he had just opposed in their favour*. Be this as it may, these reasons neither produced at Coblenz or at Paris the apparently intended effect. The emigrants did not return; and in the assembly, the tone of the proclamation was thought to be too gentle, and even the right which the executive power had of making one was contested. The public, in fact, were too much irritated to be content with a proclamation, and, above all, to permit the king's substitution of an useless measure for the vigorous measures which they had resorted to.

A new demonstration of the same kind was fastened upon the king at this juncture, and led to a result equally unfortunate. The first religious disturbances had broken out in the west; and the constituent assembly had sent two commissioners into that part of the country, of whom one was Gensonné, afterwards so celebrated in the party of the Gironde. Their report was made to the legislative assembly, and although very moderate, excited great indignation. It will be recollected, that the constituent assembly, whilst they deprived the nonjuring priests of their situations, they left them a pension, and the liberty of practising their worship apart. These priests had not ceased, since then, to excite the animosity of the people against their brethren who had taken the oath, and to represent them as impious, and their ministry dangerous. They drew the peasants in their train to mass at long distances from their homes, who became irritated at seeing their church used for the purposes of a worship which they believed bad, and at being obliged to travel so far to seek that which they thought good. Many also took part with the constitutional priests. Civil war was imminent†; new information was brought to the assembly, which displayed the danger of the nation in a still more striking point of view. The assembly then contemplated taking measures against these new enemies of the constitution, similar to those which had been taken against those beyond the Rhine, and making a new experiment as to the inclinations of the king.

The constituent assembly had ordered the oath of civism to be administered to all the priests. Those who refused to take it forfeited the office of ministers of the public worship paid by the state, but they still retained the pensions of simple ecclesiastics, and the liberty of privately exercising their ministry. Nothing could be more gentle and moderate than this step. The legislative assembly again administered the oath, and deprived those who refused it of all conditions. As they had abused their liberty by exciting civil war, the assembly decreed that, if their conduct required it, they should be transported from one place to another, and even condemned to imprisonment if they refused to obey. Finally, they were deprived of the free exercise of their private worship, and administrative bodies were ordered to send a list of these non-jurors to the assembly, with comments on their conduct*.

This measure, as also that against the emigrants, sprung from the desire of self-preservation, a desire which takes strong hold of threatened governments, and causes them to fortify themselves with excessive precautions. It is not so much the perpetrated act which they punish, it is the presumed attack which they prosecute; and the measures of the assembly became arbitrary and cruel in exact proportion to the suspicion they harboured.

The bishops and priests who remained at Paris, and still kept up some communication with the king, addressed a petition to him against this decree: the king, whose religion was so scrupulous, and who had always reproached himself with having sanctioned the decree of the constituent assembly, did not need their persuasions to induce him to withhold his assent. "As to this decree," said he, speaking of the new bill, "I would rather lose my life than sanction it." The ministers were nearly of the same opinion; and Barnave and Lamez, whom the king sometimes consulted, advised him to refuse his sanction; but to this counsel they added other exhortations which the king could not make up his mind to follow: it was, in opposing the decree, not to leave any doubt as to inclinations, and, for that purpose, to dismiss from his person all priests who rejected the oath, and to allow none but constitutional ecclesiastics to officiate in his chapel. But of all the advice which was given him, the king only followed that portion which suited his own weakness and devotional feeling. D'Anfort-Dutertre, the keeper of the seals, and the ministerial organ of the constitutional party, approved of their advice; and when the council had determined, to the great satisfaction of Louis XVI., that the reto should be opposed to the decree, they added, that it would be highly proper that the king's person should be approached by none but unsuspected priests. At this proposition, Louis XVI., ordinarily so pliant, displayed an invincible obstinacy, and said that the liberty of worship which had been granted to every one, should also be granted to him equally with his subjects, and that he certainly should retain the power of calling about him such priests as he chose. The council did not persist; and, whilst the assembly was still ignorant of what had passed, the reto was decided on.

The constitutional party, to which the king seemed to lean at this time, imparted to him another species of advantage; it was that of the Directory of the department. This Directory was composed of the most considerable members of the constituent assembly. Among them were the Duke de la Rochefoucauld, the Bishop of Autun, Baumez, Desmouliniers, Ansons, &c. They drew up a petition to the king, not as an administrative body, but as an assembly of petitioners, and begged the king to oppose the reto to the decree against the priests.

"The national assembly," said the petition, "has certainly intended well; we rejoice to shield it from the calumnies of base detractors; but a laudable intention has driven it into measures which neither the constitution, justice, nor prudence, can admit of. The payment of the pensions of all the ex-official ecclesiastics has been made to depend upon their taking the oath of civism, whereas the constitution has expressly and literally placed these pensions in the rank of national debts. Can the refusal to take any oath destroy an acknowledged title of credit? The constituent assembly has already done all that can be done with regard to the non-juring priests; they have refused to take the prescribed oath, and have been deprived of the exercise of their functions; and, by this rejection of their services, they have been reduced to a pension. The legislative assembly now desires that all the ecclesiastics who have not taken the oath, or who have since retracted it, should, in the midst of the religious distractions which prevail, be temporarily banished, or imprisoned if they should not obey the order brought them to that effect. Is not this to renew the system of arbitrary orders, since it is permitted to punish with exile, and shortly after with imprisonment, one who is not convicted of being refractory to any law? The national assembly also refuses to all those who refuse to take the oath of civism, the free exercise of their worship. But this liberty can never be taken from any one; it is for ever consecrated by the declaration of rights."

These reasons were, undoubtedly, excellent, but neither the resentments or fears of party are appeased by mere appeals to reason. How was it possible to persuade an assembly, that obstinate priests ought to be permitted to excite discord and civil war? The Directory incurred the most abusive calumny, and its petition to the king was opposed by a multitude of others addressed to the legislature. Camille Desmoulins presented one remarkable for its boldness. An increasing violence of language, and a disregard to all that respect which had hitherto been observed towards the constituted authorities and the king, might be observed in it. Desmoulins told the assembly that a great example was necessary; that an impeachment should be drawn up against the Directory; that eminent men were the proper objects of punishment; that they should strike at the head and hurl thunder against the conspirators; that the power of the royal reto had a limitation; and that no reto could hinder the taking of the Bastille. Louis XVI., although determined to refuse his sanction, deferred communicating it to the assembly. He wished first to conciliate their opinion. He had chosen his ministers from the constitutional party. Montmorin, fatigued by his laborious career under the constituent, and his disagreeable negotiations with all parties, determined not to brave the storms of a new legislature, and retired, in spite of the entreaties of the king to retain him. The ministry of foreign affairs, refused by many persons, was accepted of by Delessart, who gave up for it that of the Interior*. Delessart, an upright and talented man, was under the influence of the constitutionalists; but he was not strong enough to impart resolution to the intentions of the king, to make an impression on powers abroad, or on factions at home. Cahier de Gerville, a decided patriot, of rather distant than attractive manners, was placed in the office of the Interior, to satisfy the public opinion. Narbonne, a young man, full of activity and ardour, a zealous constitutionalist, and very much adapted to gain popularity, was placed in the war department by the ministerial party. He would have possessed a salutary influence in the council, and, perhaps, conciliated the assembly to the king, if Bertrand de Molleville, a counter-revolutionist, and preferred to all others by the court, had not been his adversary. Bertrand de Molleville, detesting the constitution, artfully adhered to its text, the better to attack its spirit, and sincerely desired the king to attempt its strict execution, "but solely for the purpose," said he, "of testing its impracticability." The king could not make up his mind to dismiss him, and it was, therefore, with this discordant ministry that he endeavoured to pursue his course. After having attempted to conciliate the public opinion by his choice of ministers, he tried other means with the same intention, and appeared to take part in all the diplomatic and military measures which were proposed against the musters of emigrants formed on the Rhine.

The last repressive laws had been quashed by the réto, yet nevertheless new information was brought to the assembly every day of the preparations and threats of the emigrants. The procès-verbaux of the municipalities of the departments bordering on the frontier, and the reports of merchants coming from beyond the Rhine, declared that the Viscount de Mirabeau, brother of the celebrated constituent, was at the head of six hundred men, in the bishopric of Strasbourg; that, in the territory of the elector of Mayence near Worms, numerous corps of fugitives were embodied, under the orders of the Prince de Condé; that the same thing was taking place at Coblenz, and in the electorate of Trèves; that excesses and violences had been committed against the French; and that, finally, the proposition had been made to general Wimpfen, of delivering up Neuf-brisach. These reports, added to all that was known by public notoriety, aggravated the assembly to the highest pitch of irritation. The draught of an act requiring the electors to make the emigrants lay down their arms was immediately proposed. A final decision on this measure was postponed for two days, that it might not appear too precipitate. The postponement having elapsed, the debate opened.

The Deputy Isnard was the first to speak: he pointed out the necessity of securing the tranquillity of the kingdom, not merely in a temporary way, but in a permanent manner; and of putting a term to disturbances by prompt and vigorous measures, a course which would exhibit to all Europe the patriotic resolutions of France. "Do not fear," said he, "to provoke war with the great powers; interest has already decided their intentions; your measures will not change them, but merely oblige them to explain themselves.—The conduct of the nation should be answerable to its new destiny. Enslaved under Louis XIV., it was nevertheless grand and intrepid; at present, enjoying freedom, should it be feeble and timid? 'Those are deceived,' said Montesquieu, 'who believe that a people in a state revolution can easily be conquered; they are more likely, on the contrary, to conquer others.' (applauses.)

"Capitulations are proposed to you! There are those who wish to augment the royal prerogative, to augment the power of the king, of a man whose will can paralyze that of the whole nation, of a man who receives thirty millions, whilst millions of citizens die of want.—(Renewed applause.) There are those who wish to bring back the nobility! If all the nobles of the earth came to assail us, Frenchmen, guarding their property in one hand, and grasping their swords in the other, would crush this haughty race, and force them to endure the yoke of equality!

"Speak to the ministers, to the king, and to Europe, the language which becomes the representatives of France. Tell the ministers, that hitherto you have not been well satisfied with their conduct, but that by responsibility you mean death. (Prolonged applauses.) Say to Europe that you respect the constitutions of all empires, but that if a war of kings is declared against France, you will declare a war of the people against kings! (Applauses were here again renewed.) Respect," exclaims the speaker, "have respect for my enthusiasm, it is for liberty. Tell them," added he, "that the wars people enter into by the order of despots resemble the quarrels of two friends, excited by a perfidious instigator, and are carried on in darkness! If light breaks in upon them they embrace one another, and revenge themselves on their deceivers. So it would be if hostile armies fought with ours; light would burst in upon them, and the people would embrace one another, in the face of their dethroned tyrants, the tranquillized earth, and the congratulating heavens!"

The enthusiasm excited by this speech was so great, that the assembly pressed round the orator to embrace him. The decree which he supported was adopted immediately. M. de Vaublanc was ordered to carry it to the king, at the head of a deputation of twenty-four members. By this decree the assembly declared that they deemed it necessary to require of the electors of Trèves, Mayence, and of the other princes of the empire, to put an end to the assemblages formed on the frontier. They prayed the king, at the same time, to hasten the negotiations entered into with regard to the indemnities due to the princes possessing territories in Alsace.

M. de Vaublanc presented this decree, accompanied by a most firm and respectful discourse, which was very much applauded by the assembly. "Sire," said he, "if the French driven from their country by the revocation of the edict of Nantes had assembled in arms on the frontiers, if they had been protected by the princes of Germany, Sire, we ask you, what would have been the conduct of Louis XIV.? Would he have suffered these musters? That which he would have done for the support of his authority, may it please your majesty to do for the maintenance of the constitution!"

Louis XVI. being resolved, as we have already said, to diminish the effect of his veto, by acts conciliatory of public opinion, determined to go in person to the assembly, and answer their message by a speech of a conciliatory nature.

On the evening of the 14th of December, the king proceeded to the assembly, after having announced his intention in the morning by a simple note. He was received in profound silence. He said that the message of the assembly called for the most attentive consideration, and that on an occasion when the honour of the nation was concerned, he thought it his duty to come personally among them; that having the same intentions as the assembly, but dreading the calamities of war, he had endeavoured to bring the emigrant French to a sense of their duty; that amicable overtures being useless, he had anticipated the message of the representatives, and had signified to the electors, that if, before the 15th of January, all musters had not ceased, they would be considered as the enemies of France; that he had written to the emperor to demand his intervention in his quality of head of the empire, and that in case satisfaction should not be obtained, he would declare war. He finished by saying, that it was in vain any one endeavoured to make the exercise of his authority disagreeable to him, that he would faithfully adhere to the constitution, and that he felt deeply the honour of being the king of a free people.

Plaudits succeeded to the silence which had been first observed, and recompensed the king for the reception he had received on entering. The assembly having ordered in the morning that he should be replied to by a message, could not express at the moment its satisfaction, but determined that his speech should be sent to the eighty-three departments. Narbonne entered immediately afterwards to acquaint the assembly with the measures which had been taken to assure the effect of the injunctions addressed to the empire. "An hundred and fifty thousand men are ordered," said the minister, "to be assembled on the Rhine. Three generals are appointed to command them, Luckner, Rochambeau, and Lafayette." Applause accompanied the announcement of this last name. Narbonne added, that he was about to visit the frontiers, to ascertain the state of the fortified towns, and to put the construction of all necessary fortifications in the greatest state of forwardness; that undoubtedly the assembly would grant the necessary funds, and would not act niggardly in the cause of liberty. "No, no," resounded from all parts. Finally, he required to be informed whether the assembly, although the legal number of marshals were complete, would permit the king to confer that rank on the two generals, Luckner and Rochambeau, who were appointed the guardians of liberty. Acclamations announced the consent of the assembly, and the satisfaction which the activity of the young minister gave. By such a conduct as this Louis XVI. would soon have become popular, and have conciliated the republicans, who only wished for a republic, because they believed the king was not capable of regarding and defending liberty.

The king took advantage of the satisfaction produced by these measures to signify his veto upon the act against the clergy. On the morning, care was taken to insert in all the journals the dismissal of the former diplomatic agents accused of aristocratical opinions, and the appointment of others in their place. With these precautions, the message was received without a murmur. The assembly had expected it, and the sensation it produced was not so angry a one as might have been expected. Here it is to be observed to what a number of contrivances the king was obliged to have recourse in order to exercise his prerogative, and how dangerous it was for him to avail himself of it. Even if the constituent assembly, who have been accused of ruining him by depriving him of it, had granted him the absolute veto, would it have made him more powerful? Had not the suspensive veto in this instance all the effect of an absolute veto? Was it legal power, or the control of public opinion, which the king wanted? The result has clearly answered this question; it was not the want of sufficiently powerful prerogatives which ruined Louis XVI., but the inconsiderate use of those which he possessed.

The expedition which the assembly had been led to expect, did not relax; the motions for the expences of the war, and for the appointment of the two field-marshal, Luckner and Rochambeau, were passed without the slightest opposition. Lafayette, snatched from the retreat whither he had retired to repose after his three years of fatigue, presented himself to the assembly, and received the most cordial welcome. The battalions of the national guard accompanied him out of Paris; every thing proved to him that the name of Lafayette was not forgotten, and that he was looked upon as one of the founders of liberty.

In spite of all these preparations, Leopold, who was of a pacific disposition, did not desire war, for he knew that it did not suit his interests, but he wished a congress to be held, supported by a commanding force, to bring about an accommodation, and some reforms in the constitution. The emigrants wished for no reforms, but a complete destruction of the new fabric of government. The emperor, more wise and prudent, knew that much must be conceded to the new opinions, and that all that could be accomplished, was, at most, the restoration of a few prerogatives to the king, and a change in the formation of the legislative body, by admitting two chambers instead of one*. This last measure was that most feared, and oftenest made the subject of reproach to the feuillantines and constitutional party. It is certain that this party had, in the early days of the revolution, rejected the idea of an upper chamber, because they feared the nobility might entrench themselves in it; their apprehensions at present were no longer the same; they possessed, on the contrary, the reasonable expectation that it would afford them the means of almost their exclusive admittance to such a chamber. Many of the constituents, now reduced to complete nonentity, would there obtain an opportunity of appearing once more upon the theatre of politics. If, therefore, this upper chamber had not been the object of their views, still less did it identify itself with their interests. It is certain that the journals frequently spoke of it, and that it was a reproach against the constitutionalists in every one's mouth. How rapid had been the course of the revolution. The present right side was composed of the members of the old left side*; and the attempt at present feared, was no longer the return of the ancient régime, but the establishment of an upper chamber. How wonderfully all things had revolved since the year 1789, and how rapidly had an ill-advised resistance precipitated the course of events!

Leopold, therefore, saw that nothing but this amelioration could be effected for Louis XVI. Meanwhile, his object was to draw out the negotiations to a great length, and, without breaking with France, to make an impression on it by his firmness. But his reply marred his object: this reply consisted in referring to the conclusions of the diet of Ratisbonne, which refused to accept of any indemnities for the princes who had possessions in Alsace. Nothing could be more ridiculous than such a decision, for every territory comprised under one denomination should be subject to the same laws; if the princes of the empire possessed land in France, they ought to have submitted to the abolition of the feudal rights; the constituent assembly had already done much for them by granting them indemnities. Many of them having treated with the French government on this subject, the diet annulled their proceedings, and forbade them to enter into any arrangement. The empire pretended, in this manner, not to recognize the revolution in that which concerned itself. As to that which regarded the musters of the emigrants, Leopold, without explaining himself concerning their dispersion, answered Louis XVI., that the elector of Treves, not being able, according to the desires of the French government, to prevent the approaching hostilities, general Bender had been ordered to give him prompt assistance.

No reply could have been more unwise than this; it compelled Louis, that he might not seem to compromise himself, to take vigorous measures, and declare war. Delessart was immediately sent to the assembly to inform them of this answer, and to express the astonishment which the conduct of Leopold caused the king. The minister hinted that probably the emperor had been deceived, and had been falsely assured that the elector had fulfilled all the duties of a good neighbour. Delessart communicated, besides, the reply which had been returned to Leopold. It had been signified to him that, notwithstanding his reply, and the orders given to general Bender, if the electors had not at the prescribed time satisfied the requisition of France, arms would be employed against them. "If this declaration," said Louis in his letter of the 31st of December to the assembly, "does not produce the effect I hope from it, if it be the fate of France to enter into a contest with her children and allies, I will make known to Europe the justice of our cause, the people of France will courageously support it, and the nation shall see that its interests and mine are inseparably connected, and that I shall always regard the maintenance of its dignity, and the preservation of its safety as the most essential of all my duties."

These expressions, by which the king seemed, in a case of common danger, to identify himself with the nation, were loudly applauded. The papers were handed to a diplomatic committee, that they might make a speedy report on them to the assembly.

* Ante, page 27, col. 2, note

The queen was once again applauded at the opera, as in the days of her splendour and power, and she returned intoxicated with joy to her husband to tell him she had been welcomed by the public with as much enthusiasm as ever. But these were the last marks of admiration which she ever received from a people who formerly idolized her truly royal accomplishments. The sentiment of equality which remains so long stifled in the bosoms of men, and which is ungovernable when it is roused, already manifested itself on all sides. The year 1791 was now at its close; the assembly abolished the ancient ceremony of the new year's day, and decreed that the respect paid to the king on that anniversary should not be renewed in future. At about the same period, a deputation from the king complained that the folding doors of the council-room had not been opened for his entrance. The discussion which this gave rise to was scandalous, and the assembly, in writing to Louis XVI., suppressed the titles of Sire and of Majesty. On another occasion, a deputy entered the apartments of the king with his hat on his head, and in a slovenly dress. This conduct was often provoked by the bad reception the court gave to the deputies, and in these reprisals the pride of both parties kept pace with each other.

Narbonne pursued his appointed route with extraordinary celerity. Three armies were established on the menaced frontier. Rochambeau, an old general, not unpractised in the art of war, but at present in an ill state of health, peevish and discontented, commanded the army posted in Flanders, called the army of the north. Lafayette obtained that of the centre, and encamped towards Metz; and Luckner, an old warrior, a tolerable general, a brave soldier, and very popular in the camp by his military manners, commanded the division of Alsace. Such were the generals which a long peace and a general desertion had left us.

Rochambeau, discontented with the new system of things, and harassed by the undisciplined state of the army, did nothing but reiterate complaints, and gave the ministry no hopes of success. Lafayette, young, active, talented, and burning to distinguish himself in the defence of his country, re-established discipline among his troops, and surmounted all the difficulties which the ill-will of the officers, who were the aristocracy of the army, threw in his way. He called them together when he first assumed his command, and addressing them as gentlemen of honour, begged them to quit the camp if they were not determined to serve their country loyally; that if there were any who wished to retire, he would take upon himself to procure them even retreats in France, or passports into foreign lands; but that if they persisted in remaining with the army, he expected from them zeal and fidelity. He thus succeeded in establishing a better discipline among his troops than that which prevailed in either of the other divisions. As to Luckner, having no political opinions, and, consequently, easily yielding to any system, he promised the assembly much, and in truth, succeeded in gaining the attachment of his soldiers.

Narbonne, having travelled with the greatest celerity, returned, in a short time, to give an account to the assembly of his rapid expedition. He informed them that the reparation of all fortifications were already much advanced; that the army from Dunkirk to Besançon presented a mass of two hundred and forty battalions, and a hundred and sixty squadrons of cavalry, with the necessary artillery for two hundred thousand men, and provisions for six months. He bestowed the warmest praises on the patriotism of the volunteer national guards, and assured the assembly that, in a short time, their equipment would be complete. The young minister without doubt acquiesced in the illusions of zeal, but his intentions were so noble, and his commission executed so promptly, that the assembly declared his report called for the public gratitude, and sent it to all the departments—the ordinary method they observed in manifesting their satisfaction.

CHAPTER II.

DIVISION OF PARTIES UPON THE QUESTION OF WAR—THE CHARACTER ASSUMED BY THE DUKE OF ORLEANS AND HIS PARTY.—THE EMIGRANT PRINCES ARE IMPEACHED—FORMATION OF A GIRONDIST MINISTRY—DUMOURIÈZ, HIS CHARACTER, HIS GENIUS, AND DESIGNS; CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE NEW MINISTRY—INTERVIEW OF DUMOURIÈZ WITH THE QUEEN—DECLARATION OF WAR WITH THE KING OF HUNGARY AND BOHEMIA—THE FIRST MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE PANICS OF QUIÉVRAIN AND TOURNAI—MURDER OF GENERAL DILLON.

At the commencement of the year 1792, war was then the great question of the moment; war to be waged in defence of the very existence of the revolution. Its enemies being all abroad, it only remained to seek them, and conquer them. The king, as the head of the armies, would he act sincerely against his relatives and former courtiers? This was the doubt concerning which it was necessary to satisfy the nation.

It appears singular that the violent Jacobins, with Robespierre at their head, on this occasion advocated peace, whilst the moderate Jacobins, or Girondins, favoured war. Brissot and Louvet supported the latter opinion by their talents and influence. They thought with all the Girondins, that it would be advantageous to the nation, by putting an end to a dangerous uncertainty, and discovering the true intentions of the king. These men, judging of the result from their own enthusiastic estimation of the courage of France, never imagined the possibility of the nation being conquered, and they also thought that if the treacherous conduct of the king interposed any temporary check to the successful progress of hostilities, France would at once know how to act, and would depose her faithless king. How happened it that Robespierre and the other Jacobins did not desire an event which would have brought about so prompt and decisive a crisis? This can only be explained by conjectures. Was the timid Robespierre afraid? or did he oppose the war because Brissot and Louvet advocated its necessity with so much eloquence and ability? Whatever were his reasons, he contended for peace with great obstinacy. The Cordeliers, who were Jacobins, supported Robespierre in this opinion. They seemed to fear that war would give too many advantages to Lafayette, and eventually procure him a military dictatorship. This was the constant bugbear of Camille Desmoulins, who never ceased to figure him as being at the head of a victorious army, crushing, as at the Champ de Mars*, both Jacobins and Cordeliers under his feet. Louvet and the Girondists supposed the Cordeliers to be actuated by another motive, and that they pursued Lafayette as the enemy of the Duke of Orleans, with whom it was said they were secretly connected.

The Duke of Orleans, who again appears as being the object of suspicion to his enemies rather than a prominent object in the revolution, was at this time almost entirely eclipsed. At the commencement of the revolution some persons availed themselves of his name, and he himself conceived some hope from those to whom he lent it; but every thing was much changed since then. He himself, feeling how much he was out of his place in the popular party, had endeavoured to obtain the pardon of the court towards the close of the constituent assembly, but had been rejected. Under the legislative assembly, he retained his rank among the admirals, and made new attempts to gain the favour of the king. On this occasion he was admitted into the king's presence, had a long conversation with him, was not badly received, and was invited to return to the palace. On his return the queen's dinner table was set, and the courtiers assembled in great numbers. The moment he made his appearance he was attacked on all sides by the most insulting expressions. "Take care of the dishes," was echoed from all parts, as if poison had been feared. The courtiers crowded round him, trod on his toes, elbowed and pushed him from one corner of the apartment to the other, and obliged him to retire. In descending the stairs he received new outrages, and quitted the palace in indignation, believing that the king and queen had prepared this scene of humiliation for him. Yet they were perfectly ignorant of what had happened till afterwards, and were greatly grieved at the imprudence of the courtiers*. The duke was more exasperated against the court than ever; but this did not make him a more active or a more able head of any party than before. His friends, however, who occupied the Jacobin club, and the assembly, undoubtedly made more stir; from that point, his faction seemed to re-appear, and his hopes and pretensions appeared to revive with the dangers of the throne.

The Girondists believed that the violent Cordeliers and Jacobins only contended for peace, to deprive Lafayette, the rival of the Duke of Orleans, of the advantages which war might procure him. But whatever there might be in this supposition, war, opposed by the Jacobins, but maintained by the Girondists, prevailed in the assembly, where the latter were ascendant. The assembly commenced their operations by drawing up an impeachment against Monsieur, the brother of the king, the Count d'Artois, the prince de Condé, Calonne, the young Mirabeau, and Laqueuille, as having since the 1st of January been engaged in hostilities against France. An act of impeachment not being subject to the sanction, they had no veto to fear on this occasion. The sequestration of the property of the emigrants, and the appropriation of their revenues to the expenses of the state, decreed by the unsanctioned act, were ordered anew by another decree, which met with no opposition from the king. The assembly seized upon these revenues under the title of indemnities of war, and Monsieur was deprived of the regency by virtue of the former act.

The report of the last communications with the emperor was presented to the assembly by Gensonné. He remarked that France had always been liberal in her money and soldiers to Austria, without ever obtaining any return; that the treaty of alliance, concluded 1756, had been violated by the declaration of Pillnitz*, whose object was to form an armed coalition of sovereigns; that it had been again broken by the arming of the emigrants, which was permitted and even seconded by the princes of the empire. He added, that although orders had been recently given for the dispersion of musters, these colourable orders had never been executed; that the white cockade had been constantly worn beyond the Rhine, the national cockade outraged, and French travellers ill-treated; and that consequently it was necessary to demand of the emperor a final explanation upon the treaty of 1756. This report was ordered to be printed, and its consideration adjourned.

On the same day, January 14th, 1792, Guadet ascended the tribune:—"Of all the facts," said he, "which have been communicated to the assembly, that which has most astonished me is the project of a congress, whose object will be to obtain the modification of the French constitution; this project has long been spoken of, and is finally announced as possible by the committees and the ministers. If it be true," added Guadet, "that this intrigue is conducted by men who believe that they therein see the means of their rising out of that political nonentity into which they have fallen; if it be true that some agents of the executive power second with all their ability this abominable conspiracy; if it be true that they wish to bring us, by lengthened negotiations and discouragements to accept of this shameful mediation, ought the national assembly to shut its eyes to such dangers? Let us swear," exclaimed the orator, "let us swear to die all here rather . . ." He was not suffered to finish the sentence; all the assembly rose up, and cried out:—Yes, yes, we swear it; and in the enthusiasm of the moment every one was immediately declared infamous, and a traitor to his country, who should take part in any congress for the purpose of modifying the constitution. This decree was particularly directed against the constitutionalists and the minister Delessart. It was particularly the latter who was accused of protracting the negotiations with foreign powers. On the 17th, the discussion on the report of Gensonné was resumed, and it was decreed that the king should never negotiate in future but in the name of the French nation, and that he should require of the emperor a definitive explanation of his intentions before the 1st of March. The king replied, that fifteen days ago positive explanations had been demanded from Leopold.

During this interval, the assembly were informed that the elector of Trèves, alarmed at the firmness and activity of the French government, had given fresh orders for the dispersion of all musters, for the sale of the magazines formed in the states, and for the prohibition of recruiting and military exercises, and that these orders had in fact been put into execution. In their present disposition, this news was coldly received by the assembly. They were determined to see in it nothing but vain demonstrations without any result, and persisted in demanding a definitive answer from Leopold.

Divisions existed in the ministry between Bertrand de Molleville and Narbonne. Bertrand was jealous of the popularity of the minister of the war department, and blamed his condescension to the assembly. Narbonne complained of the conduct of Bertrand de Molleville, and of his unconstitutional opinions, and wished the king to dismiss him from his service. Cahier de Gerville endeavoured to reconcile matters between them, but without success. It was pretended that the constitutional party wished to promote Narbonne to the dignity of prime minister, and it appeared that even the king had been deceived, that he was alarmed at the popularity and ambition of Narbonne, who was represented to him as a presumptuous and aspiring young man, who would control the cabinet. The journals coming to the knowledge of these divisions, Brissot and the Gironde warmly defended the minister threatened with disgrace, and violently attacked his colleagues and the king. A letter written by the three generals of the north to Narbonne, in which they expressed their fears for his dismissal, which they said was on the point of taking place, was published. The king dismissed the popular minister immediately; but, to balance the effect of this dismissal, that of Bertrand de Molleville was announced at the same time. It had not, however, the desired effect; an extraordinary ferment demonstrated itself, and the assembly declared, as it had formerly done in the case of Necker, that Narbonne possessed the confidence of the nation, and that the remainder of the ministry had lost it. They excepted, however, Cahier de Gerville from this condemnation, who had always opposed Bertrand de Molleville, and had only lately been engaged in a violent altercation with him. After the agitation caused by this dismissal had in some measure subsided, Brissot requested to be allowed to prove that Delessart had betrayed the confidence of the nation. This minister had confided to the diplomatic committee his correspondence with Kaunitz; this correspondence was found perfectly destitute of dignity, and even gave Kaunitz an unfavourable idea of the state of France, and seemed to have authorized the conduct and language of Leopold. It is necessary to bear in mind that Delessart, and his colleague Dupont-Dutertre, were the two ministers most particularly attached to the club of the Feuillans, and whom the assembly regarded with most aversion, because they were accused of favouring the plan of a congress.

In one of the most stormy sittings of the assembly, the unfortunate Delessart was accused of having compromised the dignity of the nation, of not having warned the assembly of the concert of foreign powers and of the declaration of Pillnitz, of having professed in his notes unconstitutional doctrines, of having given Kaunitz a false idea of the state of France, and of having protracted foreign negotiations, to the great detriment of the interests of the country. Vergniaud followed Brissot, and added fresh charges against the accused minister. He reproached him with having, when minister of the interior, kept much longer than was necessary in his portfolio, the act which united the Comtat to France, and of having thus caused the massacres of Avignon. "From this tribune whence I speak," continued he, "I perceive the palace of those perverse councillors, who mislead and deceive that king which the constitution has given us. I see the windows of that palace where a counter-revolution is planned, and means devised to re-plunge us into slavery . . . Terror has often, in former times, under the name of despotism, stalked forth from that famous palace; it should now re-enter thither in the name of the law, and penetrate deeply into the hearts of its possessors; that all those who there inhabit may know that our constitution grants inviolability to none but the king."

The act of impeachment was immediately put to the vote, and adopted; and Delessart was sent to the high national court established by the constitution at Orleans for the trial of state crimes. The king saw him depart with the greatest grief; he had given him his entire confidence, and encouraged his moderate and pacific views. Duport-Duterte, a minister of the constitutional party, was also threatened with an accusation, but he anticipated it, demanded the liberty of justifying himself, was absolved by order of the day, and immediately after gave in his resignation. Cahier de Gerville also did the same; and in this manner was the king deprived of the only ministers who had any reputation for patriotism in the eyes of the assembly.

Separated from the ministers which the Feuillans had given him, and not knowing where to look for support in the midst of the storm which surrounded him, Louis XVI., who had dismissed Narbonne because he was too popular, thought now of uniting himself to the Gironde, which was republican. It is true they were only so through distrust of the king, and if once he had delivered himself up to their councils, it is possible they might have become attached to his person and to royalty. But, to accomplish this, he should sincerely have adopted their views; but the everlasting question as to his sincerity was raised again upon this, as indeed it was upon every occasion. Assuredly Louis XVI. was sincere when he trusted himself entirely to one party; but it was never done without ill temper and regret; thus, when this party imposed upon him a difficult but necessary condition, he rejected it; distrust immediately took place, asperity of feeling was the consequence, and a rupture concluded these ill-assorted alliances between persons occupied too exclusively by opposite interests. It was thus that Louis XVI., after having taken the constitutional party into his confidence, dismissed Narbonne who was its chief; and to appease the storm which was raised about him, was obliged at last to abandon himself to the Gironde. The example of England, where the king often takes his ministers from the opposition, was one of the motives of Louis XVI. The court then conceived hopes, for in the saddest conjuncture no one is without hope, they hoped that Louis XVI., by promoting incapable and ridiculous demagogues, would destroy the reputation of the party from which he had chosen them. But this did not take place, and the new ministry was not such as the wickedness of the courtiers would have desired.

It was little more than a month since Delessart and Narbonne had called into their councils a man whose talents appeared most valuable: this was Dumouriez, who had displayed great military abilities both in Normandy and La Vendée, where he had held a command. At one time he offered his services to the court, at another to the constituent assembly; both parties were alike to him, provided they gave occupation to his activity, and extraordinary talents. Dumouriez, who could make no figure in such an age as the present, had passed some part of his life in diplomatic intrigues; yet with all his boldness, his military and political genius, and his fifty years' experience, he was nothing more than a brilliant adventurer at the opening of the French revolution. He still retained, however, all the fire and hardihood of youth; and the moment a war or a revolution threatened, he made plans and addressed himself indiscriminately to all parties, caring little about opinions, and only desirous of being employed for some one or other. He thus habitually considered the merits of a cause as of no importance; but although too little governed by conviction, he was generous, sensitive, and capable of attachments, if not to principles, at least to persons. With a mind so apt, prompt, and comprehensive, and a courage by turns calm and impetuous, he was admirably calculated to serve in any cause, but was incapable of commanding. He possessed neither the dignity of a moral conviction, or the pride of a despotic will, and could govern none but soldiers. If, with his genius, he had been actuated by the passions of Mirabeau, the determination of a Cromwell, or merely the dogmatism of Robespierre, he would have governed the French revolution.

Dumouriez, when called into the confidence of Narbonne, formed with the greatest celerity a vast plan of military operations. He suggested the idea of a war at the same time offensive and defensive. Every where within the natural limits of France, the Rhine, the Alps, the Pyrenees, and the sea, he proposed merely a defensive war; but in the Low Countries, where our territory does not extend as far as the Rhine; and in Savoy, where it does not reach to the Alps, he urged immediate hostilities, and that when he had reached the natural limits of the country, he proposed to act on the defensive. This was to reconcile, at the same time, our interests and our principles; and to profit by a war which we had not provoked, by regaining our true natural limits of territory. He also suggested the expediency of a fourth army of occupation in the south, and asked for the command of it, which was promised him.

Dumouriez had ingratiated himself with Gen-

sonné, one of the commissioners employed in La Vendée by the constituent assembly, since deputy of the legislative assembly, and one of the most influential members of the Gironde. Having remarked that the Jacobins were the predominating power, he was introduced to their club, and there read several papers which were very much applauded, and nevertheless continued his old friendship with Delaporte, intendant of the civil list, and devoted friend of Louis XVI. Attaching himself thus to the different powers who were on the point of coalescing, Dumouriez could not fail of being called to the ministry. Louis XVI. offered him the portfolio of foreign affairs, which the impeachment against Delessart had rendered vacant; but being still attached to the accused minister, the king merely tendered it to him during the interim. Dumouriez, however, feeling himself strongly supported, and not wishing to appear to hold a situation in reserve for a feilant minister, refused it on such terms, and obtained it without the interim. He found in the ministry none but Calher de Gerville and Degraives. Calher de Gerville, although he had given in his resignation, still continued to give his attention to the duties of his former office. Degraives, a pliant and inexperienced young man, had succeeded Narbonne. Dumouriez knew how to take advantage of this character, and thus gained possession of the exterior relations of the military administration, that is to say, the causes and the plan of the contemplated war. So enterprising a genius could hardly do less. Scarcely had he arrived at the ministry, when he assumed the red Jacobin cap, a new decoration borrowed from the Phrygians, and now become the emblem of liberty. He promised them to govern for them, and by them. Being presented to Louis XVI., he fully explained himself as to his association with the Jacobins, succeeded in destroying the suspicions he had entertained against him, pleased him by his ardent demonstrations of devotion, and dissipated his sadness by his wit. He persuaded the king that he endeavoured to become popular for the interests of the throne, and for his own re-establishment; but, in spite of all his flattery, he did not hesitate in telling him that the constitution could not be avoided, and assured him that, with the constitution, he could yet become very powerful. His first despatches, which were full of argument, vigour, and boldness, changed the nature of the pending negotiation, placed France in a new situation, and as immediately threatening war. It was natural that Dumouriez should wish for war, since his genius took that direction, and he had studied the military science thirty-six years; but it must be confessed that hostilities had become unavoidable, and that the conduct of the cabinet of Vienna, and the irritation of the assembly, had made a war inevitable.

Dumouriez, by his association with the Jacobins, and by his known connexions with the Gironde, must necessarily have embroiled himself with the Feuillans even without disliking them; besides, he had displaced them. Thus he was in a constant opposition to all the leaders of that party, and braving the railery and disdain which they cast upon the Jacobins and the assembly, he determined to pursue his career with his accustomed self-possession.

It was necessary now to complete the cabinet; Pétion, Gensonné, and Brissot, were consulted as to its formation; the ministers could not, according to the existing law, be taken either from the present, or the last assembly; the choice therefore was extremely limited. Dumouriez recommended an old secretary for the marine—Lacoste, a man of great experience in business, a self-willed patriot, who nevertheless loved the king, was loved by him, and remained in his confidence longer than any of the other ministers. The ministry of justice was about to be given to Louvet, who had recently distinguished himself among the Jacobins, and had obtained the favour of the Gironde by his eloquent support of Brissot, in favour of the war; the envious Robespierre immediately denounced him; he justified himself with success, but a man of contested popularity was not desirable, and Duranton, a talented, upright, but weak man, was pitched upon for that office. A minister of the finances, and of the interior, were still wanting. The Gironde again proposed Clavière, who had gained great celebrity by some valuable financial essays. Clavière was a man fertile in ideas, self-willed in his own opinions, and indefatigable in business. The minister of the interior was Roland, formerly inspector of the manufactures, and known by some useful works on industry and the mechanic arts. This man, of austere manners, inflexible opinions, and cold repulsive aspect, insensibly yielded to the superior genius of his wife. Madame Roland was young and beautiful. Having imbibed from her childhood philosophical and republican ideas, her understanding was superior to that of her sex in general, and she had formed opinions which had all the characteristic severity of the times. Living in the most intimate friendship with her husband, she lent her pen to his cause, communicated to him all her female vivacity, and inflamed not only his ardour but that of all the Girondists, who, being enthusiasts of liberty and philosophy, adored in her, beauty, wit, and their own opinions.

The new ministry united in themselves qualifications sufficiently great to ensure success, but it was necessary not to disgust Louis XVI., and to continue their alliance with the Girondists. This at the present moment was not impracticable; but any mistakes or faults of individuals, added to the incompatibility of the parties united, would certainly prove fatal to all their schemes; and this could not but take place, and that in a very short time. Louis XVI., surprised at the activity of his two ministers, was at first delighted with their economical reforms; a means of benefiting the nation which he had always regarded, inasmuch as it demanded no sacrifice of power or principle. Had he retained this confiding disposition, or could he have separated from the court party, he might easily have maintained the constitution. He repeated it with sincerity to his ministers, and was able to satisfy Roland and Clavière, the two most difficult members of the new ministry. Both sides were persuaded of this. The Girondists, who were only republicans through distrust of the king, now ceased to be so, and Vergniaud, Gensonné, and Guadet, entered into a correspondence with Louis XVI., a circumstance afterwards made a principal charge against them. The inflexible wife of Roland alone remained sceptical, and prevented her friends, who too confidently followed her notions, from abandoning themselves to their own confidence. The cause of these suspicions is easily explained: she had no personal intercourse with the king. The ministers, on the contrary, conversed with him daily, and mutual communications produce mutual confidence in honourable minds. But this confidence could not last; questions not to be avoided were about to emerge, and a discordancy of opinions was the inevitable result.

The court endeavoured to throw ridicule on the republican simplicity of the new ministry; and the rugged rusticity of Roland, who presented himself at the palace without buckles in his shoes, provoked the sneers of the aristocrats. Dumouriez also uttered his sarcastic observations, and mixing gaiety with the most assiduous diligence, amused the king by his pleasantry, and seemed, from the pliancy of his disposition, more suited to his circumstances than any of the other ministers. The queen, perceiving the ascendancy he possessed over the mind of the king, desired an interview with him; and he has given us, in his memoirs, the relation of the singular conversation he held with that exalted personage, which paints in lively colours the emotions of this unfortunate princess, who was worthy to have lived in other times, to have found better friends, and to have experienced happier fortunes.

"Being introduced," says he, "into the chamber of the queen, I found her alone, flushed in the face, and pacing the room with hurried steps, and in a state of agitation which presaged an animated conversation; I placed myself at the corner of the fire-place, greatly affected by her misfortunes and sufferings. She advanced towards me with a majestic and excited demeanour:—'Monsieur,' said she, 'you are all powerful at this moment; but it is only by the favour of the people, who soon dash their idols to pieces. Your life depends upon your conduct. It is said that you have great talents. You must be convinced that neither the king nor myself can suffer all the novelties that have been introduced into the constitution, or the constitution itself. I declare this to you frankly; choose your party.'

"I answered her: 'Madame, I am grieved at the painful confidence your majesty has placed in me. I shall not betray it; but my place is between the king and the nation, and I belong to my country. Permit me to represent to you, that the safety of the king, your own, and that of your august children, is attached to the constitution, as is also the re-establishment of his majesty's legitimate authority. I should serve both you and him ill, if I spoke to you in a different style. You are both surrounded by enemies, who would sacrifice you to their own interests. The constitution, if once it enjoys its full vigour, very far from being a misfortune to the king, will make his happiness and glory; he must concur in that which will establish it with promptitude and solidity.'" The unfortunate queen, offended by the manner in which Dumouriez blurted out his opinions, replied in a loud voice and passionate manner:—'That will not last; take care of yourself.'

Dumouriez replied with modest firmness:—'Madame, I am more than fifty years of age; my life has been exposed to many perils, and on entering the ministry, I foresaw that responsibility would not be the greatest of my dangers.'" "Nothing more was wanted," cried the queen, with grief, "than to calumniate me. You appear to believe that I am capable of having you assassinated;" and tears streamed down her face.

Agitated as much as herself; "God preserve me," said he, "from offering you so cruel an insult. The character of your majesty is grand and noble; you have given heroic proofs of it, which I have admired, and which have attached me to your interests." She now became calm, and advanced towards him. He proceeded:—'Believe me, Madame, I have no interest in deceiving you; I abhor, as much as you can do, anarchy and crimes. Believe me, I have experience. I am better situated than your majesty to judge of events. The revolution is not a momentary popular insurrection, as you seem to think. It is the almost unanimous up-rising of a great nation against inveterate abuses. Great factions have ignited its combustible matter and fanned it into flame. Wicked and extravagant men exist in all times. I regard nothing in the revolution but the king and the nation; all which tends to separate them, is conducive to their mutual ruin; I endeavour all in my power to unite them; it is for you to assist me. If I am an impediment to your designs, tell me so, and I will take my resignation immediately to the king, and retire to some obscure retreat, to lament your unhappy lot, and that of my country.'

"This explanation re-established confidence between myself and the queen. We discussed together the characters of the different factions; I pointed out to her the crimes and errors of each; proved that her interests were betrayed in the interior; and communicated to her the projects of which I had been made sharer, in the most intimate confidence." The queen appeared now entirely satisfied, and dismissed him with a serene and affable air. She was, undoubtedly, sincere; but the persons by whom she was surrounded, and the wicked extravagances of Marat and the Jacobins, soon drove her back to her fatal resolutions.

"On another occasion she said to me before the king:—'You see me in great grief; I dare not show myself at the window which looks into the garden. Yesterday evening, I went to the window of the court for the purpose of taking the air, when one of the guard offered me a gross insult, and added, 'With what pleasure should I see your head on the point of my bayonet!' In this frightful garden I am daily exposed to sights and sounds of horror; at one time a man, mounted on a chair, may be heard reading aloud execrable abuse against us; at another, some old devoted soldier or an abbé may be seen, plunged into the fountain, or pursued with insults and blows; meanwhile the people amuse themselves at foot-ball, or tranquilly enjoy their walks without the least attempt at interference. What an abode! What a people!'"

Thus, by a species of fatality, the supposed intentions of the palace excited the suspicions and fury of the people, while the yells of the people added to the grief and the imprudences of the palace. An utter hopelessness prevailed with them in every quarter. But how was it, it may be asked, that a frank explanation did not terminate such evils? How was it that the palace could not comprehend the apprehensions of the people? And, on the other hand, why did not the people sympa-

these with the anxieties of the palace? But why are men, men? At this last question we must pause, conform ourselves, and resign ourselves to human dispensations, and pursue our painful narrative.

Leopold II. was dead; the loss of this pacific prince, who contributed greatly to preserve the tranquillity of Europe, was much to be regretted; the same moderation was not to be expected from his successor and nephew, the king of Bohemia and Hungary. Gustavus, king of Sweden, had also been assassinated at a fête*. The enemies of the Jacobins attributed this assassination to that faction; but it has since been clearly proved to have been the crime of the nobility of the kingdom, humbled by Gustavus in the last revolution of Sweden. Thus the aristocracy, who inveighed against the revolutionary fury of the people in France, were presented with an example of what they themselves had formerly been and still were, in countries less civilized than their own. What an example, what a lesson, did this afford to Louis XVI., if at the time he could have comprehended it! The death of Gustavus rendered abortive the enterprise which he had meditated against France, for which Catherine was to have furnished soldiers, and Spain subsidies. It is doubtful, however, whether the perfidious Catherine would have fulfilled her promises, and the death of Gustavus, the consequences of which were so greatly exaggerated, was, in reality, an event of very little importance†.

Delessart had been impeached for the inefficient tone of his despatches; both the character and interests of Dumouriez preserved him from incurring the same censure; his communications with foreign powers, which exhibited a combination of determination and propriety, appeared to give satisfaction to Louis XVI. About this period M. de Noailles, ambassador to Vienna, and an insincere servant of the court, sent in his resignation to Dumouriez, saying that he could not hope to make the chief of the empire attend to the language which had been dictated to him. Dumouriez hastened to inform the assembly of this event, which so much roused their indignation, that they immediately brought charges against M. de Noailles. A new ambassador was also immediately sent off with fresh despatches. Two days after, Noailles retracted his resignation, and forwarded the categorical answer which he had demanded of the court of Vienna. This answer of M. de Cobentzel is, among all the faults of the foreign powers, one of the most impolitic they committed. M. de Cobentzel demanded in the name of his court, the re-establishment of the French monarchy, on the foundations fixed by the royal declaration of the 23rd of June, 1789. This was, to require the re-establishment of the three orders, the restitution of the property of the clergy, and that of the Comtat-Venissin‡ to the pope. The Austrian minister moreover demanded the restoration of the territories of Alsace to the princes of the empire, with all their feudal rights. A knowledge of France derived only from the passions of the emigrants, must have been the source of these conditions. It was in fact to demand at once the destruction of a constitution sworn to by the king and the nation; the revocation of an absolute determination with regard to Avignon; and, finally, an inevitable national bankruptcy, by the restitution of the property of the clergy, already sold. Moreover, what right had the emperor to require such submission? What right had he to interfere in our concerns? What complaint could even be raised with regard to the princes of Alsace, since their territories were subject to the French sovereignty, and were therefore justly forced to submit to its laws?

The king and Dumouriez lost no time in informing the assembly of the contents of this despatch. The assembly became justly indignant; and a declaration of war was now generally desired. Another event had transpired, with which Dumouriez did not acquaint the assembly; Austria, whom he had menaced with a new revolution at Liège, had sent an envoy to treat with him on this subject; and the language of this envoy being very different from that which the Austrian minister held, it was evident that the despatch just received was the effect of a sudden resolution. The assembly now annulled the decree of accusation against Noailles, and demanded of him a prompt report of the state of affairs. The king could not recede, this fatal war was finally on the point of being declared. In every case it was unfavourable to his interests; if conquerors, the French would become more encroaching and inexorable than ever; and if conquered, would attribute its failure to the king, and accuse him of having inefficiently supported the war. Louis XVI. perfectly foresaw this double danger, and it therefore cost him more pain to make this declaration than to participate in any other act of the revolution*. Dumouriez digested his report with his ordinary celerity, and carried it to Louis XVI., who kept it by him three days. He made it his business to ascertain whether the king, forced to take the initiative with the assembly, would require them to declare hostilities, or content himself with consulting them on the subject, in announcing to them that, according to his commands given, France was in a state prepared for war. The ministers, Roland and Clavière, advised the first measure, and all the members of the Gironde were of the same opinion, and wished to dictate the speech from the throne. Nevertheless, Louis XVI. was averse to an explicit declaration of war, and preferred declaring France in a state prepared for war. The difference was of small importance, yet it was more consonant to his feelings, and, indeed, the liberty of such a choice was not more than might have been justly conceded to the difficulty of his situation. Dumouriez, less inexorable than the majority of the Girondists, disregarded the advice of the ministers, and, supported by Degraives, Lacoste, and Duranton, advocated the opinion of the king, and caused its adoption. This was his first difference with the Gironde. The king himself prepared his speech, and went in person to the assembly to deliver it, followed by all his ministers. A considerable concourse of spectators added to the effect of the sitting, which was about to decide on the fate of France and Europe. The features of the king were careworn, and demonstrated deep consideration. Dumouriez read a detailed report of the negotiations with the Emperor; he showed that the treaty of 1756 was ipso facto broken, and that it was only as a last ultimatum that France had placed herself in a state of war. He added, that the king, for the purpose of consulting the assembly, having no other legal means of doing so than the formal proposition of war, determined to demand its advice through that medium. The king then addressed the assembly; his manner was dignified, but his voice seemed tremulous with emotion: "Gentlemen," said he, "you have just heard the result of the negotiations which I have entered into with the court of Vienna. The determinations to which it has forced me have been unanimously advised by my council, and I have adopted them myself. They are conformable to the wishes which the national assembly have several times manifested, and to the sentiments which a great number of citizens, from various parts of the kingdom, have frequently expressed; all prefer war, to seeing the dignity of the French people any longer outraged, or the national safety menaced.

"It was my duty previous to proceeding to extremities, to exhaust every expedient for the maintenance of peace. I now propose to the national assembly, according to the terms of the constitution, war against the king of Hungary and Bohemia."

This proposition met with the most flattering reception; cries of "Vive le Roi!" echoed from all sides. The assembly answered Louis XVI., that they would deliberate on the subject, and that he should be informed of the result of their deliberations by a message. The most violent discussion then began, and was prolonged to a very late hour. The arguments on both sides of the question were again repeated; but the act was finally passed, and war resolved upon by a great majority.

"Considering," said the assembly, "that the court of Vienna, in contempt of treaties, has not ceased to grant full protection to French citizens in open rebellion against their king and country; that it has formed a league with many powers of Europe against the independence and safety of the French nation;

"That Francis I., king of Hungary and Bohemia*, has, by his despatches of the 18th of March and the 7th of April last, refused to renounce this league;

"That, in spite of the proposition made to him on the 11th of March, 1792, to reduce the troops on the frontiers to a peace establishment, he has continued and augmented his hostile preparations;

"That he has formally attacked the sovereignty of the French nation, by declaring himself willing to support the pretensions of the German princes having possessions in France, to whom the French nation has not ceased to offer indemnities;

"That he has endeavoured to divide the French citizens, and to arm them against one another, by offering support to all the discontented in league with the powers.

"Considering, finally, the refusal to answer the last despatch of the king of France, which leaves no longer any hope of obtaining the redress of these different grievances, by means of an amicable negotiation, to be equivalent to a declaration of war, &c., the assembly declare, that there is an urgent necessity for it."

It must be acknowledged that this cruel war, which so long afflicted Europe, was not provoked by France, but by the foreign powers. France, in announcing it, merely declared, by a decree, the state in which she had been placed. Conduct was employed to make a statement of the motives actuating the nation. This valuable composition should be preserved in history, as a model of argument and an example of moderation*.

The intelligence of war gave general satisfaction. The patriots perceived in it the termination of those alarms which caused emigration and the vacillating conduct of the king; the moderate party, alarmed above all by the danger of the division of parties, hoped that the common danger would put an end to this also, and that the field of battle would become a fitting theatre of action for all those unquiet spirits who had been called into life by the revolution. A few scoundrels alone, inclined on every occasion to censure the assembly, reproached them with having violated the constitution, according to which France ought never to be in a state of aggression. But it is very evident that France was not the aggressor. Therefore, with the exception of the king, and a few discontented persons, the war met with universal approbation.

Lafayette now prepared himself to serve his country gallantly in the new career which was opened to him. On him the task of executing the plan of Dumouriez, apparently ordered by Dugraves, particularly devolved. Dumouriez had imagined, and not unreasonably, and had given every patriot the hope, that the invasion of Belgium would be an easy enterprise. This country, lately agitated by a revolution which had been suppressed by Austria, would naturally be disposed to rise in insurrection at the first approach of the French; and thus the declaration of the assembly to the sovereigns of Europe would be realized: If you send us war we will return you liberty. Moreover, it was in fact putting in execution the plan of Dumouriez, which consisted in extending France to its natural frontiers. Rochambeau commanded the army most ready to act in this operation; but his sickly constitution and peevish temper rendered him unfit for the service, and Lafayette was every way more adapted to command an expedition, partly military and partly popular. It was to have been wished that Lafayette had obtained the general command; but Dumouriez refused to accede to the arrangement, prompted to this refusal, without doubt, by party malevolence. The chief command of so important an expedition could not be given, he said, to a simple general in preference to a field-marshal, and added, with far better reason, that Lafayette was suspected by the Jacobins and the assembly. It is certain, that his youth, activity, and the devotion of his army, alarmed many, and this, added to his influence, gave occasion for injurious surmises. Be that as it may, he most willingly undertook to execute the plan of the diplomatic military minister; at the same time he required fifty thousand men, with whom he purposed to proceed, by Namur and the Meuse, to Liège, from whence he proposed making himself master of the Low Countries. This plan, very well understood, was approved of by Dumouriez; a few days had as yet elapsed since the declaration of war; Austria had not had time to secure her possessions in Belgium, and the success of Lafayette appeared to be certain. He consequently received orders to proceed, first, with ten thousand men from Givet upon Namur, and from Namur upon Liège or Bruxelles, and to be immediately followed by the entire of his army. Whilst he executed this movement, Lieutenant-General Biron was to set out from Valenciennes and march upon Mons. Another officer had orders to direct his march towards Tournay and occupy it suddenly. These movements performed by the officers of Rochambeau, were only intended to support, and mask the real attack commanded by Lafayette.

The time allotted to the execution of these orders was from the 20th of April to the 2nd of May. Biron commenced his march, left Valenciennes, seized upon Quivrain, and found some detachments of the enemy near Mons. Suddenly two regiments of dragoons, without even being within sight of the enemy, cried out, We are be- trayed! and fled, drawing the whole army after them. In vain the officers endeavoured to stop them; the fugitives threatened to fire on them, and continued their flight. The camp was deserted, and all the military stores carried off by the imperialists. While this event took place at Mons, Theobald Dillon, according to the predetermined plan, left Lille, with two thousand infantry and a thousand cavalry; and at the very hour in which the unfortunate desertion of Biron's army took place, his own cavalry, on the approach of some Austrian troops, turned their backs, crying out that they were betrayed. The infantry followed their example, and all the baggage was again abandoned to the enemy. Theobald Dillon, and Berthois, another officer of merit, were massacred by the officers and the people of Lille, who accused them of being traitors. Meantime, Lafayette, warned too late of these events, had advanced from Metz to Givet, having surmounted unheard of difficulties and traversed many leagues in so short a time, by nearly impassable roads. Nothing but the zealous devotion of his soldiers enabled him to traverse, in so short a time, the great space he had to go over. Being informed there of the disasters which had happened to the officers of Rochambeau, he thought it prudent to halt. These unfortunate events took place at the latter end of April, 1792.

CHAPTER III.

ISCHISM IN THE GIRONDIST MINISTRY—THE PRETENDED AUSTRIAN COMMITTEE—ACT FOR THE FORMATION OF A CAMP OF TWENTY THOUSAND MEN NEAR PARIS—LETTER OF ROLAND TO THE KING—THE DISMISSAL OF THE GIRONDIST MINISTRY—RESIGNATION OF DUMOURIEZ—FORMATION OF A FEUILLANTINE MINISTRY—DESIGNS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL PARTY—LETTER OF LAFAYETTE TO THE ASSEMBLY—THE SITUATION OF THE POPULAR PARTY AND ITS LEADERS; PLAN OF THE DEPUTIES OF THE SOUTH; THE PART RÉGION TOOK IN THE EVENTS OF JUNE—THE EVENTS OF 20th JUNE, 1792—INSURRECTIONARY MOVEMENTS OF THE FAUBOURGS; THE SCENE THAT TOOK PLACE IN THE ROYAL APARTMENTS AT THE TUILERIES.

THE news of the unfortunate events of the battles of Quivrain and Tournay, and of the murder of General Dillon, caused general discontent. Judging from their concurrence and simultaneous character, it was natural to suppose they had been previously concerted. Parties naturally accused each other: the Jacobins and extravagant patriots declared them attempts to betray the cause of liberty. Dumouriez not accusing Lafayette, but suspecting the feuillans, imagined their object was to destroy his plan, deprive him of his popularity, and thus ruin him by withdrawing from him the support of public opinion. Lafayette complained, but less bitterly than his party, that he had received orders to march too late, and had not been furnished with the necessary means to accelerate his arrival. The feuillans spread a report that Dumouriez desired to ruin Rochambeau and Lafayette, by tracing for them a plan of operations, without furnishing the means of its execution. But such an intention cannot be for a moment supposed to have actuated Dumouriez, for, by drawing up a plan of the campaign, he had exceeded his functions as minister for foreign affairs, and exposed himself to heavy rebuke by its failure.

Besides, the junction of Belgium to France, and its emancipation from despotic rule, was one of his oldest projects, and part of a scheme he had long meditated. How, therefore, can it be supposed that he wished to thwart its success? It is evident, indeed, that neither the generals or ministers were instrumental in these disasters, for the interests of all parties were equally promoted by the success of the expedition. But to substitute men for things is an injustice all factions commit in their desire to seek an object on whom they may charge the blame of a miscarriage.

Degraves, alarmed at the agitation occasioned by the late military events, wished to free himself from the burden of a duty which had long weighed heavily upon him, and Dumouriez acted unwisely in not permitting it. Louis XVI., entirely under the conduct of the Girondo, gave his office to Servan, an old soldier, known to entertain patriotic opinions. This new choice added strength to the Girondo, who could now generally command a majority in the council, having Servan, Clavière, and Roland, at their command. From this period estrangement began to disunite the ministers. The Girondo became more and more suspicious, and consequently required still further manifestations of sincerity on the part of Louis XVI. Dumouriez, whom public opinion influenced very little, and who was deeply affected by the confidence the king reposed in him, always advocated his cause. Lacoste, who was strongly attached to his sovereign, did the same. Duranton remained neuter, or showed a preference only to the weakest parties. Servan, Clavière, and Roland, retained their inflexibility, and entertaining all the fears of their friends, became daily more strict and inexorable in the council. Another circumstance finally completed the separation of Dumouriez from the principal members of the Girondo. He had on entering on his ministry required six millions of francs for secret expenses, unembarrassed by any obligation to give an account of their expenditure. The feuillans had objected to this requisition, but the Girondo readily supported it, and the six millions were granted. Pétion had also demanded funds for the police of Paris, and Dumouriez allowed him thirty thousand francs per month; but, ceasing to be a Girondist, he allowed but one payment. Besides this, it was either known or suspected that he had devoted a hundred thousand francs to his private pleasures. Roland, at whose house the Girondo were accustomed to meet, resented this supposed delinquency with great warmth of language, and was joined in his indignation by all his party. The ministers, at this time, usually dined alternately at each other's houses, to discuss public affairs: but when they were received at the house of Roland, his wife and all his friends were present, and it might then be said, that a council-table of the whole Girondo was formed. At one of these meetings, remonstrances were made to Dumouriez concerning the nature of his secret expenses. At first he replied in a witty and sprightly manner, but on being pressed further, became offended, and, finally, quarrelled with Roland and the Girondists. He appeared no more at their accustomed meetings, and said that he did not wish to treat of public affairs, either before a woman, or the friends of Roland: yet he sometimes still visited Roland, but never conversed on public affairs, or at least very seldom. Another circumstance detached him still more completely from the Girondists: Guadet, the most petulant member of his party, read a letter to the assembly, by which he urged ministers to persuade the king to take for his confessor a priest who had taken the oath; Dumouriez maintained that ministers could not interfere in the religious exercises of any individual. His opinion, it is true, was approved of by Vergniaud and Gensonné; but the quarrel was not less bitter on that account, and the rupture between him and his former friends became more decided than ever.

The journals now commenced their attacks upon Dumouriez. The Feuillans, who had already taken up the pen against him, were aided by the Jacobins and Girondists. He bore up, however, bravely against the storm, and prosecuted some journalists.

An accusation against Marat, the author of The Friend of the People, an abominable work, which openly advocated the murder of the royal family, and heaped the grossest insults on them, and every body else who happened to be objects of suspicion to the delirious imagination of its author, had been already prepared. But to balance the effect of this measure, Royou, the author of The Friend of the King, and who abused the republicans with the same violence as Marat did the royalists, was also prosecuted.

The Austrian committee had now been long the object of general attention. It was spoken of in the same manner by the patriots at the Hôtel de Ville as the Orleans faction was talked of at court. To this committee public opinion attributed a secret and disastrous influence carried on through the medium of the queen. But if indeed, during the constituent assembly, something resembling an Austrian committee existed, nothing of the same description had existence under the legislative. During the first period, it is certain that a great personage from the Low Countries communicated with the queen, and, in the name of her family, gave her very prudent advice; yet even this intercourse passed through the hands, and received alterations of a French gentleman, who acted as mediator. But under the legislative assembly, these private communications ceased; the family of the queen, it is true, continued their correspondence with her, but constantly recommended patience and resignation. Bertrand de Molleville and Montmorin alone were accustomed to frequent the palace, since their dismissal from the ministry; against them, therefore, all suspicions were directed, and they were, in reality, the agents of all the secret commissions of the court. Being, however, publicly accused by the journalist Carra, they determined to prosecute the calumniator, and summoned him to produce evidence in support of his assertion. He referred to three deputies, Chabot, Morlin, and Bazire, as the authors of the accusations he had published; and the magistrate, Larivière, being devoted to the cause of the king, prosecuted this matter very closely against them, and had the hardihood to issue a summons to bring the three deputies before him. But the assembly, offended that any one should dare to attack the inviolability of its members, answered the magistrate by an act of impeachment, and sent the unfortunate Larivière to Orleans.

This abortive attempt at a prosecution only augmented the general discontent, and the animosity that prevailed against the court. The Girondins felt themselves no longer masters of Louis XVI. since their quarrel with Dumouriez, and, therefore, resumed that violent opposition which they had lately suspended.

The new constitutional guard of the king had been recently formed. According to an existing law, the civil household of the palace should have been composed in like manner; but the nobility, in that case, would have been excluded, as they certainly would not consent to occupy situations created by the constitution, and thus acknowledge its authority. Besides, the introduction of a new household was disagreeable to the royal family, and the plan was, therefore, discarded. "How is it, madame," said Barnave, writing to the queen, "that you allow those people to entertain the least doubt of your sentiments? When they appoint you a military and civil household, like the young Achilles among the daughters of Lycomedes, you seize hastily the sword, in contempt of simpler ornaments*." The ministers and Bertrand himself entertained the same opinions as Barnave, but they could not prevail upon the king to adopt them, and the composition of a civil household was abandoned.

The military guard, formed on a plan proposed by Delessart, was composed of a third of the troops of the line, and two-thirds of young citizens taken from the national guards. This arrangement appeared very fair; but the officers were chosen in a manner which gave alarm to the patriots. The soldiers of the line were also chosen with the same care, and by a coalition with their officers, disgusted all the young national guards, who were attached to the national cause, and who were even obliged, by ill treatment, to quit the service. Those who, in this manner, retired, were soon replaced by sure men; the number of the guard was gradually augmented, and instead of eighteen hundred, the number fixed by law, it soon amounted, it was said, to near six thousand. Dumouriez informed the king of this circumstance, to which he replied, that the old Duke de Brissac, who commanded the guard, could not be regarded as a conspirator. Yet the conduct of the guards was such at the palace and elsewhere, that suspicion burst forth on all sides, and the clubs took cognizance of them. At the same period, twelve Swiss displayed the white cockade at Neuilly; a great number of papers were burnt at Sèvres, which caused much suspicion*. The alarm then became general; the assembly declared itself permanent, as if the same danger existed as when thirty thousand men menaced Paris. It is true that disturbances were general; that the non-juring priests excited the people to insurrection in the southern provinces, and abused the practice of confession, to kindle fanaticism in their minds; that the concert of foreign powers was manifest; that Prussia was about to join Austria; that foreign armies assumed a threatening aspect; and that the disasters of Lille and Mons still occupied the imaginations of the people. It is true, also, that the power of the people gives very little confidence, that it is never trusted in before it is called into action; and that an irregular multitude, however numerous, is not an equivalent force to oppose six thousand men, armed and disciplined, whose profession it is to fight and die. The assembly hastened, therefore, to declare itself permanent†, and called for an exact report of the military household of the king, and of the number and conduct of those who composed it. After having declared the constitution violated, they passed an act for disbanding the guard, and another of impeachment against the Duke de Brissac, and sent them both for the royal sanction. The king intended at first to oppose his veto to these two decrees, but Dumouriez recalled to his recollection the dismissal of his old body-guard, much longer in his service than his new military household, and persuaded him to make a sacrifice of his feelings now, as he had done then, when it must have been much more painful. He pointed out to him also the real misdemeanours of his guard, and, finally, procured the enforcement of the act. But the king immediately insisted on its being reimbodyed, and, either from a renewal of his first policy of appearing oppressed, or from a confidence in his disbanded guard, whose appointments he kept open, refused to substitute others, and thus left himself, without protection, exposed to the fury of the people. The Gironde, despairing of any change on the part of the king, followed up their attack with the most obstinate perseverance. They had already passed a new act against the priests, to supply the place of that which he had refused to sanction. Reports of their factious conduct succeeding one another without interruption, the assembly finally condemned all delinquents to transportation. Particular proof as to the culpability of guilty individuals being difficult to obtain, and this measure, as all measures of security must, resting on open suspicion, public notoriety was deemed sufficient evidence for conviction. On the information of twenty active citizens, with the approbation of the directory of the district, the directory of the department was to pronounce the sentence of transportation: the condemned priest was obliged to leave the canton in twenty-four hours, the department in three days, and the kingdom in a month. If poor, three francs per day were allowed him till his arrival at the frontiers. This severe law demonstrated the measure of indignation entertained by the assembly*. Another decree followed immediately after it. The minister Servan, without having received orders from the king, or having consulted his colleagues, proposed, on the occasion of the approaching confederation of the 14th of July, the formation of a camp of twenty thousand federalists, for the protection of the assembly and the capital. It is easy to imagine how eagerly this project was embraced by the majority, composed of Girondists. At this period their power was at its height. They were supreme in the assembly, where the constitutionalists and republicans were in the minority, and where the pretended neutrals were but pusillanimously indifferent, always becoming more and more submissive as the majority increased in strength. Besides this, by means of Pétion, the mayor, who entirely accorded with their views, they were masters of Paris. Their project was to gain dominion over the king, and thwart his suspected designs, which they hoped to accomplish by the formation of a camp; and in this they were actuated, not by personal ambition, but by that of party and opinion.

As soon as the proposition of Servan was made public, Dumouriez, in full council, demanded by what authority he had presumed to make it. He answered, by his own personal authority. "In that case," replied Dumouriez, "the title of minister of war must not in future be affixed to the name of Servan;" and the dispute between them became so animated, that, but for the presence of the king, blood would certainly have been shed in the council-room. Servan offered to withdraw his motion; but that would have been useless, for the assembly had already adopted it, and the king would have gained nothing by such a step but the appearance of violently constraining his minister. Dumouriez therefore opposed it with all his might; and it was also combated by a petition signed by eight thousand national guards, who were offended at the idea of their services being insufficient for the protection of the assembly. Nevertheless, the decree passed, and was sent to the king. There were now, therefore, two important measures to be sanctioned, and it was doubtful whether they would obtain the royal approbation. The determination of Louis was anxiously awaited, and regarded as a criterion of his future intentions.

Dumouriez maintained, in full council, that this measure would be fatal to the throne, and especially to the Girondists, because the new army would be formed under the influence of the most violent Jacobins; but he added, that notwithstanding this, it ought to be adopted by the king, as, if he refused to embody twenty thousand men regularly enlisted, forty thousand would spontaneously rise, and seize upon the capital. He declared besides, that there was a method of neutralizing the effect of this measure, and that he would make it known at the proper time. He further maintained, that the decree concerning the transportation of priests ought to be sanctioned, both because they were culpable, and because transportation would withdraw them from the fury of their adversaries. Louis XVI., however, still hesitated, and determined to take further time for reflection. In the same council, Roland read, in the presence of the king, a letter which had already been addressed to him, and which it was, consequently, useless to bring to his notice again. The idea of this letter had been suggested by Madame Roland, and was composed by herself. It had first been intended to write it in the name of all the ministers. They, however, refused to comply with this proposition, and Madame Roland persuaded her husband to take this step in his own name. In vain Duranthon, who possessed a correct although weak understanding, observed to him, and with great reason, that the tone of his letter, so far from persuading the king, would rather exasperate him against the ministers who possessed the public confidence, the result of which would be a fatal rupture between the throne and the popular party. Roland obstinately adhered to the opinion of his wife and his friends. The Gironde, in fact, wished for an explanation, and preferred a rupture to uncertainty.

Roland, therefore, read the letter to the king, who was obliged to endure its severe remonstrances in full council.

This famous letter was as follows:—

"SIRE, "The present state of France is such as cannot last long; it is a state of crisis, exposed most eminently to violence; and it must terminate in a result as interesting to your majesty, as it will be important to the whole kingdom.

"Honoured by your confidence, and placed in a situation in which it is my duty to tell you the truth, I am emboldened to speak plainly; it is an obligation which you yourself have imposed on me.

"The French nation have given themselves a constitution; this has produced disaffection and rebellion in many; the majority of the nation, however, desire its maintenance; they have sworn to defend it with their blood, and see with joy a war entered into which offers them the means of securing so invaluable a possession. Nevertheless the minority, supported by deceitful hopes, have united all their efforts to gain the ascendancy.

By this intestine struggle against the laws, this anarchy, under which all good citizens groan, and which the ill-affected having taken advantage of to calumniate the new system; by this disunion every where prevalent, and every where fomented, for a neutral indifference has no existence, either the triumph, or change of the constitution is aimed at; to maintain or to alter it are the objects of the whole kingdom. I shall abstain from examining what it is in itself, to consider what circumstances require; and, with all possible impartiality, I shall point out what is to be expected from the temper of the times, and what is the most upright course of conduct to be pursued.

"Your majesty has formerly enjoyed great prerogatives, which you believed belonged to royalty; brought up in the idea that it was your duty to preserve them, you could not naturally see yourself deprived of them with pleasure: a desire to regain them is as natural as regret at having lost them. Such is the reasoning on which the enemies of the revolution build their hopes; they calculate on secret favour, until circumstances permit an open protection from your majesty. These dispositions could not escape the observation of the nation, and they have naturally excited suspicion.

"Your majesty has, therefore, been constantly placed between the alternatives of yielding to early habits and your personal inclinations, or of making sacrifices, dictated by philosophy, and exacted by necessity; either of emboldening the rebels, by irritating the nation, or of tranquillizing the latter, by uniting yourself to it. Every thing has its season, and that of uncertainty has finally arrived.

"Your majesty may at present ally yourself openly to those who pretend to reform the constitution; but ought you not rather generously to devote yourself without reserve to those who would ensure its triumph? Such is the true question, whose solution the actual state of things renders inevitable; as to that metaphysical question, whether the French are ripe for liberty, its discussion is improper here, for we are not called upon to decide what we may be in a century, but to observe what the present generation is capable of.

"From the agitation in which we have lived for four years, what has been produced? Privileges burdensome to the people have been abolished; ideas of justice and equality are now naturalized in all minds; the declaration of the rights of the people has justified the instinctive sentiment of those rights; the solemn acknowledgment of them has become a sacred doctrine; and hatred to the nobility, inspired so long ago by the feudal system, has been increased by the open opposition of most of that order to the constitution, which annihilates them.

"During the first year of the revolution, the people saw in the nobility men odious from the oppressive privileges which they possessed, but whom they would have ceased to regard with animosity after the destruction of those privileges, had their conduct, since that period, not strengthened every motive to fear and resist them, as irreconcilable enemies.

"Attachment to the constitution has increased in the same proportion; the people have not only derived from it sensible benefits, but look for still greater, since those who formerly imposed every burden on their shoulders, have manifested so much anxiety to modify or destroy it.

"The declaration of rights has become a political gospel, and the French constitution a religion, in defence of which the people are ready to die.

"Thus, zeal has sometimes supplied the place of law; and when the latter has not been able to repress disturbers, the citizens have inflicted punishment themselves.

"Thus the property of the emigrants has been exposed to the ravages which vengeance inspired; and so many departments have thought themselves bound to exercise severity against the priests whom public opinion has proscribed, and to which some of them have fallen victims.

"In this shock of interests, our political opinions are not held loosely and indifferently, but passionately espoused. Our country is not a mere fanciful idea, which we have chosen to embellish; it is a being to which we have made sacrifices, and to which we become daily more attached by the solicitude which it creates; it has been begotten in painful labour, has sprung up in the midst of troubles, and is loved as much on account of what it has cost us, as what we hope from it; and all the attacks which are made upon it are only the means of inflaming our enthusiastic attachment. To what a pitch is this enthusiasm carried at the present moment, when the forces of our enemies assembled without, are in concert with interior intriguers, for the purpose of dealing the most fatal blows to the constitution! The ferment of the public mind in all parts of the empire is extreme, and a terrible explosion must follow, at least, if a firm reliance cannot be placed in your majesty's intentions; but this reliance can never be established on protestations, it must have facts for its foundation.

"It is evident to the whole French nation, that the constitution will be free in its operations, and the government possess all its necessary force, from the moment that your majesty, heartily desiring the triumph of the constitution, supports the legislative body with all the power of the executive, taking away every pretext for disturbances among the people, and depriving the discontented of all hope.

"For instance, two important decrees have been passed; in both, the public tranquillity and the safety of the nation are vitally concerned: the delay of their sanction inspires suspicion; if prolonged, it will generate discontent; and it is my duty to tell you, that it is impossible to guess to what results the irritated state of the public mind may lead.

"It is no longer time to retreat; there is no longer even the means of temporizing: the revolution is accomplished in the public mind; it will attain its object at the price of blood, and be cemented by it, if wisdom does not prevent those calamities which it is still possible to avoid.

"I know that there are those who imagine that every thing may be effected, and the whole kingdom kept in subjection by extreme measures; but should force be employed to constrain the assembly, should fear hold Paris in captivity, and spread disunion and stupor through the environs, all France would rise with indignation, and would develop, in the horrors of civil war, that gloomy energy, which is the mother of virtues and crimes, and always fatal to those who provoke it.

"The safety of the state, and the happiness of your majesty, are bound up together; nothing can separate them. Cruel and certain calamities surround your throne, if it is not supported by yourself on the basis of the constitution, and does not derive stability from that concord and tranquillity, which the maintenance of the new system of things will finally procure. Thus, the dispositions of the people, the course of the revolution, reasons of policy, and the interest of your majesty, render it indispensably obligatory on you to unite yourself closely to the legislative body, and thus fulfil the wishes of the nation. These combined considerations render that necessary which principle makes a duty. But the natural sensibility of the French people would discover in such conduct a motive for gratitude. Those who would inspire you with distance and distrust towards this people, cruelly deceive you. By contradictory counsels and harassing circumstances, you have been driven to assume a part calculated to alarm the nation; but let it see that you are resolved to give free scope to the constitution, to which its felicity is so inseparably attached, and you will soon become the object of its most fervent attachment.

"The conduct of the priests in many places, and the pretexts which fanaticism has afforded to the ill-affected, have occasioned the passing of a salutary law against those disturbers. May your majesty give it your sanction! the public tranquillity demands it, and the safety of the priests solicits it. If this law is not put in force, the departments will be forced to substitute in its place, as has already been done in many districts, violent measures, and the people, irritated by your majesty's opposition, will rush into excesses.

"The attempts of our enemies, the agitation which is every where manifested in the capital, the extreme inquietude which the conduct of your guard has occasioned, and the testimony of satisfaction which your majesty has given them, by a proclamation truly impolitic, considering all circumstances; the situation of Paris, and its proximity to the frontiers, have clearly pointed out the necessity of a camp in the neighbourhood. This measure, whose wisdom and necessity has struck all unprejudiced minds, only waits for your majesty's sanction; why should delays give an air of regret and constraint to an act, which a speedy compliance would entitle to gratitude?

"The attempts of the staff of the national Parisian guard against this measure, have already excited suspicions that they have acted at the instigation of a superior authority; the declamations of some outrageous demagogues have also given them the appearance of being allied with those interested in the overthrow of the constitution. The public doubt, even now, of the intentions of your majesty; a little more delay, and the unhappy people will think they perceive in their king the friend and accomplice of the conspirators.

"Just Heavens! have you struck with blindness the kings of the earth, and will they never take any counsels but those which lead to their ruin?

"I know that the austere language of truth is seldom spoken near a throne; I know also, that because it is so seldom heard, revolutions become necessary; I know, above all, that I should hold it to your majesty, not only as a citizen subject to the laws, but as a minister honoured by your confidence, and invested with functions which make its avowal an essential part of my office; and nothing can prevent me fulfilling a duty which lies upon my conscience.

"It is in the same spirit that I reiterate my representations to your majesty, on the obligation and utility of executing that law which prescribes the necessity of having a secretary for the council. The simple existence of the law speaks so powerfully, that the execution of it should follow without delay; besides, it is necessary to employ every means of preserving gravity, wisdom, and mature reflection in our deliberations; and, for responsible ministers, some means of stating their opinions is also requisite: if such existed, I should not now address myself by writing to your majesty.

"Life is a very inferior consideration to a man who esteems his duty above everything; but, after the inappiness of having fulfilled it, the satisfaction to which he will be further sensible, is the reflection of having done it with fidelity, and even this is obligatory on a public man.

(Signed) "ROLAND."

"Paris, June 10th, 1792,

"Fourth Year of Liberty."

The king listened to this lecture with extraordinary patience, and left the council-room, saying he would make known his intentions.

Dumouriez was immediately called to the palace. He found the king and queen together. "Ought we," said they, "to endure any longer the insolence of these three ministers?" "No," replied Dumouriez. "Will you take upon yourself to deliver us from them?" replied the king. "Yes, sire," added again this bold minister; "but to succeed, it is necessary that your majesty should consent to one condition: I have become unpopular; I am about to become still more so by dismissing three colleagues, leaders or members of a powerful party; there is only one way of persuading the people that they are not dismissed on account of their patriotism." "What is it?" asked the king. "It is," replied Dumouriez, "to sanction the two decrees;" and he repeated the arguments he had already made use of in full council. The queen declared that the condition was too hard, but Dumouriez made her understand that twenty thousand men were not to be feared; that the decree did not point out the place where they were to be encamped; that they might be sent to Soissons, and there continually occupied in military exercises, from whence they could be gradually despatched to the armies, as troops might be wanted. "But in that case," said the king, "you must be my minister of war." "In spite of the responsibility, I consent to it," said Dumouriez, "but your majesty must sanction the decree against the priests; I can only serve you at that price; this decree, far from injuring the ecclesiastics, withdraws them from the fury of the people; your majesty should have opposed the first decree of the constituent assembly, which enforced the oath; at present it is too late to retreat." "I was to blame, then," cried Louis XVI., "but that will not justify me in committing the same error again."

The queen, who did not partake of his religious scruples, joined her arguments to Dumouriez's, and the king appeared at the moment to give his consent.

Dumouriez then suggested out new ministers to be appointed in the place of Servan, Clavière, and Roland. They were, Mourgues for the interior, and Beaulieu for the finances. The war department was given to Dumouriez, who, for the moment, united in his own person two offices, till that of foreign affairs could be otherwise filled up. The order was then immediately given, and on the 13th Roland, Clavière, and Servan, received their dismissal. Roland, who had audacity to execute all that the bold genius of his wife devised, presented himself immediately to the assembly, and read the letter he had written to the king, for which he was dismissed. This conduct, in an open state of hostility, was certainly allowable; but when a promise had been made to the king to keep the letter secret, it was undoubtedly a very ungenerous proceeding.

The assembly highly applauded the letter of Roland, ordered it to be printed, and sent to the eighty-three departments; and moreover declared that the three dismissed ministers possessed the confidence of the nation. It was at this very moment that Dumouriez, so far from fearing the consequence of these acts, had the hardihood to appear at the tribune with the new title of minister of war. He had hastily prepared a circumstantial report on the state of the army, and on the faults of the administration and the assembly. He was not accustomed to spare those who he knew were disposed to give him a bad reception. The moment he appeared he was assailed by hootings from the Jacobins; the feuillans observed a profound silence. He first gave an account of a slight advantage gained by Lafayette over the enemy, and of the death of Gouvin, an officer, a deputy, and a man of substance, who, being driven to despair by the misfortunes of his country, had voluntarily put an end to his existence. The assembly lamented the loss of this generous citizen; but listened coldly to Dumouriez's expressions of regret, and particularly the desire he avowed of escaping the same calamities by the same fate. But when he gave his report as minister of war, murmurs of indignation rose from all sides. This, however, did not in the least disconcert him, and he calmly resumed his discourse, and finally obtained silence. His remonstrances irritated some deputies. "Do you hear?" exclaimed Guadet; "he presumes to give us advice." "And why not?" coolly replied the intrepid Dumouriez, Silence being restored, he finished his speech, and was both hooted and applauded by the several factions which divided the assembly. He then folded up his papers, to take them away. "He flies!" exclaimed a voice. "No!" resumed he, and boldly replaced his papers on the bureau, signed them, and walked across the assembly with the most unruffled serenity of aspect and manner. He was pressed upon and impeded in his passage, and some deputies cried out, "You will be sent to Orleans." "So much the better," replied he, "I shall then take baths and whey, which I greatly require, and rest myself after my labours."

His firmness imparted confidence to the king, who expressed to him his satisfaction; but this unhappy prince was already tormented by conflicting scruples; besieged by pretended friends, he had already returned to his former resolves, and would not give the royal assent to the two acts.

The four ministers assembled in council begged the king, as he had seemed to promise, to give his sanction to both the acts. The king drily answered, that he would only consent to the act for the twenty thousand men; that, as to that against the priests, he was decided on opposing it, that his mind was fixed, and that threats had no terrors for him. He read the letter by which he announced his determination to the president of the assembly. "One of you," said he to his ministers, "must countersign it;" and he pronounced these words in a different tone of voice than he had ever been heard to utter.

Dumouriez then wrote to him to demand his dismissal. "This man," cried the king, "has made me dismiss three ministers, because they endeavoured to oblige me to adopt the decrees, and yet he now desires I should give my royal assent to them." This reproach was unjust, for it was only on condition of the double sanction that Dumouriez consented to survive his colleagues. Louis XVI. had a personal interview with him, and asked him if he persisted in his determination. Dumouriez was unshaken. "In that case," said he, "I accept your resignation." All the ministers followed Dumouriez's example, except Lacoste and Duranthon, whom the king persuaded to remain with him. Messrs. Lajard, Chambonas, and Terrier de Mont-Ciel, chosen from the feuillans, occupied the offices which had become vacant.

"The king," says Madame Campan, "at this period, fell into a dejection of spirits, which amounted almost to an alienation of mind. He was ten days without articulating a word, even in his own family, except, perhaps, at a game of backgammon, which he played with Madame Elizabeth after dinner, when he only pronounced those words which were indispensable for the game. The queen recovered him from this state of mind, so fatal in his critical situation, in which he was hourly called upon to act, by throwing herself at his feet, and rousing him by images of terror, as well as expressions of tenderness. She recalled to his mind what he owed to his family, and went so far as to tell him, that if they must perish, it ought to be with honour, and that they should not wait to be strangled on the floor of their apartment*."

It is not difficult to conceive in what temper of mind Louis returned to himself and the care of his affairs. After having once abandoned the party of the feuillans to throw himself into the arms of the Girondists, he could not return to the former either with much pleasure or hope. He had demonstrated a double evidence of his incompatibility with one party and with the other, and what was more grievous, he had done this with every body. From this time, it was natural he should look to foreign aid, and place all his hopes in that quarter. This disposition was evident to every one, and alarmed all those who saw, in the invasion of France, the fall of liberty, the death and degradation of its defenders, and, perhaps, the partition and dismemberment of the kingdom. Louis did not perceive this, for we always conceal from ourselves the disadvantages of that in which we have placed all our hopes. Alarmed at the tumult which the desertion at Mons and Tournay had produced, he sent Mallet-du-Pan into Germany, with instructions written in his own hand. He there recommended the sovereigns to advance with caution, to treat with the greatest consideration the inhabitants of the provinces through which they marched, and to send a manifesto before them to declare their pacific and conciliatory intentions*. However moderate this design might be, it did not the less convey an invitation to invade the country; and, besides, if the heart of Louis was thus free from hostility, were the dispositions of foreign princes, rivals of France and those of the exasperated emigrants, equally mild? Was the king himself sure that he would not be drawn in, and go farther than he intended? Even the ministers of Prussia and Austria expressed to Mallet-du-Pan the distrust with which the extravagant conduct of the emigrants inspired them, and it appears he had much trouble in reassuring them on that subject†; the queen also distrusted them, and feared Calonne, as the most dangerous of her enemies‡; but she did not the less entreat her family to act with the greatest promptitude for her deliverance. From this moment, the popular party might regard the court as an enemy, the more formidable, from its having at its disposal all the resources of the state; and the impending struggle between them was one of life or death. The king, in composing his new ministry, took care not to choose any man whose opinions were publicly known. In the expectation of his approaching deliverance, he had only to pass a few days, as he imagined, in his present thralldom, and thought that the most insignificant ministry would answer him for so short a time.

The Feuillans endeavoured to profit by the present occasion to attach themselves again to the court, but less, it must be confessed, from personal ambition, than from a desire to serve the king. They thought little of the invasion; they saw in it an attempt, the danger of which threatened the court as much as the nation. They foresaw, and with reason, that the king would probably fall a sacrifice to popular indignation before succour could reach him; and after the invasion, they dreaded a cruel retribution, perhaps the dismembering of the kingdom, and certainly the abolition of all liberty.

Lally Tolendal, who, it has been seen, quitted France the moment the establishment of two chambers was rejected, Malouet, who had again attempted to carry that measure, on the Revision §, and Dupont, Lameth, Lafayette, and others, whose sole object it was to preserve the liberty which had already been acquired, now concerted means for the fulfilment of the common views. This party was not (as indeed was the case with all of them)

save the king.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Lafayette's letter to the

on better terms with itself than the court or the Jacobins, but at present the single object, that of saving the king from the consequence of his own errors, and to save the constitution with him, kept them united. Every unsuccessful party compelled to act in the dark, has to depend upon its own plans, which are termed intrigues when they prove unsuccessful. In this sense, the Feuillans intrigued. When they saw the dismissal of Servan, Claviere, and Roland brought about by Dumouriez, they proposed allying themselves to him, on condition that he would countersign the veto against the decree concerning the priests. Dumouriez, perhaps from petulance, perhaps from want of confidence in their means, and without doubt also because he had engaged to get that decree sanctioned, repeated these overtures, and joined the army, with the hope, as he wrote to the assembly, that a shot from a cannon might reconcile all opinions with regard to his conduct.

Lafayette remained still in the party of the Feuillans, and, without entering into their secret intrigues, partook of their ill opinions against Dumouriez, and desired, above all things, to save the king without effecting a change in the constitution. Their means, however, were few. The court whom they wished to save, did not wish to be saved by their interference. The queen, who confided voluntarily in Barnave, always employed the greatest precautions in her interviews with him, and never received him but in secret: for the emigrants and the court would never have pardoned her for conferring personally with a constitutionalist; they recommended her, in fact, not to treat with that party, but rather to prefer the Jacobins, because, said they, engagements must be entered into with the former, but with the latter no terms need be kept*. If the personal hatred of the queen to Lafayette, is added to these oft-repeated counsels, it will easily be comprehended how little the court was disposed to avail itself of the service of either the Constitutionalists or Feuillans. Besides these inconsistencies of the court with regard to itself, the inefficiency of their means against the popular party must be considered. Lafayette, it is true, was adored by his soldiers, and could count on the devotion of his army; but he had the enemy before him, and could not leave the frontier exposed, to march towards the interior. Old Luckner, on whom, in that case, he must have solely relied, was feeble-minded, fluctuating, and easily intimidated, though brave in action. But, although their military resources were considerable, the Constitutionalists had no civil means. The majority of the assembly were Girondists; the national guard certainly were partly disposed to favour them, but they were disunited, and nearly disorganized; the Constitutionalists therefore were reduced to employ their military force to march from the frontier to Paris, that is to say, to attempt an insurrection against the assembly; and insurrections favourable to a violent party taking the offensive, are fatal and grievous to a moderate party, who is anxious, while acting on the defensive, not to violate the law.

In the mean time, Lafayette was beset by this party, who concerted with him the plan of a letter which was to be addressed to the assembly. This letter, written in his name, was to contain his true sentiments respecting the king and the constitution, and his disapprobation of whatever militated against the one or the other. His friends were divided in opinion on this subject, some incited and others repressed his zeal; but as he himself had no object in view but that of serving the king, to whom he had sworn fealty, he wrote the letter, and braved all the dangers to which it exposed him. The king and queen, although resolved not to avail themselves of his services, allowed him to write the letter, for they did but see in this expedient the friends of liberty at variance. The letter was presented to the assembly on the 18th of June. Lafayette began by disproving of the proceedings of the last ministry, whom, he said, he was about to impeach when he heard of their dismissal. He continued as follows:—

"It is not enough that this branch of the government be delivered from a pernicious influence; the state itself is in danger, and on the representation of the people does the nation principally place its reliance; but having acquired a constitution, it alone must be the medium of maintaining the national welfare."

Protesting, then, his inviolable attachment to the laws, he described the state of France, and represented her as placed between two enemies, internal and external.

"It is absolutely necessary to conquer them both, but constitutional and just measures can alone give you that power. Look around you. Can you deny that a faction, and, to prevent all misconception, the Jacobin faction, has been the source whence all disorders have sprung? I accuse them openly! Forming a distinct corporation in the metropolis, and in the provinces by their affiliated societies, they usurp the power of the nation, and domineer over its representatives in the assembly."

"In the sittings of this club attachment to the laws is termed aristocracy, and their violation patriotism; there the assassins of Desilles receive their triumphs; there the crimes of Jourdan find pandgyrists; there the massacres which have disgraced the city of Metz excite infernal acclamations!

"Think you to escape reproach by shielding yourselves behind an Austrian manifesto, in which these sectaries are mentioned? Have they become sacred since Leopold has pronounced their name? And because we are obliged to declare war with those foreign powers who have interfered in our affairs, are we, for that reason, freed from the obligation of delivering our country from a domestic tyranny?"

Referring then to the services he had rendered to the cause of liberty, and enumerating the guarantees he had given to his country, the general answered for the fidelity of himself and his troops, and declared that the French nation, unless it were the basest in the universe, could and ought to resist the conspiracy of kings that had been formed against her. "But," added he, "if it is desired that we, the soldiers of liberty, should not fight and die for our country in vain, the strength of our army should be made to bear some proportion to that of the enemy; our stores should be increased, that our movements may be facilitated ; and the welfare of the troops, their clothing, payment, &c., should not be made subject to such fatal delays."

Many other salutary admonitions were added, of which the following was the last and most important :—" May the reign of the clubs, overturned by you, give place to the reign of the law ; their usurpations, to the firm and free action of the constituted authorities ; their disorganizing maxims, to the true principles of liberty ; their delirious fury, to the calm and constant courage of a nation appreciating its rights and defending them with energy ; finally, their sectarian combinations, to the true interests of the country, which, in this moment of danger, should unite all those heart and hand to whom its slavery and ruin are not objects of atrocious exultation and infamous speculation !"

This was saying to exasperated passions, be calm ; to the parties themselves, voluntarily immolate yourselves ; or to a torrent, stop ! Although, however, his advice was useless, it was still the duty of the general to urge it. His letter was much applauded by the right side, the left remained silent ; and as soon as the reading of it was finished, it was proposed to print it, and send it to the departments.

Vergniaud then rose. He observed that the liberty which Monsieur Lafayette had hitherto so well defended, required that a distinction should be made between the petitions of private citizens, who might either offer a piece of intelligence, or demand the execution of some act of justice, and the advice of a general at the head of an army. The latter, he observed, should confine his communications with the assembly to the channel of the ministry, or it would be impossible to preserve the existence of liberty. He therefore proposed passing to the order of the day. Thevenot replied, that it was the duty of the assembly to receive from the mouth of Lafayette truths which it had not dared to disclose to itself. This last observation occasioned much uproar. Some members denied the authenticity of the letter. " Even if it had not been signed," exclaimed M. Coube, " none but M. Lafayette could have written it." Guadet required leave to make a single observation ; he remarked, that the letter could not have been written by M. Lafayette, as it spoke of the dismissal of Dumouriez, which had not taken place on the 16th inst., which was its date. " It is impossible," added he, " that the subscriber should speak of a fact which could not have been known to him. Either, therefore, the signature is not M. Lafayette's, or a blank space must have been left for it, to be filled up at the will of a faction." This observation caused a great sensation. Guadet resumed his speech, and declared that, judging from the known sentiments of M. Lafayette, he should think him incapable of having written the letter in question. " He ought to know," added he, " that when Cromwell"—Dumas, not being able to contain himself at this last word, demanded to speak—the assembly was now full of disorder—nevertheless, Guadet regained possession of the tribune, and continued : " I said"—here he was interrupted again. " You were making an observation about Cromwell," exclaimed many voices. " I observed, that M. de Lafayette ought to have known that when Cromwell held similar language, the liberties of England were destroyed. We must ascertain the truth ; either some skulking poltroon has masked himself with the name of M. Lafayette, or, if we discover that the letter has really been written by him, we shall be called upon to prove, by a great example, to the nation, that the oath you have taken to maintain the constitution was not made in vain.

Many members attested the signature of M. Lafayette, nevertheless it was sent to the committee of twelve, that its authenticity might be ascertained. This prevented its being printed and sent to the departments.

The generous conduct of Lafayette was therefore perfectly useless, as might have been expected, and he himself became almost as unpopular as the court ; for although the Girondists might not believe Lafayette capable of betraying his country because he had attacked the Jacobins, the mass of the people, by dint of hearing it repeated in the clubs, the journals, and the public places, did believe it.

Thus the conduct of the general only added to the alarms which the court occasioned to the popular party, who, driven to despair, resolved to strike a blow at its enemies before they could put into execution those designs whereof they were accused.

The composition of the popular party has already been described. Their principles became daily more clearly developed, and new characters became conspicuous among them. Robespierre had already acquired much celebrity at the Jacobin club, and Danton among the Cordeliers. The clubs, the municipality, and the sections, contained many zealots, ready for any enterprise. In this number were included Sergeant and Panis, who were afterwards identified with a formidable event. In the faubourgs many commandants of battalions had rendered themselves formidable, the chief of whom was a beer brewer named Santerre. By a lofty stature, a sonorous voice, and a certain gift of the gab, he succeeded in pleasing the people, and acquired a species of absolute control over the Faubourg St. Antoine, whose battalion he commanded. Santerre had already distinguished himself in the attack on Vincennes, quelled by Lafayette in February, 1791 ; and like all weak men was governed by the impulse of the moment. He assisted at all the popular convocations which were held in any of the faubourgs. In these he allied himself with the journalist Carrat, who had been prosecuted for libelling Bertrand de Molléville and Montmorin ; a man of the name of Alexandre, commandant of the Faubourg St. Marceau ; another individual, better known as Fournier the American ; Legendre the butcher, who afterwards became a deputy of the convention ; Rosignol a goldsmith's foreman ; and several others ; who, by their intimacy with the populace, kept the faubourgs in continual agitation. Through the most respectable of these they communicated with the leaders of the popular party, and could thus subject their proceedings to a superior direction.

The deputies who gave this direction to the multitude cannot be distinctly pointed out. The most distinguished members of them were strangers to Paris, and possessed no influence except what their eloquence obtained for them. Guadet, Isnard, and Vergniaud were all inhabitants of the provinces, and kept up more intercourse with their departments than with Paris. Besides, although warm in the tribune, they had no activity out of doors, and were incapable of stirring up the multitude. Condorcet and Brissot, deputies of Paris, were equally as inactive; and, by their conformity of opinion with the deputies of the west and south, had become Girondists. Roland, since the dismissal of the patriot ministry, had led a perfectly retired life. He inhabited a small and retired house in the Rue St. Jaques. Being persuaded that the king had determined to deliver up France and liberty into the hands of foreigners, he deplored, with a few of his friends, deputies of the assembly, the misfortunes of his country, yet it does not appear that he ever meditated an attack upon the court. All he did, was to encourage a journal called the Sentinel, which Louvet, who had distinguished himself in his controversy with Robespierre on the question of the war, edited in a manner truly patriotic. Roland, during his ministry, had appropriated certain funds to the support of periodical works, whose object was to inform the public mind on political affairs; it was with the remainder of those funds that the expenses of the Sentinel were now defrayed.

About this period, there was at Paris a young Marseillais, ardent, courageous, and inspired by republican illusions, who obtained the name of Antinous from his remarkable personal beauty. He had been returned by his commune to the assembly, for the purpose of making complaints against the directory of his department; for these dissensions between the inferior and superior authorities, between municipalities and departmental directories were common enough throughout France. The real name of this young Marseillais was Barbaroux. Possessing great talent and activity, he was well adapted to serve the popular cause. He visited Roland, and deplored with him the calamities which menaced the patriots. They agreed, that as these dangers grew every day darker in the north, it would be necessary, in case of extremity, to retire to the southern provinces, and there found a republic, which might gradually enlarge its limits, as Charles VII. had formerly extended his kingdom of Bourges. They examined the map with the ex-minister Servan, and observed that, driven from the Rhine, and beyond, liberty could retreat behind the Vosges and the Loire; that, driven from these entrenchments, there yet remained in the east, the Doubs, the Ain, and the Rhône; in the west, the Vienne and the Dordogne; and in the centre, the rocks and rivers of Limousin. "Still further on," added Barbaroux, "we have the Auvergne, its precipitous steepes, its ravines, its ancient forests, and the mountains of Velay, enveloped with volcanic explosions and covered with woods of fir; uncultivated haunts, where the inhabitants labour in the snow, but preserve their independence. The Cévennes also opens to us an asylum too well known not to be formidable to tyranny; and at the extremity of the south, we find for barriers, the Isère, the Durance, and the Rhône from Lyons to the sea, the Alps, and the ramparts of Toulon. Finally, if all these holds should be forced, Corsica would still remain—Corsica, where the Genoese and French have never been able to naturalize tyranny, and which wants nothing but hands to fertilize, and philosophers to enlighten it *."

It was natural for the natives of the south to contemplate taking refuge in their provinces, if Paris should be invaded. Yet they did not neglect the north, for they wrote to their departments, urging the spontaneous formation of a camp of twenty thousand men, although the decrees relative to this measure was not sanctioned. They reckoned with strong assurance on the co-operation of Marseilles, a rich, populous, and democratic city. This city had sent Mirabeau to the states-general, and had since been active in diffusing her animating spirit over the provinces of the south. The mayor of this town was the friend of Barbaroux, and joined in all his republican opinions. Barbaroux directed him to lay up a large provision of corn, to send men in whom confidence could be placed into the neighbouring departments, and to the armies of the Alps, Italy, and of the Pyrenees, to prepare the public mind, to sound Montesquieu, the general of the army of the Alps, and make his ambition servicable to the cause of liberty; and, finally, to concert measures with Paoletti and the Corsicans, to bespeak their aid, and as it were to provide for the patriots a last resource and safe asylum. He further recommended this same mayor to retain the revenues of the taxes collected in the department, that the executive government might be deprived of them, and that, if need were, they should be made available against the government. The example of Barbaroux at Marseilles, was followed by others in most of the provinces. Thus, distrust being converted into despair, every preparation was made for a general insurrection, and in these preparations a variance might already be discerned between Paris and the departments.

The mayor, Pétion, connected with the Girondists, and afterwards identified and proscribed with them, was, owing to his situation, constantly in communication with the rioters of Paris. He was a very steady magistrate, and possessed much of that coolness which his enemies mistook for stupidity, with a downright honesty highly extolled by his partisans, and which his enemies never denied. The people surnamed him "Virtue Pétion." We have already spoken of him as one of the deputies who escorted the king on his return from Varennes, and whom the court preferred to Lafayette, when candidate for the majority of Paris. The court desired to corrupt his integrity, and their panders promised them success. These persons required a sum of money for the purpose, and kept it for themselves, without even making overtures to Pétion, whom they knew to be inaccessible to bribery. The self-gratulation of the court in procuring some support, and at the same time corrupting a public magistrate, was of short duration. They soon discovered their mistake, and found that the virtues of their adversaries were not so venal as they had imagined.

Pétion was one of the first who could not believe that the notions of a king whose birthright was an absolute monarchy, could ever be qualified. Pétion was, consequently, a republican before even a republic was ever hinted at; and in the constituent assembly maintained those principles from conviction, which Robespierre advanced from motives of bitterness and malevolence. Under the legislative assembly, he became still more convinced of the incorrigibility of the court, being persuaded that they would call in foreign aid: and having first been a republican in theory, he next became one in a practical view, as the only means of security. From this time, therefore, he himself declared that he gave every encouragement to a new revolution, checking all insurrections which appeared badly directed, favouring those which seemed to promise a successful result, and endeavouring to reconcile their acts with the letter of the law, of which he himself was a rigid observer, and which he was unwilling to violate, except in a case of the last extremity.

Without being able to point out precisely the part Pétion took in the disorders which were now being fomented, or to ascertain whether he consulted with his Girondist friends on the subject, it may be safely asserted that he threw no obstacles in their way. It has been reported, that towards the end of June, Pétion, together with Robespierre, Manuel the procureur syndic of the commune, and Silery, an ex-constituent, met at the house of Santerre; that Chabot an ex-capuchin and deputy then harangued the section of Quinze Vingts, and informed them that the assembly awaited their co-operation. Whether this took place or not, it is certain that popular meetings were held at this period, and, judging from their avowed opinions and subsequent conduct, it is highly probable that these individuals, whom we have just named, did not scruple to take an active part in their proceedings*. It was about this time that the idea of celebrating the 20th of June, the anniversary of the oath of the tennis-court, by a popular fête, was first started in the faubourgs. It was proposed to plant the tree of liberty on the terrace of the Feuillans, and to address a petition to the assembly and the king. This petition was to be presented by an armed multitude, and its object was evidently to terrify the court by a display of forty thousand pikes.

On the 16th of June, a formal demand was addressed to the council-general of the commune, calling upon them to authorize the presentation of a petition to the king and the assembly on the 20th, by the armed citizens of the faubourg St. Antoine. The council-general, without paying attention to this demand, passed to the order of the day, and ordered their resolution to be communicated to the directory and municipality. The petitioners did not consider themselves as prohibited, and declared loudly that they should nevertheless hold their meeting. The mayor, Pétion, delayed the communications of the 16th till the 18th, and then merely laid them before the department, and not before the municipal body.

On the 19th, the directory of the department which, we have observed, signalized itself on every occasion by its activity against the rioters, issued an order which prohibited all armed meetings, and called upon the commandant-general to neglect no means of dispersing them. This order was presented to the assembly by the minister of the interior, and the question was agitated whether it should be read. Vergniaud opposed its reception, but without success; it was therefore read, and followed immediately by the order of the day.

Two events of great importance had just happened in the assembly. The king had signified his dissent from the two acts, of which one was relative to the non-juring priests, and the other to the establishment of a camp of twenty thousand men. This communication was received in profound silence. At the same moment a body of Marseillais presented themselves at the bar of the chamber to read a petition. The effects of Barbaroux's correspondence with his native city will now be perceived. Roused by his exhortations, the Marseillais had written to Pétion, offering him all their forces, and to this offer was joined a petition addressed to the assembly, of which the following is an extract.

"The liberty of France is in danger, but the patriotism of the South will defend it. The day of the people's wrath has arrived. Legislators! the physical strength of the people is in your hands; make use of it. Patriotism calls upon you—march with the most commanding forces towards the capital and the frontiers. You will not surely refuse the authority of the law to those who are willing to perish in its defence."

The reading of this petition provoked long debates in the assembly. The members of the right side maintained, that to send it into the departments would be to incite them to insurrection. In the assembly, nevertheless, the sending of it was decreed, in spite of these just but useless reflections, for the majority were persuaded that nothing but a new revolution could save the nation.

Such were the events of the 19th. In the mean time crowds were assembling in the faubourgs, and Santerre, according to report, is said to have spoke thus to those of his associates, who were somewhat intimidated by the directory, "What do you fear? The national guard will not receive orders to fire, and M. Pétion will be there."

At midnight, the mayor, either thinking the approaching insurrection irresistible, or being willing to favour it, as he did that of the 10th of August, wrote to the directory, soliciting them to legalize the assemblages of the people, by permitting the national guard to receive the citizens of the faubourgs into their ranks. This expedient perfectly satisfied those who, without desiring to promote disorders, wished to intimidate the king; and every thing proves that this was the object of Pétion and the popular leaders. The directory replied to this letter at five o'clock in the morning of the 20th of June, that it persisted in its former orders. Pétion then ordered the commandant-general to furnish all his military posts with their full complement of men, and to double the guard of the Tuilleries; but he did nothing more; and desiring neither to renew the scene of the Champ-de-Mars, or to disperse the assemblage of citizens, he waited till nine o'clock for the meeting of the municipal body. At this meeting, they came to a contrary decision from that of the directory, and it was enjoined the national guard that they should open their ranks to the armed petitioners. Pétion, in not opposing this resolution, though it violated the administrative constitution, placed himself in a species of opposition to the law, which was afterwards made a matter of reproach to him. However, whatever was the character of this order, its purposes were never put into execution, for the national guard had not time to form itself, and the armed meeting became so considerable, that it was no longer possible to alter either its form or direction.

It was now eleven o'clock. The assembly met in expectation of some great event. The members of the directory took refuge among them, and informed them of the inefficacy of all its efforts to prevent the insurrection which was on the point of breaking out. The procureur syndic Roederer, now addressed the assembly. An extraordinary concourse of citizens, he said, had assembled together in defiance of the law, and in spite of the injunctions issued from several of the constituted authorities; that the avowed object of this concourse was to celebrate the 20th of June, and renew their homage to the assembly; but that it was to be feared the evil-intentioned among them would take advantage of the opportunity thus offered them, to enforce an address to the king, which should never be presented except in the simple and pacific form of a petition. Noticing, then, the orders issued by the directory, and the council-general of the commune, and the laws which were in force against armed meetings, and those which limited the number of citizens authorized to present petitions to twenty, he exhorted the assembly to enforce their execution: "For," added he, "although, in the present instance, the armed petitioners have assembled together by a civic impulse, to-morrow a band of rioters may intrude themselves into this chamber, and I then ask you, gentlemen, what shall we then say to them?"

In the midst of the applauses of the right, and the murmurs of the left, side, who, disapproving of the alarm and precaution of the directory, evidently approved of the insurrection, Vergniaud ascended the tribune, and observed, that the impropriety the procureur syndic so much feared should take place was already established; that armed petitioners had been several times received; that they had been before permitted to march through the chamber; that in permitting this the assembly were perhaps to blame, but that the present petitioners would have reason to complain if they did not meet with the same treatment as others had; that if, as it was said, they intended to present an address to the king, they would undoubtedly send it by unarmed petitioners; and that if any danger was thought to menace him, the assembly had only to send a deputation of sixty of its members for his protection.

Dumoulaud admitted the truth of Vergniaud's statement, and confessed that the impropriety complained of was already established, but maintained that it was necessary to abolish it altogether, especially upon the present occasion, unless the assembly wished that both themselves and the king should appear in the eyes of Europe as the slaves of a disorganizing faction. He agreed with Vergniaud in the propriety of sending a deputation for the protection of the king, and insisted upon the responsibility of the municipality and the directory for the maintenance of the laws. The tumult increased every moment. A letter from Santerre was announced; it was read in the midst of the applauses of the galleries. The inhabitants of the faubourg St. Antoine, said this letter, are now celebrating the anniversary of the 20th of June; they have been calumniated, and beg to be admitted to the bar of the assembly to confound their detractors, and prove that they preserve that character which they acquired on the 14th of July.

Vergniaud then replied to Dumoulaud, that if the law had been violated, the precedent was not new; that to attempt to prevent its infraction on the present occasion would be renewing the sanguinary scene of the Champ de Mars; and that, after all, the sentiments of the petitioners contained nothing reprehensible. "Justly anxious for the future," added he, "they wish to prove that, in spite of all the intrigues which are carrying on against liberty, they are always ready to defend it." Here, as it was very evident, the real feeling of the day discovered itself, by one of the usual effects of a debate. The disorder still continued. Ramond wished to speak, but an order of the assembly was necessary to obtain him permission. At this moment the number of the petitioners was stated to the assembly to be eight thousand. "They are eight thousand," exclaimed Calvet, "and we but seven hundred and forty-five! Let us retire." "Order, order," cried a multitude of voices. Calvet was called to order, and Ramond pressed to speak quickly, as eight thousand citizens were waiting out of doors. "If eight thousand are waiting," replied Ramond, "it must be recollected that eight millions of Frenchmen are waiting for me also." He then repeated all the arguments of his friends of the right side. Suddenly the petitioners broke into the chamber. The assembly, indignant at this intrusion, rose up, the president put on his hat, and the petitioners retired in an orderly manner. The assembly, thus satisfied, consented to receive them.

This petition, the tone of which was the most audacious, expressed the sentiments of all the petitions of this period. "The people are ready; they only wait for you; they are disposed to have recourse to decisive measures, to execute the second article of the declaration of rights, resistance to oppression. . . Let that small number who do not agree with our sentiments purify the land of liberty by flying to Coblenz. . . Seek out the cause of the evils which menace us; if they arise from the executive power, let it be annihilated!"

The president, after an answer in which he assured the petitioners of the vigilance of the representatives of the people, and recommended to them obedience to the laws, gave them, in the name of the assembly, permission to pass before them. The doors were then opened, and the concourse, which swelled in a moment to thirty thousand persons at least, traversed the chamber. It is easy to imagine the manner in which the phantasies of a people, abandoned to their own direction, displayed itself on this occasion. Large tablets, on which were inscribed the declaration of rights, preceded their march. Around them danced women and children, carrying in their hands an olive-branch and a pike, that is to say, peace or war at the option of the enemy, chaunting the famous air of ça ira. Then followed the sturdy market-people and labourers of all classes with pikes, old muskets, sabres, and weapons fixed upon clubs. Santerre and the Marquis of St. Hurugues, already notorious in the events of the 5th and 6th of October, brandishing naked swords, marched in front. Some battalions of the national guard who took part in this procession for the purpose of preserving peace, then came forward in good order. Another band of women, and another of men in arms, succeeded them. Streamers, on which were inscribed, "The constitution or death!" waved in the air. Ragged brooches were elevated on poles to the simultaneous shout of Vivent les sans culottes! Finally, an atrocious emblem added to the extravagancy of the spectacle. On the top of a pike was stuck the heart of a calf, under which was written Cœur d'aristocrate. At seeing this, a burst of sorrow and indignation was demonstrated by the assembly; this frightful emblem immediately disappeared, but only to reappear instantly at the gates of the Tuilleries. The applauses of the galleries, the shouts of the people, the civic songs, the denfening murmurs that filled the air, and the anxious silence of the assembly, formed altogether a strange and distressing scene even to those deputies who looked upon the multitude as their auxiliaries. Alas! how is it that, in these times of civil disorder, there is no medium? How is it that those who called to their aid the disciplined barbarians of the north, should have compelled their adversaries to have recourse to another species of barbarians, who, mingling gaiety with ferocity, wallowed in the sinks of cities, and remained stagnant in corruption during the most enlightened era of civilization?

This scene lasted three hours. At last Santerre again appeared, to return the thanks of the people to the assembly and present them with a flag in testimony of their gratitude and respect.

The multitude now made towards the garden of the Tuilleries, whose gates were shut. Numerous detachments of the national guards surrounded the palace, and formed a line from the [terrace of the] Feuillans to the river, presenting an imposing array. By an order from the king, the gates were opened, and the multitude immediately rushed into the garden, marched under the windows of the palace, and before the ranks of the national guard, but manifested no hostile intentions. A bas le veto, et vivent les sans culottes! were the most frequent exclamations; and some added, speaking of the king, "Why does he not show himself? . . . We shall do him no harm." The old cry of "He is deceived," was still heard occasionally, but rarely. The people, prompt to receive the opinions of their leaders, were as much in despair as themselves.

The multitude, evacuating the garden by the gate which faces the Pont Royal, now ascended the quay, and, passing through the wicket of the Louvre, occupied the Place de Caroussel. This space, at present so extensive, was then divided into many streets, which formed a species of arcades*. Instead of the spacious court which now extends between the palace and the gate, and from one wing to the other, there were many little courts, separated by walls and houses. Old fashioned wickets from each of these opened upon the Caroussel. The people swarmed all about, and presented themselves at the royal entrance. This entrance was closed against them; some municipal officers harangued the crowd, and they appeared as if they had made up their minds to retire. It was said that, at this moment, Santerre, quitting the assembly, where he had remained behind to present the flag, returned, reanimated the fury of the people, which already seemed somewhat abated, and ordered a cannon to be placed before the châteaueau. It was now near four o'clock*: suddenly two municipal officers countermanded the sentinel's orders; and thus the vigilance of the troops, who were numerous at this point, and consisted of battalions of national guards and several detachments of gendarmerie, was paralysed: the mob rushed pêle-mêle into the court, and from thence to the vestibule of the palace. Santerre, who was threatened at this moment (as it is said) with a prosecution for the violation of the royal residence, exclaimed, addressing the assailants, "Dear witness that I refuse to enter the apartments of the king." This declaration, however, did not stop the multitude, who were possessed with the excitement of the moment; they soon spread themselves through all parts of the palace, possessed themselves of the staircases, and succeeded in carrying a piece of artillery to the first floor. At the same time, the doors which had been shut against the assailants, were forced open by strokes of hatchets and sabres.

Louis XVI. at this moment sent away a great number of his dangerous friends, who, without being able to save him, had so often endangered his life. They had flocked round him on the present occasion, but he made them quit the Tuilleries, knowing that their presence could only irritate but not repel the multitude. There only remained with him the old Marshal de Mouchy, the commandant of the Aclouque battalion, a few of his household, and many devoted officers of the national guard. It was then that the shouts of the people and the hatchets against the door were heard. The officers of the national guard then entreated him to show himself to the people, and promised to die at his side. He did not hesitate a moment to comply with their request, but at the very instant when he was ordering the doors to be thrown open, a panel of one of them fell at his feet from a violent blow. A free passage being now opened to the multitude, a forest of pikes and bayonets burst on the view of the king. "Here I am," said Louis XVI. showing himself to the unrestrained rabble. Those who surrounded him pressed upon him, forming a rampart about him with their bodies; "Respect your king," cried many voices, and the multitude, who certainly had no particular end in view, and who could be accused of nothing further than a threatening invasion of privacy, slackened the press, and presented a petition personally to the king. Numerous voices called for the petition, and required that it might be heard. Those who were near the person of the king then persuaded him to pass into another apartment which was more spacious, where he might listen to the reading of the petition. This he did, and the people, satisfied to see themselves obeyed, followed the prince, who, by a happy idea, was placed in the recess of a window; he was obliged to get upon a bench; several others, as well as a table, were placed before him; those who accompanied him ranged themselves around him, and some grenadiers of the guard, and officers of the household, augmented the number of his defenders, and formed a barrier, behind which he could hear with less danger the terrible *plebiscitum about to be read. The apartment was now filled with tumult, and cries of "No veto!" "No priests!" "No aristocrats!" "The camp at Paris!" arose from all parts. The butcher, Legendre, approached the king, and demanded, in rough language, the sanction of the decree. "This is neither the time nor place to grant it," replied the king firmly; "I shall do all that the constitution requires." This resistance produced a good effect: "Long live the nation! Long live the nation!" cried the assailants. "Yes," resumed Louis XVI., "Long live the nation! I am its best friend." "Show it," replied a man of the mob, presenting him with a red cap on the top of a pike. A refusal would have been dangerous, and certainly the dignity of the king did not require him to provoke instant death, by rejecting a vain party-symbol, but rather called upon him to sustain the assault of the multitude with firmness, which he did. He placed, therefore, the cap upon his head, and thus gained universal approbation. Being nearly stifled by the heat of the day and the crowd, a man, half-drunk, who held a bottle in one hand, and a glass in the other, offered him some wine to drink, and although he had long feared poison, he drank without hesitation, and was loudly applauded.

Madame Elizabeth, who tenderly loved her brother, was the only one of the family who succeeded in getting near him, which she effected by following him from window to window. The people seeing her, took her for the queen, and cries of "There's the Austrian woman!" ran through the apartment in a terrific manner. The grenadiers of the national guard, who had surrounded the princess, wished to undeceive the people. But this generous sister endeavoured to prevent them; "Leave them in their mistake," said she, "and save the queen!"

The queen, with her son and daughter, had not been able to join her royal consort. She had fled from the lower apartments, and arrived at the council-chamber, but could not reach the king on account of the crowd which blocked up every part of the palace. She did not, however, give up her determination of joining him, but eagerly demanded to be led into the chamber where he was. She was at last persuaded to renounce this resolution, and seated behind the council-table with some grenadiers, saw the people pass before her, her heart beating with terror, and her eyes moist with tears. On one side of her was placed her daughter, who wept bitterly, and on the other her son, who, though frightened at first, was soon tranquillized, and smiled upon the scene, with the happy carelessness of his age. A red cap was given him, which the queen placed upon his head. Santerre, who was near her, recommended respect to the people, and assured her that she was perfectly safe; he repeated to her the hackneyed declaration of the deception that was practised on her: Madame, you are deceived, you are deceived, said he. Then observing that the young prince was incommoded by the red cap which had been placed on his head, "The child is being suffocated," said he, and freed him from his ridiculous incumbrance.

Being informed of the dangers of the palace, many deputies hastened to the king, and addressed the people, exhorting them to respect their sovereign. Others hurried to the assembly, to inform them of all that was passing; and the tumult which prevailed there was greatly augmented by the indignation of the right side, and the efforts which the left made to palliate this irruption into the residence of the monarch. A deputation of twenty-four members was despatched immediately to surround the king. Another deputation, to be relieved half-hourly, was sent to collect and communicate information constantly to the assembly. These deputies, raised on the shoulders of grenadiers, alternately addressed the multitude. Pétion now appeared, but was reproached with having arrived so tardily. He asserted that he had only been informed, at half-past four o'clock, of the invasion which took place at four; that he had lost half an hour before he could reach the Tuilleries; and that the numerous obstacles which separated him from the king had prevented his getting near his person till half-past five. He now approached the monarch; "Fear nothing," said he, "you are in the midst of the people." Louis, in reply, took the hand of a grenadier, and placed it on his heart. "Observe," said he, "whether it beats faster than usual." This noble answer was highly applauded. Pétion then mounted on a chair, and addressing the multitude, told them that having made their representations to the king, it only remained for them to retire peaceably, without tarnishing the honour of the day. Some have asserted that he made use of the words just representations, but this would only prove that he felt the necessity of not wounding the feelings of the people. Santerre joined his influence to his, and the palace was soon evacuated. The crowd retired in a peaceable and orderly manner. It was then about seven o'clock in the evening.

The king, the queen, her sister, and children, now joined each other, shedding torrents of tears. The king, bewildered by the scene which had just passed, still kept the red cap on his head, and perceiving it for the first time after many hours, flung it from him with indignation. New deputies now arrived to inform themselves of the state of the palace. The queen accompanied them over the apartments, pointed out to them the shattered doors and broken furniture, and expressed her grief at the commission of so many outrages. Merlin de Thionville, one of the most fiery republicans, was among the number of these deputies; the queen perceived tears in his eyes. "You weep," said she, "to see the king and his family treated so cruelly by a people whom he has always desired to make happy." "It is true, Madame," replied Merlin, "that I weep at the misfortunes of a sensitive and beautiful woman, the mother of a family; but do not misunderstand me, my tears are neither for the king nor the queen; I hate kings and queens*."

THE SUBSEQUENT EVENTS OF THE 20TH JUNE—ARRIVAL OF LAFAYETTE AT PARIS; HIS COMPLAINTS TO THE ASSEMBLY—RUMOURS OF WAR; APPREHENDED INVASION OF THE PRUSSIANS; VERGNAUD'S SPEECH—RECONCILIATION OF ALL THE PARTIES IN THE PRESENCE OF THE ASSEMBLY THE 7TH JULY—THE COUNTRY DECLARED TO BE IN DANGER—THE DEPARTMENT SUSPENDS THE MAYOR PÉTION FROM HIS FUNCTIONS—THREATENING ADDRESSES TO THE ASSEMBLY AGAINST ROYALTY—LAFAYETTE PROPOSES TO THE KING A SCHEME OF FLIGHT—THE THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF THE 14TH JULY; DESCRIPTION OF THE FÊTE—PRELUDES TO A NEW REVOLUTION—THE INSURRECTIONAL COMMITTEE—REMARKS UPON THE MOST CELEBRATED REVOLUTIONISTS OF THAT PERIOD; CAMILLE DESMOLINS, MARAT, ROBESPIERRE, DANTON—MEASURES TAKEN BY THE FRIENDS OF THE KING FOR HIS PROTECTION—THE COURSE ADOPTED BY THE GIRONDIST DEPUTIES AS THE MEANS OF AVOIDING AN INSURRECTION.

On the morrow of this day of rebellion of the 20th, of which we have been noting the principal events, Paris yet bore a threatening aspect, and each party was more and more violently excited. An universal indignation was naturally expressed by the partisans of the court, who considered its dignity outraged, as well as by the constitutionalists, who were aggrieved at the breach of the laws, and the disturbance of public tranquillity. The outrage was certainly one of a very heinous nature, but party spirit exaggerated it. It was supposed that a design had been formed to assassinate the king, and it was reported that this was only prevented by a fortunate accident. Thus, by a natural re-action of feeling, the royal family, exposed to so many dangers, became an object of public concern, and the supposed authors of the outrage met with general dislike.

In the assembly, the countenances of all wore an appearance of solemnity. Some deputies strongly reprobated the events of the preceding evening. M. Bigot proposed a law against armed petitions, and against the custom of allowing bands of petitioners to enter the chamber; and although there already existed laws against this practice, they were renewed by a decree. M. Daveilhaut proposed that an information should be laid against the insurgents. "How," he was answered, "could forty thousand men be prosecuted?" "Well," replied he, "if one cannot distinguish among forty thousand men, punish the guard for not having defended themselves; at all events do something." The ministers now came to make a report of what had passed; and a discussion took place concerning the nature of the facts themselves. A member of the right side proposed that Vergniaud, being an unexceptionable witness, should give his testimony as to what he had seen. But Vergniaud did not rise at this appeal, but kept silence. Nevertheless, the boldest members of the left side, towards the end of the sitting, shook off their constraint, and resumed their courage. They even ventured to propose that it should be considered whether, in decrees of importance, the veto was necessary; but this proposition was rejected by a great majority.

As the evening drew on, a new scene, similar to that of the preceding, was apprehended. The people, on retiring, had declared they would return, and it was believed they would keep their promise. But whether it was that this menace was thrown out before the passions of the evening had subsided, or that a new attempt was disapproved of by the popular chiefs, it was easily prevented; and Pétion hastened to the palace, to assure the king that order was re-established, and that the people, having made their representations, were calm and content. "That is not true," said the king. "Sire——" "Silence!"—"The magistrate of the people is under no obligation to keep silence when he has done his duty and speaks the truth." "The responsibility for the tranquillity of Paris rests upon your head." "I know my duties and how to fulfil them." "Enough; go and fulfil them; retire."

The king, in spite of the extreme gentleness of his disposition, was subject to fits of ill-humour, which the courtiers called coups de boutoir; and the sight of Pétion, who was accused of having favoured the scenes of the preceding evening, irritated him, and produced the conversation just related. The report of it soon spread throughout Paris. Two proclamations were immediately issued, one from the king, and the other from the municipality; and these two authorities seemed to be in conflict.

The municipality exhorted the citizens to remain tranquil, to respect the king, to respect and to compel respect to the assembly; not to attend armed meetings, because the laws forbade them; and, above all, to distrust the disaffected who endeavoured to excite them again to insurrection.

It was, in fact, reported, that this last design was meditated by the court, that they might have an opportunity of firing on the people with grape-shot. Thus, the palace suggested the idea of assassination; and the faubourgs that of a massacre.

In his proclamation, the king expressed himself as follows:—"Frenchmen will not hear without grief, that the populace, misled by the factious, have entered by force of arms into the habitation of the king... The king opposed nothing to the threats and insults of the factious but conscious integrity and his desire to promote the common weal.

"He is ignorant of the object of this infuriated faction, and at what point they intend to arrest their lawless proceedings; but to whatever excesses they may proceed, they will never force from him his consent to any thing he believes to be contrary to the public interest, &c.

"If those who wish to subvert the monarchy think one crime more necessary, they can commit it.

"The king orders all administrative and municipal bodies to watch over the safety of persons and property."

The opposite language of these two proclamations echoed the prevalent opinions of the day. Those whom the conduct of the court had driven to despair, only became the more irritated, and more bent upon carrying their projects into execution by every possible means. The popular clubs, the municipalities, the pike-men, a portion of the national guard, and the left side of the assembly, well understood the proclamation of the mayor of Paris, and determined to be prudent only so long as prudence was necessary, that they might not expose themselves to be cannonaded with grape-shot, without a decisive result. Being doubtful how to act, they waited for their opportunity, still retaining the same distrust and hatred towards the court. Their first care was to oblige the ministers to appear before the assembly to give an account of the precautions they had taken on two important points, viz:—

I. The religious dissensions excited by the priests; and,

II. The safety of the capital, which the camp of twenty thousand men, refused by the king, had been destined to secure.

Those who were called aristocrats, the sincere constitutionalists, a part of the national guard, many provinces, and especially the directories of the departments, uttered their sentiments on this occasion in an energetic manner. The laws having been violated, they had the argument against their adversaries, and used it unsparingly. Crowds of addresses came from all parts to the king. At Rouen and Paris a petition was drawn up, signed by twenty thousand names; this petition was as odious to the people as that already signed by eight thousand Parisians against the camp at Paris. Finally, an examination into the conduct of Pétion and Manuel, who were both accused of having promoted by their inactivity the insurrection of the 20th of June, was ordered by the department. The conduct of the king, during that fatal day, was spoken of with admiration; his character appeared to be perfectly re-established, and those who were inclined to favour him, reproached themselves with having formerly accused him of weakness. But it was immediately seen that this passive courage which acts on the defensive, is widely distinct from that active and enterprising courage which braves the peril instead of awaiting it with resignation.

The constitutional party resumed their activity and their hopes. Those who had concerted with Lafayette the letter of the 16th of June, again conferred together, for the purpose of making a grand attempt to save the king. Lafayette, indignant at what had happened at the palace, was perfectly disposed to enter into all their plans. Many addresses were sent to him from his army expressing the same indignation; whether these addresses were suggested by others, or were mere voluntary effusions, he put a stop to them by an order of the day, and promised himself to make known the sentiments of the military. He determined to repeat in person to the assembly the contents of his letter of the 16th of June. For this purpose he entered into preliminary arrangements with Luckner, who, being a mere military veteran, and uninformed on every subject but that of war, was easily led to adopt any line of conduct that might be suggested to him. He, therefore, at the instigation of Lafayette, wrote a letter to the king containing the same sentiments as the latter was about to express in person at the bar of the assembly. Lafayette then took every necessary precaution to prevent his absence impeding the military operations of the troops, and reluctantly quitted his army to rush into the midst of the most imminent dangers at Paris.

Lafayette reckoned with confidence on the fidelity of the national guard of Paris, and on a new exertion on their part. He also expected the zealous co-operation of the court, whom he could not look upon as his enemy, at the moment when he was about to expose himself to the greatest dangers in its service. Having already proved his chivalrous love for liberty, he was ready now to display his sincere attachment to the king; and it is probable that his heart, filled with the most romantic heroism, was not insensible to the glory of this double devotion. He arrived at Paris on the morning of the 28th of June. The report of his arrival spread with rapidity, and every one said with great astonishment and wonder that general Lafayette was in Paris.

The attention of the assembly had been lately very much distracted by a great variety of petitions opposed to each other. Those of Rouen, Havre, the Ain, the Seine and Oise, the Pas-de-Calais, and the Aisne, strongly reprobated the excesses of the 20th of June; while those of Arras and the Hérault seemed almost to approve of them. On the one side, the letter of Luckner to the king was presented, and on the other, the most frightful placards against him. These conflicting testimonies of the public opinion created much agitation in the assembly for many days.

On the 28th, the galleries of the chamber were thronged by an immense multitude, as it was expected that Lafayette, whose intentions were yet unknown, would on that day appear at its bar. These expectations were realized. At about half-past one o'clock he demanded admittance, and was received by the applauses of the right side, and the silence of the galleries and the left.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I must first assure you, that in consequence of the arrangements that have been entered into between the Marshal Luckner and myself, my presence here in no way compromises the success of our arms, nor the safety of that army I have the honour to command."

The general then declared the motives which brought him to Paris. "It had been asserted, that the letter of the 16th was not his; he now came to avow it, and to make this avowal, he had quitted a camp where he was devotedly beloved by his soldiers. But another and more powerful reason had prompted him to take this step: the events of the 20th of June had excited the indignation of his army, who had presented to him a multitude of addresses on that subject. These he had stopped, and had promised personally to communicate, by making himself the organ of the sentiments they contained. "The troops already require to be satisfied," added Lafayette, "whether it be really the cause of liberty and the constitution that they are defending?"

He then solicited the national assembly:

1st.—To prosecute the ringleaders of the outrages of the 20th of June:

2nd.—To annihilate a faction that usurped the national sovereignty, and whose public debates left no doubt of the iniquity of their designs:

3rd.—And finally, to enforce respect for the laws, and thus satisfy the army that the constitution would receive no detriment from within, while they shed their blood to protect it from without.

The president replied to this expostulation, that the assembly would remain faithful to the law, and that the petition of the general should be examined. He was then invited to partake of the honours of the sitting.

The general was about to take his seat with the members of the right side; but Korsant observed that the petitioners' bench was his proper place. "Yes! no!" arose from all parts of the chamber, and the general rose quickly and seated himself on the petitioners' form. Applauses accompanied him to this new situation. Gaudet first spoke, and, giving a plausible turn to his observations, asked if the enemies of the nation were vanquished, if the country was delivered from their hostilities, since M. Lafayette was at Paris. "No," continued he, "the country is not delivered, our situation is not changed, and yet the general of one of our armies is at Paris!" He would not inquire, he said, whether M. Lafayette, who saw nothing in the French nation but factions, circumventing and menacing the constituted authorities, was not himself surrounded by a staff which directed all his movements; but he would observe that M. Lafayette was wanting in his duty to the constitution by making himself the organ of an army legally incapable of deliberating on political subjects; and he was not sure that he had not also committed himself with the supreme military power by coming to Paris without the authority of the minister of war.

Gaudet then called upon the minister of war to inform the assembly whether he had given leave of absence to M. Lafayette, and further demanded that the extraordinary commission should declare whether a general could bring before the notice of the assembly matters purely political.

Ramond then presented himself to reply to Gaudet. He commenced by making an observation very natural and applicable in many instances, which was, that the interpretation of the law was frequently varied by circumstances. "The assembly," said he, "has never been scrupulous with regard to the right of petitioning. When an armed rabble lately presented themselves they were not asked the nature of their mission, nor were they reproached with menacing the independence of the assembly by an array of arms; but when M. Lafayette, whose whole life, both in America and Europe, has been devoted to the sacred cause of liberty, presents himself singly, and in the garb of peace, suspicions are awakened! If two sets of weights and measures must be used, if there are two mediums of viewing the same circumstances, if any exceptions are to be admitted of, at least let the preponderance favour, let our partiality plead for the eldest son of liberty!"

Ramond concluded by moving that the petition be sent to the extraordinary commission, not to examine the conduct of M. Lafayette, but the petition itself. After much tumult, and a second collection of votes, this motion was adopted; and Lafayette left the assembly, surrounded by a numerous retinue of deputies and soldiers of the national guard, his partisans, and former companions in arms.

The present was a moment decisive of the fate of the court, of his own fate, and that of the popular party. He hastened to the palace. The most injurious slanders were there circulated in his presence in various knots of courtiers. The king and queen received with coldness that man who came to sacrifice his life in their service. Lafayette quitted the palace grieved at what he had seen, not on his own account, but for that of the royal family. On leaving the Tuilleries he was received by an immense crowd, who accompanied him to his house with the shouts of Vive Lafayette! and planted a may-bush at his door. These testimonies of old attachment sensibly affected the general, and intimidated the Jacobins. Now was the time to make the most of his remaining popularity, and to revive it, in order to render it serviceable. Some of the commandants of the national guard, who were much attached to the interests of the court, applied to the king, to know in what manner they were to act. He and the queen were both determined not to second M. Lafayette*. He thus found himself abandoned by the only part of the national guard which could be relied on. Yet being still willing to serve the king in spite of himself, he consulted with his friends on the subject. They, however, were divided in their opinions. Some, and among the rest Lally-Tollendal, advised attacking the Jacobins in their clubs; others, who were members of the department and the assembly, were unwilling to violate the law, from the rigid observation of which they derived their sole advantage over their adversaries. Nevertheless, Lafayette preferred the boldest of these two counsels, and appointed a rendezvous with his partisans, to put it into execution, by driving the Jacobins out of their chamber of assemblage and walling up its doors. But only a few of his friends met him at the place of rendezvous, and he found it impossible to carry out his attempt. In the mean time the Jacobins, also ignorant that he was in despair at the defection of his partisans, were seized with a panic, and abandoned their club. They ran to Dumouriez, who had not yet joined the army, to put himself at their head, and march against Lafayette, but their offer was not accepted. Lafayette remained still at Paris another day, though encompassed by threats of impeachment, and designs of assassination, and finally left, deeply regretting his useless zeal and the fatal infatuation of the court. And yet it is this man, so completely exposed while he risked his life to save the king, who has been accused of betraying Louis XVI. The court historians have asserted that his designs were unskillfully arranged, and his means insufficient. The aid of eighty thousand Prussians appeared to them, no doubt, a much more safe and effectual way of accomplishing the rescue of the king. But to those who looked not to foreign assistance, no other method of effecting this purpose remained but that which Lafayette wished to adopt, by putting himself at the head of the national guard, and dispersing and overawing the Jacobins.

Lafayette left Paris, designing still to serve the king, and determined, if possible, to procure him the means of quitting the capital. He wrote a letter to the assembly, enforcing, with extreme energy, the sentiments contained in his former communications, against those whom he denominated the factious.

Scarcely were the popular party freed from the apprehensions which the presence of the general caused them, when they recommenced their attacks upon the court, and persisted in demanding an account of the measures which had been taken for the defence of the territorial line of France. It has already appeared that the Prussians, although the executive power had made no notification on the subject to the assembly, had violated their neutrality, and were advancing in the direction of Coblenz, with a large army, eighty thousand strong, composed of the veteran troops of the great Frederick, and commanded by the duke of Brunswick, a celebrated general. Luckner, having but a small force, and placing little confidence in the Belgians, had been obliged to retire on Lille and Valenciennes. In this retreat an officer had set fire to the suburbs of Courtray, and it was believed that the object of this cruel act was to alienate the Belgians. The government took no measures to augment our armies, which, on the three frontiers, amounted at most only to a hundred and thirty thousand men; and no means were resorted to, to awaken the zeal and enthusiasm of the nation, though the enemy might be at Paris in six weeks.

The hopes of the queen were much revived by this expectation, which she communicated in confidence to one of her ladies. She had in her possession a map of the route of the emigrants and the king of Prussia. She knew on what day they would arrive at Verdun, on what day at Lille, and that it would be necessary to take the last place by siege. This unfortunate princess hoped, she said, to be set at liberty in a month*. Alas! why did she not believe those sincere friends who represented to her the danger and inefficacy of foreign aid; who told her that it would arrive soon enough to compromise, but not soon enough to save her! Why did she not give credence to her own fears in this point, and the melancholy presentiments which sometimes oppressed her!

It has been already observed, that the establishment of a camp of reserve at Paris was the great object which occupied the attention of the popular party at this period. The king, as we have before said, opposed this design. He was now summoned, in the persons of his ministers, to declare the precautions he had taken to supply the place of the decree he had refused to sanction. In reply to this summons, he offered a new proposition to the consideration of the assembly; that of establishing an army of reserve at Soissons, composed of forty-two battalions of national volunteers, to occupy the place of a former dépôt which had been exhausted by draughts sent to the principal armies. This was, in some measure, the first decree of the assembly, with a slight alteration,—a very important one in the opinion of the patriots, inasmuch as the camp of reserve was to be formed between Paris and the frontier, and not near Paris itself. The proposition was received with murmurs of discontent, and sent back to the military committee.

Many of the departments and municipalities, excited by their constant correspondence with Paris, now determined to execute the act of the assembly relative to the camp of twenty thousand men, although it had not received the royal assent. The departments of the Bouches-de-Rhone, of the Gironde, and the Hérault, set the first example, and were soon imitated by many others. Such was the commencement of the insurrection.

So soon as these voluntary levies became publicly known, the assembly, modifying the intention of raising forty-two new battalions proposed by the king, decreed, that the troops which their zeal had sent on their march before they were legally embodied, should pass through Paris to be registered by the municipality of that city; that they should then resume their route to Soissons, to encamp there; so that those who would be able to reach Paris before the 14th of July, the day of the confederation, should assist at that national solemnity. The celebration of this anniversary had been prevented in the year 1791, by the flight of the royal family to Varennes; it was therefore intended to solemnize it in 1792 with extraordinary splendour. The assembly added, that immediately after its celebration, the federalists should pursue their route to their destination.

This was, at the same time, to authorise the insurrection of the departments, and little else than insisting on the execution of the unsanctioned decree. The only difference was, that, by the last decree, the federalists would merely pass through Paris; but the object was to get them there: being once there, a thousand pretexts might be devised to retain them. This decree was immediately sent to the king, and received the royal assent the following day.

To this important measure the assembly added another. A part of the national guards, and especially their staffs, who, as they progressed towards power, manifested a disposition to support it, excited much suspicion in the minds of the patriots. The national guard of Paris, more particularly, incurred these suspicions; but as the assembly could not exclusively designate them in a legislative act, they decreed that all the staffs of the national guards should be disbanded and re-elected*. They clearly foresaw that, in the agitated state of France, which daily increased the influence of aspiring characters, this re-election would turn entirely in favour of those who were attached to the popular and republican party.

These were important measures carried forcibly against the right side and the court; yet they did not appear sufficient protection against the imminent dangers with which the people believed themselves menaced. Forty thousand Prussians, and as many Austrians and Sardinians, were advancing towards our frontiers; the court appeared to be in concert with the enemy; no means were employed to augment the army, or rouse the nation. On the contrary, the veto was made use of to thwart the measures of the legislature, and the civil list to procure partisans in the interior; and a general was at the head of the army who was believed capable of joining with the court to deliver up France, because he had taken up its defence against those who unjustly calumniated the king. All these circumstances combined, greatly agitated the public mind. "The country is in danger," was the general cry; but how the danger was to be met was the difficulty. The public were not even agreed as to its cause. The constitutionalists and partisans of the court, as much terrified as the patriots themselves, imputed every danger to the factions, trembled only for royalty, and dreaded above all things the effects of the disunion which prevailed among themselves. The frightened patriots, on the contrary, apprehended only the danger of an invasion, and attributed every evil to the refusals, delays, and secret intrigues of the court. Petitions from all parts of the kingdom daily increased; some imputed every disaster to the Jacobins; and others to the court, which was designated by the name of the Palace, (Château), the Executive power, and the Veto. The assembly, having read these petitions, sent them all to the extraordinary commission of twelve, which had been for some time occupied in devising means to secure the public safety. The plan of this commission was desired with impatience. Meanwhile menacing placards every where met the eye; and the public papers, equally bold, spake openly of a forced abdication and dethronement. This was the subject of conversation every where; nor was the least moderation of language on this topic observed any where but in the assembly. There indeed the attacks upon royalty were still indirect. It was proposed, for instance, to suppress the veto in decrees of importance; the question of the civil list and its culpable expenditure, was many times discussed; and a limitation of its expenses, or its subjection to public scrutiny, had been seriously considered.

The court had never refused to yield to the representations of the assembly on the subject of augmenting the defensive force of the country. This could not have been done without too openly declaring its objects; and besides, the numerical increase of an army believed to be in a complete state of disorganization, was little feared by the partisans of royalty. The popular party, on the contrary, wished to see such extraordinary measures resorted to, as would announce an energetic resolve; such as has frequently caused the most desperate enterprise to triumph. These measures the commission of twelve suggested, and proposed to the assembly, who settled the following formula.

When the danger of the country should become imminent, the legislature of the country are required to declare it in this solemn form of words: "The Country is in danger."

Whenever this announcement should be made, all the local authorities, the councils of the communes, those of the districts and departments, and the assembly itself, as the first of all the constituted authorities, were to be considered as permanent, and to hold their sittings without interruption. All citizens were required to deliver up to the respective authorities under which they lived, the arms they might possess, to be distributed as most expedient for the public service. Both the young and the old who were capable of serving as soldiers, were to be enrolled in the national guard. Of these, it was proposed, that some should be sent to the seats of the different authorities of the districts and departments, and there remain stationary; and that others should hold themselves in readiness to act wherever the exigencies of the country might require them, either on home or foreign service. A uniform was not exacted from those who could not procure it. The pay of volunteers was to be given to all the national guards who were removed from their own residences. The constituted authorities were made responsible for the provision of all necessary stores. Every sign of rebellion, coupled with an overt act, was made punishable with death; and every cockade and flag, except the tri-coloured, was deemed seditious.

This proposition put the whole nation in arms, and on its guard; it was thus prepared at a moment's notice either to deliberate or fight; it presented a front to every enemy, and could dispense with the sluggish operations of the government. Thus the entire population of France was set in motion, yet all riots, insurrections, and disorders were provided against by the superintendence of those well-organized authorities, in which this universal agitation originated, and by which it was directed. If, after this appeal, Frenchmen did not assert their rights, they would no longer deserve that others should make those exertions for them which they would not second themselves. A most animated discussion, as may be well supposed, took place on this proposed law.

The deputy Pastoret made the preliminary report upon the 30th of June. His speech was perfectly unsatisfactory; he accused all parties in turn; gratifying each alternately by abusing the others; but he proposed no positive measures for averting the impending dangers. After him, the deputy Jean de Bry explained with clearness and moderation the project of the commission. The discussion once opened, shortly became nothing else but a bandying of reproaches. This drove many who were more remarkable for warm imaginations and fiery tempers than for sound wisdom, into violent extremes. The all-important law, concerning public safety, that is, the dictatorship, or power of absolute direction, with the chance of its being used cruelly though powerfully, this law which should not have been enacted but in the convention, was nevertheless proposed in the legislative assembly.

M. Delaunay D'Angers proposed that the assembly should declare, that till after the dangers which at present threatened the kingdom had passed away, they would consult no other law than the imperative and supreme law of the public safety.

This was, by means of an indefinite and mysterious formula, equivalent to suppressing royalty, and declaring that the absolute sovereignty existed in the assembly. M. Delaunay declared that the revolution was not yet completed; that those were deceived who imagined it to be so; that the established laws could apply only to a revolution already accomplished, and not to one in need of defence; he concluded by repenting all that is usually said in defence of a dictatorship, the idea of which so forcibly presents itself to the mind in times of public danger, as it concentrates the forces of a nation to overwhelm its enemies. The reply of the deputies of the right side may easily be imagined. They observed that such a measure would violate the oaths taken to preserve the constitution, by creating an authority which would absorb all others. Their adversaries answered by saying that the example of its violation was already given, and that it would be silly to allow themselves to be surprised without defence. "But prove then," resumed the partisans of the court, "that this example has been given, and that the constitution has been violated." This retort produced new accusations against the court, and these accusations were again repelled by reproaches against the factions. "You are demagogues—you are traitors." Such were the reciprocal and eternal accusations—such was the question to be solved.

M. de Jaucour advised sending the proposition to the Jacobin club, so violent did it appear to him. M. Isnard, with his usual intemperance, wished the question to be taken into consideration, and the speech of M. Delaunay sent to the departments, as an antidote to that of M. Pastoret, which he said was a dose of opium given to a man in dying convulsions.

M. de Vaublanc succeeded in making himself heard, by saying that the security of the nation might be preserved by the resources which existed in the constitution, without resorting to any extraordinary remedies; that the project of M. Jean de Bry proved this; that he had no objection to the speech of M. Delaunay being printed, if it were thought necessary, but that it ought not to be sent to the departments; and that the assembly should return to the consideration of the proposition of the commission. This discussion was resumed on the 3rd of July.

One of the principal deputies, Vergniaud, had not yet spoken. Although a member of the Gironde, and its greatest orator, he was, nevertheless, free from party bondage, and, in a great measure, independent. Whether this arose from indifference, or true elevation of mind, he appeared to be superior to the passions by which his friends were agitated; and whilst he partook of their patriotic ardour, seemed free from their prejudices and extravagances. When he gave his decision in a public question, he drew after him, by his eloquence and his acknowledged character for impartiality, that fluctuating part of the assembly which Mirabeau had formerly governed by his argumentative vehemence. Men of unsettled opinions are always subservient to talent and reason*.

It having been announced that he would speak on the grand question of the project of the commission, on the 3rd of July, immense crowds filled the chamber, to hear this great orator on a subject which was regarded as one of life or death†.

In the opening of his speech, he took a view of the general state of France. "If," said he, "the love of the people for liberty was not unquenchable, it might be doubted whether the revolution is retrograding, or advancing to its grand conclusion. Our armies of the north, after having advanced into Belgium, have suddenly retreated; the theatre of war is now brought back again into our own territory; and the unfortunate Belgians have nothing to remember us by but the conflagrations which lit up our retreat; and a formidable army of Prussians is menacing the Rhine, although we had been given vain hopes that their march would not have been so speedy.

"How comes it to pass that this moment has been chosen to dismiss the popular ministers, to break the chain of their operations, to deliver the empire into inexperienced hands, and to repel the efficacious measures which we thought it our duty to propose? Is it true that our triumphs are feared? Is it our blood, or the blood of Coblenz, that the court are so anxious to spill? Is it so sweet to reign over deserted cities and devastated plains? Or what are the objects in view? And you, gentlemen, what grand measure are you about to adopt to meet the public danger?

"You, whom our adversaries flatter themselves they have intimidated; whose consciences they fancy they have alarmed, by calling your patriotism faction, as if those who took the oath of the Tennis-court had not also been called factions; you, who have been so much calumniated, because you are estranged from that haughty set whom the constitution has hurled to the dust; you, who have been supposed to harbour culpable intentions, as if you were invested with any power except that of the law, or possessed a civil list; you, whom, by an hypocritical moderation, some wish to blind to the dangers of the people; you, who, although you have been disunited by the intrigues of our enemies, will, at this moment of danger, put an end to your animosities and miserable dissensions, and sacrifice the infernal joys of hatred to the safety of your country; you, gentlemen, listen to me. What are your resources? What does necessity command? What does the constitution allow?"

This exordium called forth bursts of applause which drowned the voice of the orator. He continued, and pointed out two kinds of dangers, internal and external.

"To meet the first, the assembly has proposed a decree against the priests; but whether it is that the genius of Medicis wanders still under the arches of the Tuilleries, or that a Lachaise, or a Letellier, still pervert the understanding of the prince, the decree has been rejected by the throne. I cannot believe, without doing injustice to the king, that he desires the continuance of religious dissensions. He thinks, therefore, undoubtedly, that the old laws are sufficiently powerful to maintain the public tranquillity. Let the ministers, therefore, answer for it, at their peril, since they possess every necessary means for that purpose!

* The Paris Journal, at that time so celebrated for its opposition to the majority of the assembly, and the great ability with which it was written, (its chief support being the unfortunate and immortal Andre Chenier) has done justice to Vergniaud.—See the paper of the 4th of July, 1792.

† It is not necessary, perhaps, to apprise the reader, that there merely abridge the speech of Vergniaud, without giving it verbatim.

"To meet foreign dangers, the assembly has proposed the plan of a camp of reserve; this also has been refused. It would be doing injustice to the king to believe he wishes to betray France. He has, therefore, a sufficient force to protect it; and his ministers must answer to us, at their peril, for the safety of the country."

Thus far the orator confined himself to the ministerial responsibility. "But," added he, "it is not enough to hurl the ministers down into the abyss which their wickedness or weakness has created. Listen to me with calmness, and do not anticipate my meaning."

At these words the attention of all became still more anxious, and a profound silence pervaded the assembly. "It is in the name of the king," said he, "that the French princes have endeavoured to raise all Europe; it was to avenge the dignity of the king that the treaty of Pilnitz was concluded; it is to come to the aid of the king that the sovereign of Bohemia and Hungary has declared war with us, and that Prussia is marching towards our frontiers. And, I read in the constitution, that 'If the king puts himself at the head of an army, and directs its force against the nation, or if he does not oppose, by a formal act, such an enterprise, executed in his name, he shall be considered as having abdicated the throne.'

"What is a formal act of opposition? If an hundred thousand Austrians march towards Flanders, and an hundred thousand Prussians towards Alsace, and that the king opposes them by ten or twenty thousand men, has he manifested a formal act of opposition?

"If the king, being informed of the movements of the Prussian army, neglects to give information of it to the assembly; if a camp of reserve, necessary to arrest the progress of the enemy in the interior, is proposed, and the king substitutes, in its place, an uncertain and dilatory plan; if he gives the command of the army to an intriguing general, suspected by the nation; if another general, a stranger to corruption, and familiar with victory, demands a reinforcement, and that, by a refusal, the king says, I forbid you to conquer; can it be said that he has manifested a formal act of opposition?

"I have exaggerated many facts," resumed Vergniaud, "to take away all pretexes for hypothetical applications. But if, whilst France was swimming in her blood, the king should say to you:—'It is true, the enemy pretends to act for me, for my dignity, and my rights, but I have proved that I am not his accomplice: I send my armies into the field; these armies, I confess, were too weak, but the constitution does not fix the degree of their strength: I called them together too tardily, but the constitution does not fix the time of their embodying: I arrested a general, on the point of conquest, but the constitution does not order victories: I have confided in ministers who deceived the assembly, and disorganized the government, but their nomination was my privilege: the assembly has passed useful decrees which I have not sanctioned, but I had a right to refuse; I have done all that the constitution prescribes; is it, therefore, possible to doubt of my fidelity to it?"

Loud applause burst from all parts. "If then," resumed Vergniaud, "the king should hold this language to you, would you not have a right to reply:—

'O king, thou who, like the tyrant Lysander, hast chosen lies instead of truth, who hast feigned a love of the laws only to preserve that power which would enable you to brave them, is it for our defence that such an inferiority of force is opposed to our enemies as will leave no doubt of our defeat? Is it for our defence that all plans tending to fortify the interior are crushed? Is it for our defence that a general who violates the constitution remains unchecked, whilst the courage of those who serve it is repressed? Does the constitution give you the choice of ministers for our welfare or our ruin? Does it place you at the head of our armies for our glory or our shame? Does it give you the right of sanction, a civil list, and so many prerogatives, constitutionally to ruin the constitution and the empire? No! no! O man, whom the generosity of the French nation cannot render grateful, and whom alone the love of despotism can touch . . . you are no longer any thing to that constitution which you have so unworthily violated, or to that people whom you have so basely betrayed!'

"But no," resumed the orator, "if our armies are not complete, the king undoubtedly is not culpable; without doubt, he will take the necessary measures to save us; without doubt the march of the Prussians will not be so triumphant as they hope; but it is necessary to anticipate all that may happen, and to speak out, for open dealing alone can save us."

He finished by proposing a message to Louis XVI., firm but respectful, requiring him to make his option between France and foreign countries, and assuring him, that the nation was resolved to perish or triumph with the constitution. It besides proposed that the country should be declared in danger, to kindle those enthusiastic affections of the heart which always animate great nations, and which, undoubtedly, would burn brightly in the bosoms of the French; "for," said he, "it is not in regenerated France of 1789, that nature can show itself degraded." It finally recommended the termination of all dissensions among the friends of the people, between the natives of Rome and the inhabitants of Mount Aventine.

The last words of this speech were pronounced in a tone of great emotion. Its effect was electrical. Applauses, in which the galleries joined, rose from all sides. On quitting the tribune, the orator was surrounded by a crowd of congratulators. He alone had dared to speak openly in the assembly of the deposition of the king, a common topic of discourse in public, but he had not presented this proposition other than as a mere hypothesis, and yet in a respectful manner conpared with the language suggested by the political fury of that period.

Dumas rose to reply ; and, whilst his auditors were yet under the impression of Vergniaud's eloquence, endeavoured to turn their feelings into another channel. He called several times for silence, but could obtain no attention. He laid great stress upon the reproaches which had been directed against the government. "The retreat of Luckner," said he, "is attributable to the chances of war, which cannot be regulated in the cabinet. Undoubtedly, you have confidence in Luckner ?" "Yes, yes !" was answered from all sides. Kersaint then proposed passing a decree which should declare that Luckner retained the national confidence. This was carried without opposition ; and Dumas continued. He said, and with reason, that if that general possessed the confidence of the assembly, the motive of his retreat could not be regarded as culpable, or even suspicious ; that, as to the deficiency of sufficient force to cope with the enemy, which was complained of, the marshal himself knew that all the troops which were at the disposition of government were employed in the war ; that, besides, all hostile preparations had been made by the Girondist ministry, to whom alone, as authors of the war, the blame of every deficiency was to be imputed ; that the new ministers could not repair all the errors of former ones in so short a time as had elapsed since their installation in office ; and that, finally, they had given full powers to Luckner to act as circumstances might require.

"The camp of twenty thousand men has been refused," added Dumas, "but the ministers are not responsible for the use that may be made of the veto ; and besides, the plan they have proposed, as a substitute, is much the more preferable than that proposed by the assembly, as it does not paralyse the means of recruiting. The decree against the priests has also been rejected, but there is no necessity for new laws to maintain the public tranquillity ; nothing is required but confidence, respect for the laws, personal liberty, and liberty of worship ; wherever these things have been respected, the priests have not been seditious." Dumas finally justified the king, by reminding the assembly that the former had never been favorable to the war, and Lafayette, in reminding them also that he had been, from his earliest days, the friend of liberty.

The decree, proposed by the commission of twelve, to regulate the form in which the declaration of the danger of the country should be made, was passed in the midst of loud applause. But the declaration itself was adjourned, there being, as yet, no fit occasion for proclaiming it. The king, without doubt driven to it by all that had transpired, notified to the assembly the hostilities threatened on the part of Prussia, which, he said, the convention of Pilnitz, the reception which had been given to the rebels, the violence committed against French merchants, the dismissal of our minister, and the departure of the Prussian ambassador from Paris, had led him to expect ; and which expectations were confirmed by the march of fifty-two thousand men. "Every thing proves," added the message of the king, "that there is an alliance between Vienna and Berlin. (These words excited laughter.) According to the terms of the constitution, I therefore notify these events to the legislative body."—"Yes," replied many voices, "when the Prussians are at Coblenz."—The message was referred to the commission of twelve.

The assembly continued the discussion of those details which render the declaration of the danger of the country requisite. It was decreed that this declaration should be considered as no more than a simple declaration ; and, consequently, should not be subject to the royal sanction ; which, as it involved legislative measures, was certainly not a justifiable step. Thus, the law of public safety, though not yet promulgated, was nevertheless acted upon.

Political disputes became daily more and more embittered by party spirit ; the hope Vergniaud had expressed of reconciling those who were in Rome, as well as those on the Aventine Hill, were far from being realized ; and the terror which parties mutually inspired was soon converted into the most irreconcilable hatred.

There was in the assembly a deputy named Lamourette, constitutional bishop of Lyons, who had never considered the term liberty other than as applying to a renewal of primitive fraternity, and was as much afflicted as astonished at the divisions of his colleagues. Not believing they were actuated by feelings of hatred, but rather influenced by unjust suspicions and want of mutual confidence, he, on the 7th of July, addressed his colleagues in the most persuasive and dignified manner, pointed out to them that the most violent measures were daily proposed to meet the danger of the country, and that he, for his part, believed that gentler methods would be more efficacious. That the dismissal of the representatives, was the source from whence all the evils complained of flowed, and that it was to this disunion that a remedy should be applied. "He," exclaimed this worthy pastor, "who shall succeed in re-uniting you, will be the true conqueror of Austria and Coblenz ! I hear it daily affirmed that this is impossible, considering the length to which your differences have been carried. The thought of this makes me tremble ! But surely in this I do not do you justice : nothing is irreconcilable but virtue and vice. It is true, honest men may dispute with warmth, because their opinions are founded on sincere conviction ; but as to feelings of hatred, it is impossible that they should obtain admittance into their hearts ! Gentlemen, the public safety depends upon you, and yet you delay to secure it !

"How is it that the two parties of the assembly mutually reproach each other ? The one accuses the other of wishing to modify the constitution by the intervention of strangers, and the latter accuses the former of aiming at the overthrow of monarchy for the establishment of a republic. Let us put an end to these reproaches, gentlemen ; let us hurl the same anathema against a republic and the two chambers ; let us devote them both to common execration by a final and irrevocable oath ! Let us swear to be unanimous and accordant in our views and sentiments ; let us solemnly bind ourselves in the bonds of an eternal brotherhood ! Let the enemy know that we are only animated by one will, and the country is saved !"

when the whole assembly rose, and the hostile parties rushing into one another's arms, applauded his generous sentiments, and seemed completely to have forgotten their mutual animosities. The project of altering the constitution by two chambers or a republic, was renounced for ever, without a dissentient voice. Those who had accused, and those who had defended Lafayette, the veto, the civil list—the fictious, and the traitors, mutually embraced each other. All distinctions seemed to be confounded, and M. Pastoret and Condorcet, who had reciprocally abused one another in the public papers the evening before, were now folded in each other's arms. There was no longer a right or left side; all the deputies were promiscuously seated together: Dumas by the side of Basire, Jaucourt by the side of Merlin, and Ramond by Chabot.

It was immediately determined that the provinces, the army, and the king, should be informed of this happy event; and a deputation, headed by Lamourette, was sent to the palace. Lamourette quickly returned, and announced the arrival of the king, who instantly followed him into the chamber. He came, he said, as on the 4th of February, 1790, to testify his satisfaction to the assembly, and to express to them "how much he was grieved at having waited for a deputation, which had so far delayed his arrival as to prevent his hastening into the midst of them."

The enthusiasm of all was carried to its highest pitch by these words, and the unanimous cry of "The country is saved" echoed through the chamber. It has been said that this scene presented the spectacle of a king and eight hundred hypocritical deputies, forming, on the impulse of the moment, a plan of common dissimulation, and feigning forgetfulness of injuries, that they might, with the more certainty of success, accomplish their several objects. But this is impossible; no such design could ever enter suddenly into the heads of so many men, without some premeditation. The irksomeness of the passion of hatred, and the delight of shaking it off, even for a moment, may very well account for so strange a scene; besides, what party, on the prospect of the many portentous events with which the country was then threatened, and considering the uncertain issue of the contest about to be entered on, would not consent to give up their favourite projects, for the sake of preserving the acquisitions they had already obtained? The fact itself proves that distrust and fear alone produced animosity; that it disappeared altogether whenever confidence was restored; and that the party which was called republican only embraced republicanism in despair, and not from partiality to it as a system. Why did not the king, on his return to the palace, write immediately to Austria and Prussia, and why, to these secret measures did he not add others of a public and important nature! Why did he not identify himself with the nation by declaring, as his grandfather Louis XIV. had before done: "We will all of us go."

On the same evening, the result of the proceedings against Pétion and Manuel was brought to the assembly. This was the suspension of the two magistrates. By what has since been learnt from the mouth of Pétion himself, it is probable he could have prevented the insurrection of the 20th of June, as he afterwards prevented others. The presumption, therefore, is strongly in favour of his connivance with the insurgents, but the fact was never certainly established. Other infractions of the law were also laid to his charge, viz., having been very dilatory in his communications to the several authorities, and having suffered the council of the commune to enter into a resolution contrary to that of the department, by declaring that the petitioners should be received into the ranks of the national guard. The suspension, therefore, pronounced by the department, was legal and courageous, but impolitic. After the reconciliation of the morning, a greater imprudence could not have been committed than that of signifying, on the same evening, the suspension of two magistrates enjoying the greatest popularity. It is true, the king referred the decision to the assembly; but they did not conceal their discontent, and sent it back to him, that he might incur the odium of pronouncing it himself. The galleries recommenced their accustomed cries of disapprobation on this occasion; a crowd of petitions were presented, demanding Pétion or death; and the deputy, Grange-neuve, who had been personally insulted, required that the author of that outrage should be proceeded against. Thus the recent reconciliation was already forgotten. Brissot had before been on the point of speaking on the question of the public danger, but had deferred his intention for the purpose of modifying the expressions of his speech, on account of the reconciliation which had intervened; yet he could not help alluding to the many instances of delay and negligence the conduct of the court had displayed; and, in spite of the pretended reconciliation, finished by declaring that the question of the king's deposition should be seriously and solemnly considered; that the ministers should be impeached for having delayed so long to give information of the hostilities committed on the part of Prussia; that a secret commission, composed of seven members, should be created for the purpose of watching over the public safety; that the property of the emigrants should be confiscated; that the military preparations of the country should be accelerated; and, lastly, that without delay they should declare that the country was in danger.

The assembly were, at this time, informed of the conspiracy of Dussailant, a nobleman of ancient family, who, at the head of some insurgents, had taken possession of the fort of Bannes, in the department of the Ardèche, and from thence threatened all the adjacent country. The dispositions of foreign powers were also laid before the assembly by the ministry; the house of Austria having attached Prussia to its interests, had decided to march against France, although the disciples of Frederick murmured at this impolitic alliance. The Electorates were all our open or concealed enemies. Russia had formerly been the first to declare herself against the revolution: she had acceded to the treaty of Pinitz, flattered the projects of Gustavus, and seconded the emigrants; all for the purpose of deceiving Prussia and Austria, and inducing them to march against France, that she might avail herself of that opportunity of attacking Poland. At the present moment, she was treating with Messieurs de Nassau and D'Esterhazy, chiefs of the emigrants; nevertheless, in spite of her pompous promises, she had only supplied them with one frigate, and that for the sake of getting rid of them from Petersburg. Sweden, after the death of Gustavus, could not be stirred up, and allowed our vessels to enter her ports. Denmark promised a strict neutrality. The Court of Turin might be regarded as an enemy. The Pope was preparing his thunderbolts. Venice was neuter; but evinced an inclination to protect Trieste by her navy. Spain, without entering openly into the coalition, did not seem disposed to execute the *family compact, and afford France that aid which she had received from her. England promised to remain neuter, and gave new assurances of such being her disposition. The United States would have been happy to assist us by every possible means; but those means had no effect, by reason of their great distance, and want of population.

On the strength of this representation, the assembly wished immediately to declare the country in danger; nevertheless, the declaration was again referred to the decision of all the assembled committees; and their answer being given on the 11th July, the President, in the midst of the most profound silence, pronounced this solemn formula: CITIZENS, THE COUNTRY IS IN DANGER.

From this moment the assembly was declared permanent; and repeated discharges of cannon announced to the public this important and critical declaration; all the municipalities, all the councils of the districts and departments, held uninterrupted sittings; and all the national guards began to prepare for active service. Amphitheatres were raised in the middle of the public squares, where the municipal officers, seated at a table supported by drums, received and registered the names of all volunteers who enlisted themselves. The total number of these enrolments on one day amounted to fifteen thousand.

The reconciliation of the 7th July, and the oath which had succeeded it, had not, as we have just now observed, quieted the suspicions of the people; their principal object was still to guard against the projects of the palace; and the deposition or abdication of the king presented itself to every one's mind as the only remedy for the evils which menaced France. Vergniaud had only started this idea in the form of a supposition; others, and particularly the deputy Torné, wished it to be considered as a measure more positively contemplated; and a multitude of petitions from all parts of France, expressing the same sentiment, spurred on the patriot deputies to the execution of a desperate design they had secretly formed.

The city of Marseilles had already presented a menacing petition, which had been read to the assembly on the 19th of June. Many others arrived at the moment when the country was declared in danger. One of them proposed the impeachment of Lafayette, the suppression of the veto in certain cases, the reduction of the civil list, and the re-installation of Manuel and Pétion in their municipal capacities. Another demanded the total suppression of the veto, and the publicity of the king's councils. But the city of Marseilles, which had given the first example of these acts of boldness, carried them to the greatest excess. It sent an address to the assembly, praying for the abolition of royalty in the reigning family, and for the substitution of an elective royalty without the veto, that is to say, a mere executive magistracy, as in ancient republics. The silent astonishment which the reading of this produced was followed by the applauses of the galleries; and one member had boldness enough to request that it might be printed. It was, notwithstanding, sent to the commission of twelve, that it might incur the censure of the law, which declared every proposition to alter the constitution infamous.

The audacity of these petitions was little calculated to quiet the consternation of the court, and the consequent fears of the patriotic party. The king believed his life to be in danger, and imagined that, on the 20th of June, a design of assassinating him had been formed, but had failed. This idea was certainly unfounded, for nothing would have been easier than the perpetration of that crime, had it been contemplated. He suspected also that attempts would be made to poison him. To prevent which, both he and his family ate their meals with a lady in the confidence of the queen, and left untouched the dishes which were prepared in the kitchen of the palace*. As the day of federation was fast approaching, the queen also prepared for him a quilting, composed of many folds of stuff, calculated to resist the first plunge of a dagger. But, as time elapsed, and the public fury augmented, without any attempt at assassination, he began better to understand the nature of his danger. He foresaw that it was not an assassination, but a judicial condemnation, that he had to fear; and the fate of Charles I. continually haunted and tormented his imagination.

Although he had met with a rebuff from the court, Lafayette was not the less resolved in his intention of saving the king, and, therefore, proposed to him a plan, which was conceived with the greatest boldness. His first step had been to secure the co-operation of Luckner, from whom he obtained all he desired, even to the extent of consenting to march upon Paris, if it should be found necessary. Lafayette then suggested to the king the idea of commanding the attendance of himself and Luckner at Paris, under the pretext of assisting at the confederation. His object in this was to impose awe upon the people, and preserve the king from the menacing dangers of that day. The day after the ceremony, Lafayette proposed that Louis should publicly quit Paris, under the pretence of going to Compiègne, to prove his liberty in the eyes of all Europe. In case of resistance, he asked only for fifty dragoons devoted to the service of the king, to accomplish the escape of all the royal family from Paris. Being arrived at Compiègne, a relay of troops were to be stationed there, to conduct the king into the middle of the French armies, where Lafayette determined to leave him, trusting to his probity for the preservation of the new institutions of the kingdom. Finally, in case neither of these plans should succeed, the general was prepared to march upon Paris with his whole army†.

* A treaty known by this name, see Koch's Revolutions of Europe, p. 147.

* See note 41 in the Appendix.

Whether it was that this project required a boldness which the king was not capable of exerting, or that the queen's repugnance to Lafayette prevented him from accepting of his assistance, he a second time refused it, and returned him an answer which was an ill requital for the zeal which the general had shown in his service. "The best advice I can give to M. Lafayette," said this answer, "is to make himself feared by the factious by strictly fulfilling his duty as a general.*"

The day of the federation was now fast approaching. The people and the assembly were unanimous in wishing that Pétion should be present at that solemnity. It has already been seen that the king had desired to discharge himself by casting upon the assembly the burden of approving or disapproving the sentence against this magistrate, and that the assembly had forced him to take it on himself. He was now daily pressed to give his final decision, that the question might be terminated by the 14th of July. On the 12th, the king confirmed the suspension. The news of this augmented the discontent of all parties. The assembly lost no time in adopting its measures in its turn, and it is not difficult to divine what they were. On the following day, the 13th, it reinstated Pétion; but prudently adjourned its decision relative to Manuel, who had been seen walking in the midst of the riots of the 20th of June, dressed in a scarf, without exercising his authority to repress them.

Finally, the 14th of July, 1792, arrived; and what a contrast did it present to that of 1790! No magnificent altar, at which three hundred priests officiated; no spectacle of sixty thousand national guards, richly accoutred and regularly drawn up in regiments; no elevated tiers of benches crowded with people in the buoyant spirit of joy and hope; no balcony occupied by the ministers, the royal family, and the assembly, gave on this occasion an appearance of triumph and exultation to the scene! All was changed! The recent reconciliation had only embittered the hatred of both parties; and the very emblems of this solemnity announced the approach of a sanguinary contest. Eighty-three tents represented the eighty-three departments. At the side of each tent was a poplar tree, from the top of which streamed the tri-coloured flag. A large tent was reserved for the king and the assembly, and another for the administrative bodies of Paris. Thus all France appeared to be encamped in presence of the enemy. A broken column, raised on some steps which had remained since the first ceremony, served for the altar of the country. On one side was erected a monument in commemoration of those who had fallen, or might fall in the service of their country on the frontiers; on the other stood a tree, called the tree of feudalism. It arose from the midst of vast piles of wood, and on its branches were suspended crowns, blue ribbons, diadems, cardinals' hats, keys of St. Peter, cloaks of ermine, doctors' caps, lawyers' bags, titles of nobility, escutcheons, arms, and various other emblems of a degraded aristocracy, to all which the king was to be invited to set fire.

The oath of fidelity was to be administered at noon. The king awaited the national retinue at the military school, for it had not yet returned from the Bastille, whither it had proceeded to lay the first stone of a column to be erected on the former foundation of that prison. He was dignified and calm in his manner; but the queen vainly endeavoured to repress that emotion which was visible in her countenance. Before quitting her apartments, she had dropped some touching expressions, which drew tears from the eyes of more than one of her attendants. The national retinue finally arrived; until then the Champ de Mars had been nearly empty; but by the sudden irruption of the multitude it became overthronged in a moment. The king was stationed in a balcony which had been destined for his reception, and no sooner did he enter it than a crowd of degraded women and children and drunken men thronged under it, and rent the air with cries of Long live Pétion! Pétion or death! wearing on their hats the same words they banded from their mouths. Meanwhile the federalists walked about arm in arm, some carrying remnants of the Bastille, and a printing press, which was from time to time placed on the ground for the purpose of printing and distributing patriotic songs. The national guard and regiments of the line followed, preserving with difficulty, amid the press of the multitude, any regularity in their ranks; last came the public authorities and the assembly. The king then descended from the balcony, and advanced, in the midst of a square of troops, towards the altar of the country. His progress, amid the assembled concourse, was slow; after many efforts, however, on the part of the military, he reached the altar. During this anxious interval, the queen watched his motions through a glass. The confusion seemed to augment, and the king at one moment appeared to fall; at sight of this, the queen could no longer contain her emotion, but uttered a scream which spread terror around her: nevertheless, the ceremony terminated without any accident happening. The people then hurried to the tree of feudalism. They at first wished to bring the king along with them that he might set fire to it with his own hands; but he excused himself by a happy reply to their invitations, saying that feudalism no longer existed. He then returned to the military school, and the soldiers, delighted at having preserved him unhurt, shouted with reiterated acclamations, Vive le Roi! The people repeated the shout, and appeared as ready now to applaud as they had a moment before been to insult him. The unfortunate Louis seemed once more to possess the affections of his subjects, and they themselves were willing for an instant to admit so pleasing an illusion; but self-deception to either party was no longer possible. He returned to the palace satisfied that he had escaped dangers, which he believed to have been imminent, but still very much alarmed at those which threatened him for the future.

The news which daily arrived from the frontiers increased the terror and tumult which prevailed in the capital. The declaration of the danger of the country had put all France in motion, and hastened the departure of a crowd of the federalists for Paris. Only two thousand of this band were at Paris on the day of the federation; but they arrived daily, and their conduct justified all the hopes and fears that had been entertained from their presence in the metropolis. All of them, enrolled as volunteers, formed themselves into a club, and comprehended within themselves the extravagances of every club in France. The assembly allowed them individually thirty sous a day, and reserved for their use the galleries of the chamber, which gave them so uncontrolled an ascendancy over the deliberations of the deputies, that their hisses and applauses soon decided the event of every debate. Allied with the Jacobins, and associated in a club which surpassed all others in violence, they were ready for any enterprise which might be proposed to them, and declared this to the assembly in a formal address. They would not depart, they said, for the frontiers, till the enemies of the interior were overthrown; thus the scheme of assembling an insurrectional force at Paris was effected in spite of the opposition of the court.

To the resources which this federation furnished, the popular party added others. The veterans of the French guards had been distributed among the regiments of the line; the assembly ordered that they should now be formed into a corps of gendarmerie, as, having commenced the revolution, their patriotism, it was thought, might be relied upon. In vain was it objected that these soldiers, nearly all non-commissioned officers, composed the principal strength of the army. The assembly would listen to nothing which thwarted their plans; and, besides, feared their internal more than their external enemies. After having provided a military force for their own protection, it remained to dispossess the court of theirs. For this purpose the assembly ordered the departure of all regiments out of Paris. So far the constitution was not violated; but not content with this measure, they shortly after commanded those troops to march to the frontier, and in this they certainly usurped that disposal of the public force which was the prerogative of the king.

The grand object of this measure was to send away the Swiss guards, whose fidelity to the king was unquestionable; but to parry this blow, the ministry induced M. D'Affry, their commandant, to insist upon the terms of a stipulation which had been entered into with him, and which confined the quarters of the Swiss regiments to Paris. The assembly pretended to take this stipulation into their consideration, but, nevertheless, ordered the departure of two Swiss battalions.

The king, it is true, could oppose his veto to these measures, but he had lost all influence, and could no longer safely make use of his prerogative. The assembly itself could not always resist the motions made by some of its members, as they were supported by the applauses of the galleries, but never lost an opportunity of displaying its moderation when it was possible; at the same time that it passed the most insurrectional decrees, it approved and welcomed the most moderate petitions.

The measures lately taken, the petitions which daily arrived, and the ordinary language of conversation, portended an approaching revolution. The Girondists foresaw and desired it; but not perceiving distinctly the means by which it would be brought about, they feared its result. Those whose views were still more extravagant than theirs, complained of their inactivity, and accused them of timidity and incapacity. All the chiefs of the clubs and sections, fatigued by their ineffectual eloquence, loudly demanded active and unanimous leaders, that the energies of the people might not be exhausted in vain struggles. At the Jacobin club, an office of correspondence was established; the federalists also formed there a central committee, and that the resolutions of this committee might be as secret and energetic as possible, the number of its members was limited to five, and it was named by themselves, the insurrectional committee. These five members were Vangeois, Vicar-General; Debessé, de la Drôme; Guillaume, a professor of Caen; Simon, the editor of a journal at Strasbourg; Gallisot, of Langres; and shortly afterwards were added to these, Carra; Gorsas; Fournier, the American; Westerman; Kienlin of Strasbourg; Santerre; Alexander, commandant of the faubourg St. Marceau; a Pole named Lazouski, captain of engineers in the battalion of St. Marceau; Antoine of Metz, an ex-consul; Lagrevy and Garin, two electors; Manuel and Camille Desmoulins and Danton, joined them afterwards, and exercised there the greatest influence*. This committee carried on secret intercourse with Barbaroux, who assured them of the aid of his Marseillois, whose arrival at Paris was daily expected. They also held communications with the mayor Pétion, who promised not to impede the meditated insurrection, and was assured, in return, that a guard should be placed round his house to justify his inactivity, by an appearance of constraint, if the insurrection should fail. The project finally agreed upon was to invade the palace with an armed multitude, and depose the king. But how to rouse the people to such an enterprise was the question. Some extraordinary circumstance was necessary to effect this purpose; and, at the Jacobin club, several methods of producing some stirring event were proposed. The deputy Chabot harangued, with his usual turbulence, on the necessity of coming to some determinate resolution, and said that to settle such resolution, it were much to be wished that the court should attempt the life of a deputy. Grangeneuve, a deputy himself, listened attentively to his speech; this deputy was a man of weak intellects, but frantically devoted to any cause he happened to espouse. When Chabot, therefore, had finished his harangue, he took him apart. "You are right," said he to him, "a deputy must perish, but the court is too cunning to furnish us with the occasion we require. I will be the victim, and will kill myself in the environs of the palace, as soon as I can arrange my affairs. Keep my secret, and prepare for the event." Chabot, fired with enthusiasm, offered to join in his suicidal act; Grangeneuve accepted his offer, and they appointed the day, hour, and means for killing themselves, and, not to bungle the affair, to use their own expressions when they separated, resolved to sacrifice themselves to the common cause. Grangeneuve, determined to make good his promise, arranged his domestic affairs, and at half-past ten in the evening proceeded to the place of rendezvous. Chabot was not there. He waited; but no Chabot appearing, he imagined he had changed his mind. But comforted himself, that so far as he was concerned, the self-execution would have taken place. Still he paced to and fro, waiting to carry his purpose into effect; at last he was obliged to return home safe and sound, regretting that he could not commit a suicide to disseminate a calumny.

The committee impatiently waited for an opportunity to put their designs into execution, but none offered, and reciprocal reproaches of weakness, incapacity, and disunion took place. The Girondist deputies, Pétion, and all those who were conspicuously situated, were obliged to speak the language of the law, and discovered more and more a disposition to shrink from the consequences of the meditated conspiracy, and complained of the continual tumults of the people, which compromised them without leading to a decisive result. Those on the contrary who busied themselves privately in fomenting discontent, accused Pétion and the Girondists of the pusillanimity of their public speeches, which they represented as tending to repress the energies of the people. Both parties felt the want of some leader to direct their councils and invigorate their acts. But where was this leader to be found? Certainly not among the deputies. They were merely orators; besides, the elevation of their stations kept them widely apart from the multitude. Pétion by reason of his office could easily have held communications with the mob; but Pétion was cold, incapable of bearing with them, and more fit for a death-bed than for prompt action. Conceiving that the turbulence of the people was likely to become weakened by their daily excesses, his system was to repress petty disturbances the more effectually to promote a general insurrection; but by this he thwarted the movements of every day, and lost the favour of the rioters, so that without checking their designs, he aggravated their passions. All that was wanting was a leader, who not having ceased to be identified with the people, had preserved his influence over them, and who had received from nature the gift of persuasion.

The clubs, sections, and revolutionary journals presented a various assortment of such characters, but no one had as yet gained the pre-eminence by any marked superiority. Camille-Desmoulins, it is true, was distinguished for the vigour, cynicism, and intrepidity of his mind, and never lost an opportunity of attacking those who seemed to slacken in their revolutionary career. He was also familiar with the rabble, but possessed not the lungs of a popular orator, and, besides, wanted the activity and influence which are the essential qualities of a leader.

Another journalist had acquired a frightful celebrity: this was Marat, called the friend of the people, and who had become, from his frequent advocacy of murder, an object of marked abhorrence to all those who yet retained any feelings of humanity. A native of Neuchâtel, he had cultivated, in the former part of his life, the science of medicine, and had boldly attacked the best established systems, displaying thus early the convulsive disorganization and restless activity of his mind. He was veterinary-surgeon to the Count D'Artois at the commencement of the revolution. When that new scene of things opened, he involved himself immediately in its disorders, and soon became remarkable in his section. His person was extremely repulsive; he was a man of low stature, a large head, and expansive forehead, features strongly marked, his complexion livid, his eyes fiery, and his dress slovenly. His person would not have attracted attention but as a ridiculous or hideous object; but from this strange body there issued a medley of the most perverted and atrocious maxims, accented by a harsh voice, and proclaimed with the most insolent familiarity. Many thousand heads, he declared, must be brought low, and all the aristocrats, who stood in the way of liberty, must be got rid of. Horror and detestation formed a circle about him. Whenever he appeared he was hissed, insulted, and ridiculed for the deformity of his person; but being habituated to logical contests, and the most extraordinary propositions, he soon learnt to despise those who despised him, and asserted that they were incapable of understanding his opinions. He made his poisonous pages the medium of giving vent to the frightful doctrines with which he was imbued. The hermit-like life he had been accustomed to lead, in order to conceal himself from the detection of justice, had embittered his temper, and the detestation of the public still further enraged his savageness. Our polished manners he considered but as vices which were opposed to republican equality; and in his fervent hatred against all obstructions that stood in the way of his designs, he saw but one method of safety—extermination. His medical studies and experience of the physical structure of man had enabled him to witness the pain of others without emotion, and his fervid passions not being checked by any feelings of sensibility, were directed to their purpose through paths of blood. He had only one means of attaining his end, the destruction of his foes, and this he gradually formed into a system of action, for the purpose of putting which into execution, he desired the appointment of a dictator, not to confer on him the enjoyments of omnipotence, but to impose on him the terrible office of purging society. This dictator, to use his own expression, he would have tied by the leg, that he might be always in the hands of the people. He would have invested him with only one prerogative, that of designating his victims, and inflicting on them the single punishment of death. Marat took no cognizance of any other than this penalty, because it did not repress but absolutely removed the obstruction.

Observing on every side aristocrats conspiring against liberty, he diligently collected all those facts against them which seemed to fortify his system. He denounced with fury and with a carelessness which proceeded from the very fury of the man, all those who were pointed out to him, and frequently imaginary persons who had no existence. These denunciations were made without any feelings of personal animosity, he was fearless of consequences and without dread of vengeance, for he was considered as an outlaw of society, and no one regarded his ravings.

Having been made the object of an impeachment by the assembly, together with Royou, the editor of l'ami le Roi, he concealed himself in the house of an obscure and petty advocate, who gave him an asylum. Being in this difficulty, he applied to Barbaroux, who had formerly also cultivated the medical profession and had been acquainted with Marat. Thus summoned, Barbaroux could not refuse to call on him, but in listening to his conversation concluded him deranged. The French people, in the opinion of this strange being, were but niggardly revolutionists. "Give me," said he, "two hundred Neapolitans, armed with poniards, and carrying on the left arm a buckler, and with those I would overrun France, and complete the revolution." He wished that the assembly, to mark out the aristocrats, should order them to wear a white ribbon on their arms, and give free permission to any one to kill them when they were found three together. Under the name of aristocrats he comprehended the Royalists, Feuillans, and Girondists; and if the difficulty of distinguishing them was suggested, he declared that nothing was more easy, for that the patriots could not be deceived, if they fell upon all those who possessed carriages, who kept valets, wore silk, or who attended the theatres, they were certainly aristocrats.

Barbaroux left him horrified. Marat, engrossed by his atrocious system, thought little of the means of bringing about an insurrection, and, besides, was incapable of devising any. In his murderous reveries, he pleased himself with the idea of retiring to Marseilles; the republican enthusiasm of that city gave him hopes of a welcome reception there. There, therefore, he thought of taking refuge, and wished Barbaroux to give him a letter of recommendation to the inhabitants; but the latter would not consent to make so hateful a present to his native city, and quitted the insensate monster, whose apotheosis he did not imagine was so near at hand.

The systematic and atrocious Marat was not, at that time, the active leader who was necessary to unite the popular mass into one body, under one head. Robespierre would have been fitter for this task, creating, as he had done, for himself, at the Jacobins, a numerous auditory, who are usually more easily stirred up than the partisans of a journalist; yet he was destitute of some very requisite qualities. He had been formerly an advocate, of very moderate practice, at Arras, and was deputed by that city as its representative in the states-general. He there allied himself with Pétion and Buzot, and maintained with asperity those opinions which they defended with calm conviction. The slowness of his utterance, the want of animation in his manner, and the mediocrity of his eloquence, at first provoked ridicule; but his obstinacy soon attracted attention, particularly at the period of the Revision of the Declaration of Rights. After the scene of the Champ de Mars, also, when a report was spread that the subscribers of the petition of the Jacobins would be prosecuted, his terror and youth inspired Buzot and Roland with a lively interest in his favour. They offered him an asylum, and he soon resumed his courage. On the dissolution of the first assembly, he took refuge in the Jacobin club, and there, by his dogmatic and turgid harangues, quickly obtained the ascendancy. Being appointed public accuser, he refused to accept of this office, and aimed solely at gaining the reputation of an incorruptible patriot and eloquent orator.

His earliest friends, Pétion, Buzot, Brissot, and Roland, were now in the habit of receiving him at their houses, and observed with pain his assuming pride, which discovered itself in all his looks and gestures. Being, however, much interested in his favour, they merely regretted that, whilst his thoughts were directed so intensely to the public interests, they also appeared to be so greatly engrossed by himself. But he was of too little importance to provoke resentment, and the mediocrity of his talents and fervour of his zeal pleaded an excuse for his pride. He was also remarkable for his silence in society, giving rarely his opinion, but on the next day displaying the ideas he had treasured up the evening before in the tribune. This was mildly pointed out to him, but it stung him to the quick, and stirred up in him as much animosity against those superior characters, in whose company he dwindled to his natural dimensions, as he cherished against the constituents of the first assembly. He now confined himself altogether to the Jacobin club, where, as has been seen, he differed with Brissot and Louvet on the question of the war, and declared them, and perhaps believed them to be, bad citizens, because they disagreed with him, and maintained their opinion with eloquence. Was he sincere, then, in his suspicions against those who wounded his pride, or did he wilfully calumniate them? This is an intellectual mystery. But with a narrow and commonplace mind, and with a great susceptibility of temper, he was easily made angry, and with difficulty set right; it is possible, therefore, that that animosity which first originated in wounded pride, might have been confirmed into a principle by his bigoted politics, and that he really believed all those who had offended him were actuated by evil intentions.

Be this as it may, in the narrow circle in which he moved, he excited enthusiasm by his dogmatism and his reputation for incorruptibility. He founded his popularity on the blind passions and limited views of faction. Austerity and a chilling dogmatism are apt to captivate enthusiastic minds, and even often impose on persons of superior understanding; in point of fact, there were many men willing to consider Robespierre endowed with superior energy and loftier talent than themselves. Camille Desmoulins used to call him his Aristides, and even admitted him to be eloquent. Others considered him as without talents, but, silenced by his pedantry, used to declare over and over again, that the revolution could not go on unless he was placed at its head. He himself permitted his partisans to express these sentiments freely, yet never appeared in the meetings of the conspirators, and even complained that he was compromised by one of them, who inhabited the same house with himself, because that person had once assembled the insurrectional committee at that place. Thus he kept himself in the back-ground, and left the dangerous work of uniting the people to insurrection to Panis, Sergent, Osselin, and others, all members of the sections and municipal councils.

Marat, who looked for a dictatorship, was desirous of ascertaining whether Robespierre was a fit person to hold that office, and he called upon him for that purpose. The contrast between these two characters appeared striking in this interview.

He found the latter retired in an elegant cabinet, dressed with the most scrupulous care, and surrounded by engravings, paintings, and busts of his own person. Here he was accustomed to pursue the most unremitting studies, and to consult the works of Rousseau with great diligence, for the purpose of transplanting his arguments into his own performances. Marat conversed with him, and discovered in him nothing but petty animosities; no grand designs, none of that sanguinary audacity derived from his monstrous ideas, and no glimmering of genius. He took leave of this little man with the most perfect contempt, declared him incapable of saving the state, and became still more convinced that he alone possessed the secret of the grand social system.

The partisans of Robespierre gained over Barbaroux, and were anxious to introduce him to Robespierre, declaring that a man was what was wanting, and that none but Robespierre could play the man. This language displeased Barbaroux, whose pride repelled the idea of a dictatorship, and whose fervid imagination had already been seduced by the virtue of Roland and the talents of his friends. He nevertheless went to Robespierre. At this interview, the name of Pétion was mentioned; but Robespierre envying his popularity, he was declared incapable of assisting the revolution. Barbaroux replied, with some ill temper, to the reproaches which he cast upon Pétion, and defended with animation a character he admired. Robespierre spoke of the revolution, and repeated, as he usually did, that he had quickened its march: he concluded by saying, in the language of the day, We want a Man. Barbaroux replied, that he wanted neither dictator nor king. Fréron declared that Brissot aimed at this. This calumny was flung back, and a mutual misunderstanding ensued. On taking leave, Panis, wishing to destroy the bad effect of this conversation, told Barbaroux that he had mistaken the object which his party had in view; that it was only a temporary authority which they wished to establish, and that Robespierre appeared to be the fittest person on whom it could be conferred. It was these vague propositions, these petty rivalries, that induced the Girondists falsely to surmise that Robespierre desired to usurp supreme authority. They mistook envy for ambition. This was one of those errors which the confused sense of party feeling is constantly committing. Robespierre, capable at most of hating merit, had neither the force nor the genius of ambition; and his partisans conceived those pretensions which he had not dared to entertain for himself.

Danton was better qualified than any one else to become that leader to whom public attention pointed. He had made an effort at the bar, but had not succeeded. Poor, and a prey to his passions, he threw himself into political agitations with a fiery zeal, and probably not without some expectations. Although uneducated, his natural abilities were very great; and his athletic form, marked and somewhat creolian features, stentorian voice, and his extravagant though grand imagery, powerfully captivated his audience at the Cordeliers and sections. His countenance alternately expressed all the animal passions, as well as gaiety, and even benevolence. Danton neither hated or envied any one, but his audacity was extraordinary; and in certain moments of violent impulse, he was capable of executing all that the atrocious imagination of Marat could conceive.

A revolution whose effect, although unforeseen, was yet inevitable, and had made the lower rebel against the higher classes of society, necessarily awakened envy, generated new systems, and called brutal propensities into action. Robespierre personated the envious, Marat the systematically wicked man, and Danton was the passionate, violent, fluctuating, and alternately cruel or generous man, according to the freak of the moment. If the two former, the one engrossed by the most absorbing envy, and the other by the most sinister designs, were very little accessible to corruption; on the contrary, the latter, the slave of passion, and greedy of every species of self-indulgence, was in fact any thing but incorruptible. Under pretext of recompensing him for the loss of his former situation, that of advocate to the council, the court had bestowed on him considerable sums of money, but did not succeed in gaining him over to their party by this liberality. He did not the less continue to harangue the multitude in the popular clubs; and when reproached with not fulfilling the terms of his bargain, he replied, that to preserve the means of serving the court, it was necessary to take part apparently with the enemy.

Danton was certainly the most formidable of the popular orators; but, although bold and decisive in a particular emergency, he possessed not that assiduity, perseverance, and singleness of aim, which springs from views of ambition; and, although exercising great influence over the conspirators, he possessed no absolute ascendancy or control over their designs. The most he could do was to rally them in the moment of hesitation, and by an energetic impulse, give the final direction to their plans.

Many members of the insurrectional committee were not yet agreed in the objects they had in view. The court, informed even of their slightest acts, had taken measures for its protection in case of a sudden attack, and hoped to hold out till the arrival of the allied armies. A club, called the French club*, had been formed and established near the palace, it was composed of artisans and soldiers of the national guard. This club had all their arms concealed in the very place where they met; and, in case of necessity, were ready to afford prompt assistance to the royal family. This single association cost the civil list 10,000 francs daily. In addition to these partisans, a Marseillais, named Lieutaud, supported a band of royalists to attend the assembly, the clubs, the coffee-houses, and all the public places, there to advocate the royal cause, and repress the continual tumults raised by the patriots†; the most violent disputes indeed everywhere took place, which generally ended in riotous frays; but, in spite of all the efforts of the court, its partisans were few, and even the most devoted part of the national guard became perfectly discouraged.

* This can scarcely be termed a club, in the meaning in which this word has been used in the present work, and the acts of this club are evidently confined to a paid service. Transl.

† See Bertrand de Mollville, vols. viii. and ix.

A great number of faithful adherents of the king, who till now had kept at a distance from the throne, at this time returned to its defence. They frequently met in great numbers at the palace, and thus increased the distrust of the nation. Since the 2nd of February, 1791, these royalists had been called by the people chevaliers du poignard *. Orders had been given to secretly muster the national guard, who although disbanded, had yet received their pay. In the meantime, the king was beset by opposite counsels, which involved his weak and naturally wavering mind in sad perplexity. The most prudent friends, and among others, Malherbes †, advised him to abdicate; others, and the greater number, recommended him once more to attempt flight; but with regard to the means of escape, and the place of refuge, they were not agreed; neither were they determined upon what the result of the escape might be. To reconcile these different plans, the king desired Bertrand de Molleville to consult with Duport the constituent. The king placed great confidence in the latter, and was obliged to give a positive order to Bertrand before he would consent to an interview with him, as Bertrand affected that he would not communicate with such a constituent as Duport. In this committee were associated Lally-Tollendal, Clermont Tonnerre, Gouvernet, Duport, and others, all attached to Louis XVI. These were all devoted to the service of the king, but except in this particular, were very much divided in their opinions, as to how royalty was to be dealt with should she escape. However, the flight of the king to the castle of Gaillon in Normandy was resolved upon. The Duke de Liancourt, the friend of Louis XVI., who possessed his entire confidence, commanded that province. The duke declared that he could rely upon his troops and the loyalty of the inhabitants of Rouen, who had avowed themselves by an energetic address against the transactions of the 20th of June. He offered to receive the royal family in that city, and thence to conduct them to Gaillon, or, if they preferred it, to escort them to Lafayette, who was to leave them under the protection of his army. He offered, besides, to devote his whole fortune to the execution of this enterprise, reserving only an income of a hundred louis for his children. This project suited the views of the constitutionalists, because instead of placing the king in the hands of the emigrants, it left him under the protection of the Duke de Liancourt and Lafayette. For the same reason, it dispensed the court, and hazarded the displeasure of the king and queen. The castle of Gaillon possessed a great advantage in not being more than thirty-six leagues from the sea. The province of Normandy was favourably disposed towards the king; and a passage into England, should circumstances require it, would thence be of easy execution. It also possessed another advantage, it was not more than twenty leagues from Paris. The king, therefore, could retire there without violating the constitution, which, with him, was a weighty consideration.

Another plan of escape was devised by M. de Narbonne and Madame de Staël, the daughter of Necker. The emigration-party also proposed a plan of its own; this was to transport the king to Compiègne, and from thence to the banks of the Rhine through the forest of Ardennes. Every one is desirous of offering advice to a weak-minded king, because every one is ambitious of directing that volition which he is not able to exercise. So many contrary opinions increased the natural indecision of Louis XVI.; and this unhappy prince, beset with contradictory advice, struck with the reasonableness of some of his counsellors, carried away by the passions of others, distracted by anxiety for the fate of his family, and harassed by scruples of conscience, hesitated in the midst of a thousand projects, and saw the waves of insurrection advancing upon him, without daring either to brave or flee before them.

Meanwhile the Girondist deputies, who had so boldly discussed the question of the dethronement, though on the eve of an insurrection, remained still undecided in their views. Although the court was nearly reduced to impotency, and the people appeared all powerful, the approach of the Prussians—the fear which a long established authority, even when disarmed, always inspires, inclined them rather to come to some arrangement with the court than run the risk of a conflict. Even should this conflict end in a popular victory, they still apprehended that the arrival of foreign forces might render it unavailing, and that their momentary success against the palace, would be followed by a terrible retribution. Yet, notwithstanding these fears, they opened no negotiation with the court, but listened to some overtures from Bozé, the painter of the king, and the intimate friend of Thierry, the valet-de-chambre of Louis XVI. The painter Bozé, alarmed at the threatening appearance of things, persuaded them to address a letter to him, such as they might deem expedient, in the present extremity, to preserve monarchy and liberty. This letter was signed by Guadet, Gensonné, and Vergniaud; and commenced with these words:—"Sir, Since you ask our opinion of the present state of France." This beginning sufficiently proves that this negotiation was first opened by Bozé. The three deputies told him that it was no longer time for the king to dissemble; that he must be sadly deceived if he did not perceive that he alone was the cause of the general agitation that prevailed; that new protestations on his part would be useless and ridiculous; that decisive acts were requisite to give confidence to the people; that, for instance, every one was convinced that it was in the power of the king to send away the foreign armies; that he should, therefore, begin by making them evacuate the French territory; that he should then form a patriot ministry; discharge Lafayette, who, from the present state of things could no longer be of service; propose the passing of a law for the constitutional education of the young dauphin; submit the civil list to public scrutiny and accountability; and, finally, solemnly declare that he would accept of no augmentation of his power except with the free consent of the nation. By these means, added the Girondists, it is to be hoped that the irritation of the people may be pacified, and that in process of time and by persevering in this line of conduct, the king may regain that confidence which at the present time he has entirely lost.

Certainly the Girondists were now near the attaining their end, if, in point of fact, they had up to that moment, and long before, been conspiring to effect the establishment of a republic; and can it be supposed they would have stopped short all at once at the very point of its accomplishment, merely for the sake of giving the ministry to three of their friends? Certainly not. It is evident, therefore, that a republic only became desirable, as placed in juxtaposition with the inefficiency of the monarchy; that in fact it never had existence, and that even on the eve of obtaining a republic, those who are accused of so long conspiring to bring it about, did not wish to compromise the common weal by the success of this system of a republic, but rather consented to preserve a constitutional monarchy so long as it was confined within certain limits. The anxiety they manifested, that the allied armies should evacuate the French territory, sufficiently proves that the dangers to which they were exposed influenced their counsels, and gave them views they would not otherwise have entertained; their attention to the education of the dauphin also makes it clear that monarchy was by no means so insupportable a prospect to them as it has been represented.

It has been assumed that Brissot on his side had offered his services to the court, to prevent a dethronement, on condition of receiving a large sum of money; this allegation proceeds from Bertrand de Moleville, who has always misstated matters from two causes: sheer malice and a lying spirit. But he has produced no proof; and the known poverty and exalted character of the accused are sufficient to repel such calumnies. It is by no means impossible, indeed, that the court delivered money at Brissot's direction, but this does not prove that he either demanded or received it. The attempts made to corrupt Pétion, which we have noticed above, show the degree of credit accusations of this kind, which are so often and easily hazarded, deserve. But, even supposing that this could be true of Brissot, the three deputies, Gensonné, Guadet, and Vergniaud, have not ever been accused, and they were the only persons who signed the letter to Bozé.

The king, suffering under his accumulated sorrows, became daily more incapable of listening to salutary advice. He rejected the letter which Thierry presented him with harshness, and answered, as he usually did, that it was not him but the patriot ministry who had provoked a foreign invasion, and that so far as the constitution was in question, he conserved it, whilst others took every pains to destroy it*. This mode of reasoning was not strictly correct; for, even allowing that he had not provoked war, it was not the less his duty to maintain it vigorously; and as to his scrupulous adherence to the letter of the law, it amounted to no more than an observance of its text, if its spirit was compromised in calling in the aid of foreigners.

The unwillingness of the Girondists to enter seriously into the question of the dethronement, which formed the daily topic of all the clubs, undoubtedly arose from the hopes they entertained that their advice might still be listened to. But these hopes few participated. On every occasion, when in the name of the commission of twelve, the danger of the country and the means to meet it were alluded to, Trace it to its cause, exclaimed the most violent party; Trace it to its cause, repeated the galleries. Vergniaud, Brissot, and the Girondists, replied to these and similar expressions, that the commission of twelve did not overlook the cause, and that at the proper time they would explain it, but that at the present moment it would not be prudent to throw in more of the leaven of discord.

But it was settled that all these means and appliances should prove abortive; and the catastrophe, not unforeseen and so dreadful, soon arrived, as we shall hereafter see.

CHAPTER V.

ARRIVAL OF THE MARSEILLAIS AT PARIS; THE DINNER AND BANGUINARY SCENES AT THE CHAMPS-ÉLYSÉES—MANIFESTO OF THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK.—THE SECTIONS OF PARIS DEMAND THE DETHRONEMENT OF THE KING—THE KING REFUSES TO ESCAPE BY FLIGHT—THE ASSEMBLY REJECTS THE PROPOSITION TO IMPEACH LAFAYETTE—PREPARATIVES OF THE INSURRECTION; MEANS OF DEFENCE ADOPTED BY THE PALACE—INSURRECTION OF THE 10TH AUGUST, 1792; THE FAUBOURGS POSSESS THEMSELVES OF THE TUILERIES AFTER A BLOODY CONFLICT; THE KING SEEKS REFUGE WITH THE ASSEMBLY; SUSPENSION OF ROYAL AUTHORITY; CONVOCATION OF A NATIONAL CONVENTION.

At a fête given to the federalists it was settled by the insurrectional committee, that on the morning of the 26th of July they should advance upon the palace in three columns, displaying the red flag with this inscription: Whoever fires upon the columns of the people shall be instantly put to death. The object of this attack was to make the king prisoner, and confine him at Vincennes. The national guard of Versailles had been grained over to second this enterprise; but they were informed so late of the intentions of the conspirators, and so little mutual understanding existed between them, that they applied to the mayor of Paris on the morning of the 26th to know in what manner they were to act. The secret of this conspiracy was also so badly preserved, that the report of it had reached the court, the royal family were prepared, and the inmates of the palace on their guard Pétion, perceiving that the measures of the committee were badly devised, fearing treason, and considering that the Marseillais had not yet arrived, hastened to the suburb where the federalists were assembled, to check the intended insurrection, which, if unsuccessful, would prove the ruin of the popular party.

A frightful tumult reigned in the faubourgs; the clang of the tocsin had been heard during the whole night, and a report that a quantity of arms had been collected in the palace was diligently propagated in order to rouse the people. Pétion at last succeeded in restoring order; Champion de Cicé, who attended him, received several sabre wounds; but, finally, the people consented to retire, and the insurrection was adjourned.

Quarrels and frays, the ordinary preludes of an approaching explosion, continued unceasingly to disturb the metropolis. Since the 20th of June the gardens of the Tuileries had been kept shut by the order of the king. The terrace of the feuillans, which led to the assembly, remained alone open, and the sentries received orders to allow no one to pass. Desprémeuil being once seen there, in animated conversation with a deputy, was hooted, followed into the garden, and borne along to the Palais Royal, where he received several wounds. The orders which prohibited all entrance into the gardens being thus violated, it was proposed to supply their place by a decree. This however was not done; but a notice, expressed in these words, was written up over the gates: No thoroughfare, trespassers will be prosecuted. This was sufficient to prevent the trespassing on the royal premises, although the king shortly after withdrew his orders to the sentinels.

At last, on the 30th, the Marseillais arrived. They formed a band of about five hundred of the most turbulent citizens of Marseilles. Barbaroux met them at Charenton. On this occasion a new project was concerted with Santerre. Under pretext of meeting the Marseillais, it was proposed to assemble the faubourgs, to march them to the Place de Carrousel, and there quietly form a camp until the assembly should have suspended the king, or until he should have voluntarily abdicated. This suggestion pleased all those who were averse to the effusion of blood. But it failed, Santerre being unable to assemble the faubourgs, and only succeeding in collecting a very small number of citizens to meet the Marseillais. He then immediately invited the latter to an entertainment which was prepared in the Champs-Elysées. On the same day and same hour, another entertainment was spread for a part of the national guards, of the battalion of the Filles-Saint-Thomas, and many other individuals, civil and military, all devoted to the court, near the spot where the Marseillais were assembled. There was certainly no premeditated design in this unfortunate encounter on either side, for the invitation of Santerre must have been perfectly unforeseen; but it was impossible for adversaries so bitterly opposed, to remain long in each other's presence without coming to hostilities. The populace insulted the royalists; the latter showed a determination to defend themselves: the assistance of the patriots was then solicited by the people, and a combat immediately commenced between the two parties of revellers. The Marseillais, rushing upon their adversaries, soon put them to flight; one of the royalists was killed, and many wounded. In a moment the disorder became general throughout Paris. The federalists dispersed themselves through the streets, and plucked off the cockades of riband, upon the pretext that they should have been made of wool.

Some of the fugitives hastened, covered with blood, to the Tuileries, where they were received with kind and humane attention, for the court considered them as victims to their attachment. The national guards who were in the service of the palace reported this fact, and added that the ladies of the court wiped away the blood from their wounds with their handkerchiefs. These reports greatly aggravated the animosity of the people, and it was believed that the scene of the Champs-Elysées was the effect of a premeditated design; and this formed the basis of a new accusation against the Tuileries.

The national guard of Paris positioned the assembly to send the Marseillais immediately into the country, but their petition was hooted down by the galleries, and met with no attention from the assembly.

Whilst these events were taking place, there was published a manifesto, attributed to the Duke of Brunswick, and soon ascertained to be genuine. We have already spoken of the mission of Mallet-du-Pan. He had furnished, in the king's name, the idea and the draught of a manifesto; but this notion soon took quite another direction. Another manifesto, expressing the sentiments of the emigrants at Coblenz, and bearing the name of Brunswick, was published in front of the Prussian army. This document was expressed in the following terms:

"Their majesties the Emperor and the King of Prussia, having intrusted to me the command of their combined armies, which they have assembled on the frontiers of France, I feel it necessary to announce to the inhabitants of this kingdom the motives which have determined the measures of these two sovereigns, and the intentions which guide them.

"After having arbitrarily deprived the German princes in Alsace and Lorraine of their rights and possessions; after having disturbed the peace of the provinces, and destroyed all legitimate government; after having practised against the sacred person of the king and his august family the most heinous indignities and outrages, which are daily renewed, those who have usurped the reins of government have finally filled up the measure of their iniquities by declaring an unjust war against his majesty the Emperor, and attacking his provinces situated in the Low Countries; some of the possessions of the Germanic Empire are now subject to the same oppression, and many others have only escaped the like danger by yielding to the dominant party and its emissaries.

"His majesty the King of Prussia, allied to his imperial majesty by the bonds of a defensive alliance, and a member himself of the Germanic body, has conceived himself bound to march to the assistance of his ally and the German estates; and it is under this double obligation that he now takes part in the invasion of France.

"Besides these great interests, the sovereigns are equally sensible to another not less important: that of suppressing anarchy in the interior of France; of beating down the blows which are aimed at the throne and the altar; of re-establishing the power of the law; restoring to the king that security and liberty of which he is now deprived, and of reinstating him in the exercise of his legitimate authority.

"Convinced that the healthy portion of the French nation abhors the excesses of a tyrannising faction, and that the great majority of the inhabitants of France await with impatience the moment of succour to declare themselves openly against the hateful acts of their oppressors, their majesties the Emperor and King of Prussia solicit and invite them to return without delay to the path of duty, reason, order, and peace. It is with these views that I, the undersigned general, commander-in-chief of the two armies, declare :—

"I.—That, drawn into the present war by irresistible circumstances, the two allied courts propose no other object to themselves than the welfare of France; and that they have no design of enriching themselves by their conquests.

"II.—That they have no intention of interfering with the internal government of France, their single aim being to deliver the king, queen, and their family from captivity, and to place his most Christian majesty in such a state of security as will enable him, without risk or impediment, to call together such convocations of his subjects as he may judge fit to promote their welfare, in pursuance of his promises to that effect.

"III. That it is the object of the allied armies to protect all the cities, and villages, and persons, and properties of those who submit to the king, and concur in the instantaneous re-establishment of order throughout France.

"IV. That the national guards are hereby called upon to watch, provisionally, over the tranquillity of the cities and provinces of the kingdom of France, and the safety of the persons and property of its inhabitants, till the arrival of the troops of their imperial and royal majesties, or until they receive contrary orders, under the penalty of personal responsibility; and that, on the other hand, those national guards who may oppose the troops of the allied courts, or may be taken in an hostile attitude, with arms in their hands, shall be treated as enemies, and punished as rebels to their king, and disturbers of the public peace.

"V. That the generals, officers, under-officers, and soldiers of the French line, are called upon to return to their former allegiance, and submit immediately to the king, their legitimate sovereign.

"VI. That all the members of the departments, districts, and municipalities, are equally responsible, at the peril of forfeiting their lives and properties, for all misdemeanours, outrages, assassinations, and pillages, which they suffer to be committed, or do not unequivocally make every exertion to repress in their respective territories; and that they are bound provisionally to retain the exercise of their functions, until his most Christian majesty, being set at liberty, shall otherwise fill their situations, or that this be done in his name in the interval.

"VII. That the inhabitants of all cities, burghs, and villages, who shall dare to defend themselves against the troops of their imperial and royal majesties, or to fire on them, either in the open country, or through the windows and doors of their houses, shall be immediately subject to all the rigour of martial law, and their houses shall be burnt or otherwise destroyed; that, on the contrary, all the inhabitants of the said cities, burghs, and villages, who submit to their king, and open their gates to the troops of their majesties, shall be immediately placed under their protection; their persons and property shall be kept inviolate, and the personal safety of each and all of such inhabitants shall be provided for, in the general security of the nation.

"VIII. That the city of Paris, and all its inhabitants without distinction, are called upon to submit immediately and without delay to the king, to restore him to perfect liberty, and to invest him and all the royal persons with that inviolability, and pay them that respect, which, by the right of nature and nations, are due from subjects to their sovereign. Their imperial and royal majesties further declare, that all the members of the assembly, of the department, of the district, of the national guard of Paris, the justices of the peace, and all others exercising authority, are responsible for all events which may happen at Paris, so that their crimes will be punished by martial law, saving them no hope of pardon. Their majesties further declare, on their royal and imperial word, that if the palace of the Tuileries is assaulted, or menaced, or the least violence, or the smallest outrage offered to their majesties the king and queen, or to the royal family; and that if their safety, security, and liberty, is not immediately provided for, they will take an exemplary and ever-memorable vengeance on the city of Paris, by delivering it over to a military massacre and total subversion; and that the rebels shall meet that condign punishment their crimes have so well merited. Their imperial and royal majesties promise, on the contrary, to exert their influence with his most Christian majesty to obtain pardon for all their crimes and errors, and to take the most vigorous measures to protect their persons and possessions, on condition of their prompt and literal obedience to the above injunction.

"Finally, their majesties, acknowledging the validity of none of those laws which have not emanated from the king in the enjoyment of perfect liberty, protest against the authenticity of all those declarations which have been, or may hereafter be made in the name of his most Christian majesty, whilst his sacred person, that of the queen, and all the royal family, remain under constraint; to deliver him from which, their imperial and royal majesties solicit his most Christian majesty, to designate that city of his kingdom, in the neighbourhood of his frontiers, to which he may judge it most expedient to retire with the queen, and his family, under a safe escort, which shall be sent him for that purpose; that his most Christian majesty, being placed in perfect safety, may call into his councils such ministers as he may be pleased to point out, make such convocations of his subjects as may seem to him expedient, take measures for the re-establishment of good order, and regulate the administration of his kingdom.

"Finally, I myself declare, and engage in my capacity as commander-in-chief, to maintain perfect discipline among my troops, and to treat with gentleness and moderation all who may show themselves peaceably disposed and submissive, and to employ force only against those who resist and rebel.

"From the above reasons, I require and expect all the inhabitants of this kingdom not to oppose the march and operations of the troops under my command, but to grant them everywhere a free entrance into their cities, and to afford them such aid and assistance as circumstances may require.

"(Signed) CHARLES WILLIAM FERDINAND,
"Duke of Brunswick-Lunebourg."

That which appeared the most extraordinary circumstance in this declaration was, that being dated the 25th, at Coblenz, it arrived at Paris on the 28th, and was inserted in all the royalist journals. It produced a great impression, from the conflict of emotions it superinduced. It effectually roused the people to resist to the utmost an enemy, whose language was so haughty, and whose threats were so fierce. As things then were, it is not to be wondered at, that the court and the king were accused of this new crime. Louis XVI., therefore, hastened to disavow it by a message, and this he could undoubtedly do with perfect sincerity, for it was very different from the model which he had proposed; but this example should have shown him how much his views would be overdone by his own party, if they should conquer. Neither his disavowal, nor the expressions of fidelity to the constitution, and love to the nation, which accompanied it, produced any effect on the assembly. Speaking of his people, whose happiness, he said, had always been near his heart, he added: "How many sorrows would be obliterated by the slightest symptom of returning affection." These affecting expressions excited no longer that enthusiasm they were wont to call forth; nothing was seen in them but the language of deceit, and many deputies moved that the message of the king should be printed, in order, as they said, that the striking contrast between his words and actions might appear. From this moment, the public ferment unceasingly increased, and events began to wear a more threatening aspect than ever. By a decree of the department of the Bouches-du-Rhone, the taxes levied in that province were retained for the payment of the troops sent against the Savoyards, and the same decree made complaint against the insufficient measures of the assembly. This was the effect of an idea of Barbaroux. The decree was quashed by the assembly, although its execution could not be prevented. It was reported, at the same time, that the Sardinians were advancing, to the number of fifty thousand. This was contradicted by the minister for foreign affairs, who assured the assembly that, at most, their numbers did not amount to more than from eleven to twelve thousand. Another report succeeded to this. It was asserted that the federalists, who had actually proceeded to Soissons, had been poisoned by pieces of glass kneaded up with their bread. It was even said, that sixteen hundred were already dead, and eight hundred sick. Reference was afterwards made to the informants themselves, when it appeared, that the flour with which this bread was made, having been deposited in a church where some bottles had been broken, some pieces of glass had been discovered in the bread; however, none were either dead or even ill.

On the 20th of July, all the sections of Paris were rendered permanent by an act of the assembly. They had met together, and had commissioned Pétion to propose to the assembly, in their name, the dethronement of Louis XVI. The mayor of Paris, emboldened by this authority, presented himself on the morning of the 3rd of August before the assembly, and delivered the message of the forty-eight sections in the shape of a petition. He recapitulated the conduct of Louis XVI. since the commencement of the revolution; he enumerated the benefits the nation had conferred upon the king, and the return he had made; he depicted the dangers which threatened the country, the approach of foreign armies, the scanty means of defence that had been provided, the revolt of one of our generals against the assembly, the opposition of many directories, and the terrible threats and absurd acts which had been proclaimed in the name of the Duke of Brunswick; and finally, he concluded by proposing the dethronement of the king, and begged the assembly to take that important question into their immediate consideration.

This great question, which hitherto had only been earnestly discussed by the clubs, the federalists, and the communes, now acquired a new character, by being presented to the assembly in the name of Paris and its mayor. It was received, however, rather with astonishment than favour in the morning sitting; nevertheless its discussion commenced on the same evening, but was thence adjourned till Thursday the 5th of August. And the assembly was continually receiving and reading petitions expressing in even stronger language than that of the mayor, the same wish and the same sentiments.

The section of Mauconseil, going further than any of the others, did not confine themselves to demanding the dethronement, but on their own authority pronounced it. They declared that they could no longer acknowledge Louis XVI. as king of the French nation; that they were about to demand of the legislative body, whether they were thus willing to save France, nay more, that they invited every section of the empire (for they no longer called it the kingdom) to imitate their example.

The assembly, as has already appeared, did not catch the spirit of insurrection so soon as the inferior authorities, because being charged with the preservation of the laws they were rather bound to respect them. The assembly found itself frequently outstripped by the popular bodies, and perceived that their authority was sliding from them. The assembly therefore annulled the decree of the section of Mauconseil; Vergniaud and Cambon used the harshest expressions against this act, which they termed an usurpation of the sovereignty of the people. Nevertheless, it appeared that in this act, they did not so much condemn the violation of principles as the precipitancy of the petitioners, and above all the impropriety of their language with respect to the national assembly.

The term of all these incertitudes at last approached. On the same day, the insurrectional committee of the federalists and the friends of the king, who had provided for his flight, held their several meetings; the former adjourned the insurrection to the time when the dethronement question would be debated, that is to say, to the evening of the 9th of August. On their part, the friends of the king assembled in the garden of M. de Montmorin, and there concerted measures for his flight. The Duke de Liancourt and M. de Lafayette renewed their offers; every thing was prepared for the departure of the royal family, but money was wanting; Bertrand de Molleville had uselessly exhausted the civil list, by paying the royalist clubs, the speakers of the tribunals, and the mob orators, the pretended go-betweens, who gained over no one, and kept for their own use the funds of the court; this deficiency, however, was generously supplied by the friends of the king, who were eager to expend their private fortunes in his service. The offer of M. de Liancourt has been already related; he gave all the gold he could scrape together. Others also contributed all they could call their own. Some devoted friends made themselves ready to follow the carriage that was to bear the royal family, and if necessary, to perish in its defence. Every thing was now ready, and the friends of Louis, who met at the house of Montmorin, after a consultation which lasted the whole evening, were accordant in their opinions that it should be hurried on without delay. The king, who saw him immediately afterwards, gave his consent to this resolve, and gave orders that Messrs. de Montciel and de Sainte Croix should duly be acquainted. Whatever had been the opinion of those men who had met together on this affair, they experienced a momentary joy at the prospect of the monarch's speedy deliverance*.

But, on the next day, all was changed; the king declared that he would not go, as he should then have to reproach himself with commencing a civil war. His friends were struck with consternation, and they soon learnt that the motive he had given for his refusal to comply with their solicitations was not the real one; but that the supposed speedy approach of Brunswick, the adjournment of the insurrection, and especially the reluctance of the queen to trust herself with constitutionalists, had induced him to change his mind; she had most decidedly expressed her repugnance, saying, that it was better to perish at once, than trust themselves to the hands of persons who had done them so much mischief†.

Thus all the efforts of the constitutionalists, and the dangers to which they had exposed themselves for the king, were ineffectual. Lafayette was deeply compromised. He had agreed with Luckner that, in case of necessity, he should march on the capital to rescue the king. The latter, summoned before the assembly, disclosed this intention to the extraordinary commission of twelve: feeble and fluctuating, this old general was easily persuaded to pass from one party to another, and to communicate all he knew of those whom he deserted, to those by whom he was gained over. In his excuse, he pleaded his ignorance of the French language, wept, and complained that he was surrounded by factions. Guadet had the address to get from him all the design of Lafayette; and Bureau de Puzy being implicated as an accomplice with the general, was called to the bar of the chamber to explain his conduct. This man was one of the friends and officers of Lafayette. He denied all the charges which were brought against him with the greatest assurance, and with an air that induced the assembly to believe that he never had been cognizant of the negotiations of his general. The question of the impeachment of Lafayette was still adjourned.

The day fixed for the debate on the dethronement question was now near at hand. The insurrection which was then to take place was regularly planned and publicly known. The Marseillais, whose barracks were situated at one of the extremities of Paris, were removed to the section of the Cordeliers, near the club of that name. This was in the centre of Paris, and very near the intended scene of action. Cartridges were distributed among those troops by two municipal officers, and every thing was ready for the 10th of August.

On the 8th, it was debated what was to be done with Lafayette. He was excupated by a great majority. Some deputies, much enraged at this acquittal, demanded a new collection of votes, by calling individually over the names of all the members of the assembly. On this new trial, four hundred and forty-six had still courage to declare themselves in favour of Lafayette, against a minority of two hundred and twenty-four. The mob, who had bestirred themselves on this intelligence, collected in crowds round the door of the assembly, and insulted the deputies as they left the chamber, and in particular maltreated those who were recognized as belonging to the right side of the assembly, such as Vaublanc, Girardin, Dumas, &c. On all sides, the people were indignant with the national representation, and declared that the safety of the nation could not be looked for from those who had absolved the traitor Lafayette.

On the next day, the 9th, an extraordinary agitation prevailed amongst the deputies. Those who had been insulted the evening before complained, either personally or by letter, of the outrages they had sustained from the mob. Among other complaints, it was asserted that M. Benuearon had hardly escaped being hung from a lamp. This occasioned a burst of savage laughter from the galleries; and when M. de Girardin declared that he himself had been struck, he was asked, in an ironical manner, by those who knew more about it than he did, where and how had he been assaulted. "Cowards," replied he, "always strike behind!" At last, a member moved the order of the day; and, in the mean time, the assembly decided that Roderer, the procurator-syndic of the commune, should be summoned to the bar, and charged, on his personal responsibility, to preserve the safety and inviolability of all the members of the assembly. Some wished to interrogate the mayor of Paris, and oblige him to declare, yea or nay, whether he could answer for the public tranquillity. Guadet repelled this motion by another. He proposed that, at the same time, the king should also be interrogated, and obliged to declare, yea or nay, whether he was able to answer for the safety and inviolability of the French territory.

In the midst, however, of these contrary propositions, it was easy to perceive that the assembly dreaded the approaching moment of decision, and that the Girondists themselves would have preferred bringing about the dethronement by a decree, rather than by a dubious and murderous attack upon the palace. While things were in this state, Rœderer arrived, and announced the determination of one of the sections to ring the tocsin, and to march immediately upon the assembly and the Tuileries, if the dethronement of Louis XVI. was not instantly pronounced. Pétion then came forward; without avowing explicitly all that he knew, he acknowledged that dangerous designs were harboured by the people; he enumerated the precautions he had taken to prevent their taking effect, and promised to consult with the department, and adopt their measures, if they appeared more efficacious than those of the municipality.

Pétion, as well as his friends the Girondists, would have preferred that the dethronement of Louis XVI. should rather be the result of a decision of the assembly, than of a popular attack on the palace. A majority for the dethronement being almost a matter of certainty, he was more disposed to repress the intentions of the insurrectional committee. He then presented himself before the committee of surveillance of the Jacobins, and endeavoured to persuade Chabot to suspend the insurrection, assuring him that the Girondins had made up their minds for dethronement, and for the immediate convocation of a national convention; that they were sure of a majority; and that there was no necessity to expose themselves to an attack of which the result might be doubtful. Chabot replied, that no reliance could be placed on an assembly who had acquitted the wretch Lafayette; that he, Pétion, suffered himself to be deceived by his friends; that the people were determined to take their cause into their own hands; and that, on that very evening, the tocsin would resound through all the faubourgs. "You always will have such strange notions," replied Pétion; "woe be to us, if the people rise! I know the influence you possess, but I also possess influence, and I will employ it all against you." "You shall be arrested," replied Chabot, "and prevented from acting."

The public mind was too much excited to be able to comprehend the fears of Pétion, or to be diverted from its purpose by his exertions. A general ferment prevailed in Paris; the drums beat to arms in all its quarters; the battalions of the national guards took up their several posts with very different inclinations; the sections were filled, if not with the greatest number, at least with the most violent citizens. The insurrectional committee divided itself into three parts. Fournier and some others were posted at the faubourg Saint-Marceau; Santerre and Westermann occupied the faubourg Saint-Antoine; and Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and Barra, were at the club of the Cordeliers with the battalion of Marseilles. Barbaroux, having placed torch-bearers at the assembly and the palace, had got couriers in readiness to take the road to the south, and had provided himself with a dose of poison, so uncertain was he of success; and he awaited at the Cordeliers the event of the insurrection. As for Robespierre, nobody knew where he was. Marat was hidden in a cellar of the section by Danton, who then immediately hastened to occupy the tribune of the Cordeliers. Every one faltered, as upon the eve of a great event; but Danton, proportioning his audacity to the importance of the event about to transpire, thundered out against the unhappy Louis XVI.; he enumerated what he called the crimes of the court; he reminded his audience of the hatred they had ever displayed to the constitution; he dwelt upon the deceitful and hypocritical promises of the king, which had always been belied by his actions; and, finally, he pointed out his evident machinations to introduce foreign armies into the country. "The people," continued he, "can only now have recourse to themselves, for the constitution is not able to help them, and the assembly has acquitted Lafayette; it remains only, therefore, for you to save yourselves. Hasten, then, this very night to accomplish your deliverance, for the satellites of the palace will doubtless sally forth on the people, to butcher them, before their departure for Coblenz. Hasten, then! Save yourselves! save yourselves! To arms! to arms!"

At that moment a shot was fired in the Court of Commerce; the cry "Th' arms" became general, and the insurrection openly proclaimed. It was then half past eleven o'clock. The Marseillais formed themselves before the door of the Cordeliers, seized on several pieces of cannon, and were quickly augmented by an immense mob pursuing the same object. Camille Desmoulins, and others, hastened to ring the tocsin, but all the sections did not display the same excitement; their zeal, however, was soon stirred up; they quickly met, and named commissioners, who were to proceed to the Hotel de Ville, to displace the former municipality, and usurp all their powers. At last they repair to the clock-tower, take possession of it by main force, and then the tocsin begins ringing. The solemn clang resounds through the vast extent of the city. It is heard from street to street, and from house to house. It summons the deputies, the magistrates, the citizens, to their posts, and finally reaches the palace, as the harbinger of that fatal night that has at last arrived—a night of terror, destruction, and blood, warning the monarch that this is the last night he is to pass in the palace of his fathers.

The emissaries of the court now came to inform the king that he stood on the brink of some fatal catastrophe; they had, they said, overheard the speech of the president of the Cordeliers; that he told the people that they were not on this occasion to conduct themselves as on the 20th of June, as forming a simple civic procession; that is to say, that if the 20th of June had conveyed the threat, the 10th of August should strike the decisive blow; in fact, it was no longer a matter of doubt. The king, the queen, their two children, their sister, Madame Elizabeth, had not retired to rest, and after supper, had gone to the council-chamber, where all the ministers and a great number of officers of high rank were assembled. They there deliberated in the midst of this agitation upon the measures to be taken to save the royal personages. Their means of resistance were but few, indeed almost none, for the distrust of the assembly, and the imprudence of the court, had left them almost in a perfectly defenceless state.

had preferred continuing its pay, than forming it anew; this was a loss of eighteen hundred men to the palace. The regiments whose inclinations had appeared favourable to the king during the last federation, had been sent away from Paris, by the ordinary means of an act of the assembly. The Swiss could not have been sent away, thanks to the convention which allowed their service, but they had been deprived of their artillery; and the court, at the time the flight into Normandy was determined upon, had sent one of these faithful battalions into that province, under pretext of escorting a store of grain. This battalion had not yet been recalled. Some few Swiss only, barracked at Courbevoie, had been sent back by the order of Pétion, and these altogether consisted of no more than eight or nine hundred men. The gendarmes had just been recomposed of the old soldiers of the French guards, the originators of the disorders of the 14th of July. In fine, the national guard had neither the same commanders nor the same devotion to the king as they had manifested on the 6th of October, 1789. The staff, as we have already observed, had been recomposed. A host of citizens had quitted the service in disgust, and those who had not deserted their post, were intimidated by the fury of the populace. The national guard, therefore, was, as was every place in the kingdom, composed of a new revolutionary generation. They were divided, as France itself was divided, into constitutionalists and republicans. The whole battalion of the Filles-Saint-Thomas, and a part of that of the Petites Pères, it is true, were devoted to the king; all the other corps were either indifferent or enemies to the royalist party; above all, the cannoneers, who comprehended the principal strength, were decided republicans. The severe discipline of this part of the army had driven away the rich citizenry; locksmiths and blacksmiths were now masters of the cannon, and identified themselves with that people, of which they formed a portion. Thus were left to the king but eight or nine hundred Swiss, and a little more than one battalion of the national guard.

It will be recollected that since the retirement of Lafayette, the command of the national guard was alternately held by six captains. On that day, the command had fallen on the commandant Mandat, an old soldier, who although somewhat offensive to the court by his constitutional opinions, nevertheless inspired the king with the most perfect confidence in his firmness, intelligence, and inflexible adherence to his duty. Mandat, who was general-in-chief on that fatal night, had hastily made the best defences possible.

The floor of the great gallery leading from the Louvre to the Tuileries had already been broken in, to stop the passage of the assailants at that approach. Mandat, therefore, did not think it necessary to bring any additional defence to that quarter of the palace, but was solicitous chiefly to guard the avenues of the courts and the garden. Notwithstanding the urgent necessity of the moment, but few of the national guards had assembled. The battalions were not complete; the most zealous officers had hastened individually to the palace; Mandat ordered these latter to mingle with the ranks of the Swiss, and he then fixed them at their posts in the courts, the garden, and the apartments.

He placed one piece of cannon in the Swiss court, three in the middle court, and three in the court of the princes.

These pieces of artillery were unfortunately confided to the cannoneers of the national guard, that is, to the enemy. But the courageous and faithful Swiss eyed them with suspicion, and were ready, in a moment, to seize their guns, and thrust them out from among them.

Mandat had also placed some advanced posts of gendarmes at the colonnade of the Louvre, and at the Hotel de Ville; but this gendarmerie was, as we have said, composed of the old French guards.

To these defenders of the palace, we must add many old servants of the king, whose age or moderation prevented them from emigrating, and who came now generously to die by the side of their prince. They were armed with such weapons as they could find in their haste, or procure in the palace, with old swords or pistols tied round their waists with handkerchiefs. Some took the shovels and tongs from the fire-places, not laying aside, even in this awful moment, their absurd jokes, when, for once, the court might be expected to be serious. This concourse of useless persons, so far from being of service, only bewildered the national guard, and added to the confusion, which was already great.

All the members of the directory of the department betook themselves to the Tuileries; the virtuous Duke de La Rochefoucauld was there; Roederer, the procureur-syndic of the commune, had also arrived; Pétion, being summoned, at last appeared with two municipal officers. He was then required to sign the order to repel force by force, and that he might not appear an accomplice of the insurgents, he complied with this demand. The court were rejoiced at having him in their possession, and were resolved to retain an hostage so dear to the people. Being informed of this design, the assembly summoned him to appear before them. Some counselled the king not to let him go, but he rejected this advice, and the mayor left the Tuileries without meeting with any impediment.

The order for repelling force by force having been obtained, many opinions were offered as to the manner in which it should be used. In this difficult situation, various means were suggested. One of them, which was boldly conceived, might have succeeded: it was to disperse the insurgents by a sudden onset, who, with the Marseillais, did not altogether at that time amount to more than a few thousand men. The inhabitants of the faubourg Saint Marceau had not yet assembled. Santerro hesitated at the faubourg Saint Antoine; Danton alone, and the Marseillais, were drawn up in order at the Cordeliers, and impatiently awaited the arrival of the rest of the insurgents on the Pont St. Michael.

A sudden attack at this moment might certainly have dispersed the multitude, and put down the insurrection at a blow. But a more safe and legal plan was suggested by Mandat: this was to suffer the insurgents to collect their forces and march towards the palace, and then to attack them suddenly on two decisive points, first, while one body debouched upon the place of the Hotel de Ville, by the arcade of Saint Jean, they were to be suddenly charged, and that the same mode should be adopted at the Louvre, against those who should come by the Pont Neuf, along the quay of the Tuileries. Orders had been actually given to the gendarmerie who were stationed at the colonnade, to let the insurgents file off, and attack them in the rear, whilst the gendarmerie stationed at the Place de Carrousel were ordered to rush out upon them through the narrow gateways adjoining the Louvre, and attack them in front. The success of these measures was almost certain. Mandat had already given the necessary orders to the commanders of the different posts, and particularly to that at the Hotel de Ville.

We have already observed that a new municipality had been formed at the Hotel de Ville, Danton and Manuel were the only members of that body who were returned. The order of Mandat was shown to this insurgent municipality, who immediately summoned the commander to appear at the Hotel de Ville. This summons was communicated to the court, who were perfectly ignorant of any change having taken place in the municipal body. Mandat at first hesitated to obey, but finally yielded to the persuasions of every one present; even the members of the department, in ignorance of what had taken place, judged it unwise in him to violate the law by refusing to make his appearance before a legally-constituted authority. Having decided to obey the summons, he delivered over the order for repelling force by force to his son, and left the palace for the municipality. It was now about four o'clock. He was surprised on his arrival to find that a change had taken place in the magistracy. He was immediately brought before them and interrogated upon the order he had given; he was immediately remanded to his post, and in remanding him, the president accompanied his order with a significant gesture, which served as an order to put the commandant to death. In point of fact, the unfortunate commandant had scarcely quitted the threshold of the Hotel de Ville, when he was seized and pistoled. His clothes were stripped off, in the hopes of finding the warrant which he had given up to his son before he quitted the palace, the rabble threw his corpse into the river, which shortly afterwards became the receptacle of so many others.

This act of barbarity paralysed the measures that had been provided for the defence of the palace, it destroyed all unity, and obstructed the execution of the plan of defence. However, all was not yet lost; the insurrection was not yet consummated. The Marseillais, after having waited with the utmost impatience for the faubourg Saint Antoine, which had not come up, at the moment despaired of success, but Westermann putting his sword to Santerre's breast had compelled him to march. The faubourgs then arrived in due succession, some by the Rue St. Honoré, and others by the Pont Neuf, the Pont Royal, and the small wickets of the Louvre. The Marseillais and the federalists marched in front of the columns, with the federalists of Bretagne, and pointed their pieces against the palace. The force of the insurgents gradually increasing, presented an appearance more formidable than they really were, owing to the crowds which flocked about them from curiosity. Whilst they were advancing upon the Tuileries, Santerre hastened to the Hotel de Ville, to endeavour to get himself nominated commander-in-chief of the national guard; Westermann remained on the field of battle to direct the assailants. However, every thing there indicated the greatest confusion; so much so, that the body of insurgents which had been destined to guard Pétion's house, in order that his acquiescence in the insurrection might appear a matter of necessity, were not despatched to perform that duty. Pétion sent a message to the Hotel de Ville to repair this omission ere it was too late, and shortly after a band of some hundred men arrived and surrounded his house, in order that he might appear to be under compulsion.

The palace was at this time beset on all sides. As the morning dawned, and they could see beyond the old gates of the court-yard, they perceived loop holes which discovered their artillery pointing upon the palace, and heard their savage yells, and menacing songs. It was intended to make the preconcerted attack, but when intelligence had arrived of Mandat's death, the ministers and the departments thought it best to allow the insurgents to be the first aggressors, that the court might retain that advantage which the observance of the law gave them.

Roderer had now inspected the ranks of the garrison, and made in the presence of the Swiss and the national guards the legal proclamation which forbade them to act on the offensive; but enjoined them to repel force by force. The king was also prevailed upon to review in person the servants who were making ready to defend him. This unfortunate prince had passed all the night in listening to the various opinions of his counselors. The few moments he was left to himself he spent in prayer to the Almighty on behalf of his royal consort, his children, and his sister, the objects which entirely engrossed his thoughts. "Sire," said the queen, "now is the time to summon up all your energies;" and it is positively asserted, that, snatching a pistol from the elder D'Affry's side, she with animated gestures presented it to him. The eyes of the princess were streaming with tears, but her head seemed elevated with pride, and her nostrils inflated with anger and pride. The king himself manifested perfect self-possession, and betrayed no symptom of fear in this extraordinary danger; but his alarm on account of his family was extreme, and so overwhelmed was he with grief at the dangers to which they were exposed, that it was strongly visible in every feature. He, nevertheless, made his appearance with great firmness. He wore on this occasion a violet coloured dress, and carried a sword, but his wig not dressed since the preceding evening was half tumbled. On presenting himself at the balcony, he perceived a formidable array of artillery pointed against the palace, but beheld it without exhibiting any symptom of alarm. His presence among the troops called forth expressions of enthusiasm. The grenadiers hoisted their caps on the tops of their sabres and bayonets, and the old cry of "Long live the king," echoed for the last time under the arches of the palace of his ancestors. The last remains of courage re-animated them, hearts that were dispirited recovered again, and a gleam of confidence and hope exhibited itself.

At this moment there arrived some new battalions of the national guard, which had formed not quite so quickly as the others, and who came pursuant to the order previously given by Mandat. They entered before the shouts of "Long live the king" had ceased. Some immediately joined those who were thus cheering the monarch; whilst others, who were infected with the popular opinions, recollecting all the fables that had been circulated concerning the Knights of the Poignard, (Chevaliers de Poignard;) imagined they were about to be delivered up to their vengeance, and crying out that they were betrayed by that wretch Mandat, excited a kind of tumult. The cannoneers following their example, turned their guns against the front of the palace. This occasioned a fray between them and those regiments that remained faithful, which terminated in the former being disarmed and given in charge of a detachment. The men newly arrived were posted in the garden.

The king, after having shown himself at the balcony, descended the staircase, in order to review the troops stationed in the courts. His arrival being announced, all fell into their ranks. He maintained, during the review, an unruffled composure of countenance; and as he regarded his few and faithful adherents with an affectionate and melancholy sedateness of aspect, their hearts seemed to be deeply penetrated with determined devotion. He addressed them in the most cordial tone of confidence, and expressed his heartfelt gratitude for the many instances of attachment they had shown him; assured them that it was his determination to fight by their sides, and said that, in defending him, they were defending their wives and children. He then left them to cross into the garden; but at that very instant, the cry of "Down with the veto," that was uttered by the battalion that had just entered, reached his ears. Two of the officers that attended his person advised him not to make the review in the garden; others exhorted him to visit the post at Pont Tournant, and he boldly determined on doing the latter. To reach this post, he had to pass along the terrace of the feuillans, which was thronged with the mob. While he was passing along, he was only separated from the maddened crowd by a tri-coloured ribbon; he nevertheless proceeded, and experienced the insults of the rabble at every step. He observed at this moment the battalions stationed in the gardens join the people on the Place de Carrousel.

This desertion, coupled with that of the engineers, and the cries of "Down with the veto," which was vociferated on all sides by the populace, had driven the king to a state of despair. The grenadiers also, stationed at the colonnade of the Louvre, now abandoned their post, and mingled with the insurgents. On their part, the national guard in the apartments expressed too much aversion to their companions the gentlemen of the court, who were to them objects of suspicion. The queen endeavoured to allay their distrust. "Grenadiers," said she, "these are your comrades; they will die by your sides." Yet, in spite of this apparent courage, despair was in her heart. After the review, she lost all hope, and complained that the king had not shown sufficient energy. I must again repeat, that this unfortunate prince feared nothing on his own account. He again refused, as on the 14th of July, to wear a leather quilling in his bosom, saying, that in battle he would remain as unprotected as the lowest of his subjects. Far from being deficient in courage, he frequently displayed the most sublime and noble traits of it, but he wanted boldness to act on the offensive; he wanted self-confidence; and, after having invited foreign foes into his country, a reluctance to shed blood in his own defence was the extreme of inconsistent weakness. It is certain that, had he headed his few and faithful adherents on horseback, the insurrection would have been dispersed.

At this juncture, the members of the department, perceiving the general disorder which pervaded the palace, and giving up all hopes of a successful resistance, advised the king to retire to the assembly. This advice, so often condemned, as indeed are all unsuccessful counsels given to kings, was the only beneficial advice to follow at the moment. By this retreat all effusion of blood was prevented, and the royal family were saved, for it is certain that, had the Tuilleries been taken by assault, they would have been put to death. Nor could any doubts be entertained respecting the success of the assailants; but even had any existed, there were sufficient reasons for removing the royal family from so dangerous a situation.

The queen strongly opposed this step. "Madam," said Rosdeler, "you are exposing the life of your husband, as well as that of your children; reflect upon the responsibility you are taking on yourself." A lively altercation ensued; at last the king decided on retiring to the assembly, and said, with a resigned air, "We must quit the palace." The queen then turning to Rosdeler, addressed him in these words, "Sir, you are responsible for the life of the king and that of my children." "Madam," replied the procurator-syndic, "I undertake to die by their side, but I cannot promise more than that."

The royal family then immediately proceeded through the gardens of the Tuilleries, and along the terrace of the feuillans, to the assembly. All the gentlemen of the court and the household of the palace eagerly pressed forward to follow them; but as such a concourse might have endangered their safety, and displeased the assembly, Rosdeler, after many vain efforts, at length succeeded in dispersing the greater number of this train, and then proceeded with the remainder to the assembly. A detachment of the Swiss and national guard attended the royal family, and a deputation was also sent by the assembly to conduct them into their presence. At this time the crowd was so great, that it was almost impossible to force a passage through them. A grenadier of tall stature, taking the young Dauphin in his arms, and holding him over his head, in this manner pressed through the throng. At sight of this, the queen, thinking her son was about to be carried off, uttered a shriek, but she was soon quit of her fears; the grenadier entered the assembly, and placed the young Dauphin on the table.

The king and his family, followed by two ministers, then entered the chamber. "I am come among you," said Louis XVI., "to prevent the perpetration of a great crime; and I think, gentlemen, that I shall not be in greater security than in the midst of you."

Vergniaud, the president, assured the king, that he might confidently put himself under the protection of the members of the national assembly, who had sworn to sacrifice their lives in defence of the constituted authorities.

The king then seated himself by the side of the president, but it being observed by Chabot that his presence might be a restraint upon the freedom of the assembly's deliberations, he was removed to the office of the clerk of the journals, and the iron railing which separated it from the chamber was broken down, that, in case the chamber should be attacked by the multitude, he could, with his family, take immediate refuge among the deputies.

Rœderer then related to the assembly the occurrences that had taken place at the palace; he depicted the fury of the multitude, and the danger to which the palace was exposed, the courts of which were already invaded. The assembly, in consequence of this representation, sent twenty of its members to harangue the mob, and endeavour to allay their fury. These members had hardly quitted the chamber, when reiterated discharges of artillery were heard. A general consternation prevailed in the assembly. The king informed the deputies that he had forbidden the Swiss to fire. But at that very instant a fresh discharge of artillery and musketry was heard. The agitation of the assembly increased every moment. Soon after a messenger brought intelligence that their deputation had been dispersed. At the same instant the door of the hall of the assembly was attacked, and awfully resounded from the blows with which it was struck; armed citizens having broken in at one of the entrances, "The chamber is invaded," exclaimed a municipal officer; the president put on his hat; many deputies rushed from their seats, to expel the assailants: finally, the tumult was appeased. And to the uninterrupted roar of cannon and musketry, the deputies join in the cry of "The nation, liberty, and equality for ever."

Meantime a murderous contest had commenced at the Tuilleries. The king having abandoned it, it was thought that the people would feel no exasperation against his deserted dwelling; besides, the disorder in which it was, would have prevented their occupying it, and consequently no order had been given that it should be evacuated. The troops stationed in the courts had been ordered to enter the apartments, where they remained in a state of perfect disorder with the servants, gentlemen, and officers of the household. This concourse was so great, that in spite of the spaciousness of the apartments, all communication from one to another was almost blocked up.

The people, perhaps ignorant of the king's departure, after waiting for a considerable time at the principal wicket, at last attacked the gate, broke it to pieces with hatchets, and pressed into the court royal. They next formed in columns, and, taking possession of the cannon which had been imprudently left there after the retreat of the troops, turned it against the palace: nevertheless, the attack did not commence instantly. The people made signs to those within, intimating that their intentions were pacific, and requiring an unresisting surrender of the edifice. The Swiss, manifesting an equally amicable disposition, threw their cartridges out of the windows. Some, however, of the assailants, more bold than the rest, advanced to the vestibule of the palace. At the foot of the great staircase, a barrier of wood had been constructed, behind which were entrenched, and huddled together, the Swiss guards and the national guards. Those who from without had got so far, wished to enter the palace, and remove the barrier. After a pretty long struggle, but which did not induce an actual battle, the barrier was removed. Then it was that the assailants rushed up the stairs, and demanded over and over again the surrender of the palace. It is positively asserted that some pikemen who remained outside caught hold of some of the Swiss sentries who were outside with hooks, and coolly put them to death; it was also affirmed that some shots were fired in at the windows, and that the Swiss, thus exasperated, immediately answered it with a fire of musketry. In point of fact, a terrible discharge of fire arms resounded through the palace, and those who had got inside fled, crying out that they were betrayed. It is difficult to decide from which side the first shots proceeded. The assailants declared that their intentions were amicable, but that they were suddenly attacked when they had advanced too far to extricate themselves, and in that situation slaughtered by the Swiss. This account is improbable; first, because the Swiss had no reason to feel a desire of revenge against the insurgents; and secondly, because, the king's life being saved, it was natural that they should rather endeavour to protect than hazard their own, and treason was not the way in which this was to be effected. But even allowing that upon the act of aggression the guilt of all that ensued rests, it must be admitted that the insurgent party were from the commencement the aggressors. All that followed, after the palace was once attacked, was inevitable, and the effect of accident. But be that as it may, those of the mob who first ventured over the threshold and ascended the great staircase, being terrified at the report of the fire of the assailants without, and the volley it provoked from the Swiss within, betook themselves to flight, and in their retreat received a shower of shot upon the staircase itself. The Swiss then descended in good order, and when at the bottom of the steps, debouched by the vestibule into the court. They then seized upon the piece of cannon that was lying there, and, although under a heavy fire, pointed it against the Marseillais, who immediately fell in great numbers. The Marseillais rallied, and, the fire continuing, they evacuated the court. A feeling of alarm got ground amongst the people, who fled on all sides, and got back again to the faubourgs. Had the Swiss followed up their advantages, and the gendarmes not deserted their post at the Louvre, a charge upon the repelled besiegers would have decided the contest in favour of the palace.

But at this moment, M. de Hervilly produced an order from the king forbidding the troops on any account to fire. M. de Hervilly arrived at the vestibule at the time when the Swiss had been first repelling the besiegers. He stopped their fire, and commanded them in the name of the king to follow him to the assembly. The Swiss accordingly followed M. de Hervilly to the feuillans in the midst of a murderous fire. Thus it was that the palace was deprived of the greatest part of its defenders. Those still, however, remained on the staircase and in the apartments a considerable number of unfortunate Swiss whom the king's order had not reached, and who were shortly exposed, without any means of resistance, to the most appalling danger.

During this interval the besiegers had time to rally. The Marseillais united with the Bretons, ashamed of having given way, resumed their courage, and returned to the charge with redoubled fury. Westermann, who afterwards discovered great talents, commanded them. They rushed forward and fell in great numbers before reaching the door of the palace, but having finally reached the vestibule they got possession of the staircase, and became undisputed masters of the palace, and a merciless massacre commenced. The pike-bearing mob rushed in after them, and what followed was immediately a scene of massacre. The unfortunate Swiss in throwing down their arms, vainly implored for quarter, they were mercilessly butchered. The palace was immediately set on fire; and the gentlemen who remained in it were hunted from their places of concealment; some fled and some were slaughtered. Amongst the people there were a few humane conquerors. "Spare the women—do not dishonour the nation!" cried one of these; and some ladies of the queen, begging for mercy on their knees, with drawn swords held over their heads, were saved. There were many victims who met their fate with courage; many, also, whose courage failing them displayed a ready ingenuity in saving themselves. There were also amongst these furious besiegers instances of honesty, and the gold found at the palace, whether it were from popular vanity, or that disinterestedness which springs from enthusiasm, was delivered up to the assembly.

Meantime the assembly awaited the issue of the combat with the most painful anxiety. At about eleven o'clock they were relieved from all suspense. Shouts of victory rent the air; the doors of the assembly were burst open, and a multitude, drunk with triumph and fury, rushed in and filled the chamber. The Swiss whose lives had been spared, were brought prisoners to the assembly as monuments of popular clemency. Meanwhile, the king and the royal family, remaining in the narrow room of the secretary's office, were obliged passively to take part in the downfall of the throne, and to witness the exultation of their conquerors. Vergniaud, the president, quits for a moment his seat to draw up the decree of the dethronement, he re-enters, and the assembly pass this celebrated act, in pursuance whereof,

Louis XVI. is provisionally suspended from the exercise of the royal authority; and,

A plan of education for the prince royal is ordered to be drawn up.

A national convention is convoked.

Could it then have been a long settled plan this, to abolish monarchy, since the legislative assembly after all did no more than suspend the functions of the king, and, at the same time, prepared for the education of the dauphin? What timidity characterized their decisions against this ancient constituted authority! What internal conflicts are manifest in the debates! What irresolution was produced by the recollections of the antiquity of the French monarchy and its royal family! What hesitation was created by their reflections on the blended glories and sufferings of the nation under the dynasty they were about to destroy! But a self-ruling public is always prompt to act; the few vestiges of royal honour which remained, and which recalled to their minds the memory of past times, did not long survive; the suspension of the royal authority only preceded its dissolution; and it was exterminated, not by the downfall of a Louis XI., or a Charles IX., or a Louis XIV., but by the death of a king of the purest and most amiable character that had ever sat upon the throne of France.

CHAPTER VI.

THE CONSEQUENCES AND TERMINATION OF THE EVENTS OF THE TENTH OF AUGUST—RECALL OF THE GIRONDIST MINISTRY; DANTON APPOINTED MINISTER OF JUSTICE—STATE OF THE ROYAL FAMILY—CIRCUMSTANCES OF PARTIES IN THE ASSEMBLY AND WITHOUT AFTER THE TENTH OF AUGUST—ORGANIZATION AND INFLUENCE OF THE COMMUNE; THE NUMERLESS POWERS IT ARROGATED; ACTS IN OPPOSITION TO THE ASSEMBLY—ELECTION OF AN EXTRAORDINARY CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL—STATE OF THE ARMIES AFTER THE TENTH OF AUGUST—LAFAYETTE ACTS IN OPPOSITION TO THE NEW GOVERNMENT—LAFAYETTE IMPEACHED, QUITS THE ARMY AND FRANCE; IS IMPRISONED BY THE AUSTRIANS—POSITION IN WHICH DUMOURIEZ IS PLACED—INCLINATIONS OF FOREIGN POWERS, AND RECIPROCAL SITUATION OF THE ALLIED ARMIES AND THE FRENCH ARMIES—LONGUY TAKEN BY THE PRUSSAINS; FERMENT IN PARIS AT THIS INTELLIGENCE—REVOLUTIONARY MEASURES TAKEN BY THE COMMUNE; ARREST OF SUSPECTED PERSONS—MASSACRES IN THE PRISONS ON THE SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH, FIFTH, AND SIXTH OF SEPTEMBER—PRINCIPAL INCIDENTS AND CIRCUMSTANCES OF THESE MURDEROUS DAYS.

The courage displayed by the Swiss in defence of the Tuileries proved ineffectual. The grand staircase was soon forced, and the palace invaded. The victorious mob immediately penetrated into every part of the royal residence; and this supposed abode of extraordinary wealth, illimitable pleasure, formidable power, and mischievous intrigue, was quickly ransacked by plebeian hands. Such was the vengeance wreaked upon riches, grandeur, and power, all at one swoop.

In this conflict eighty Swiss grenadiers were slaughtered in a most pitiless manner, not having been able to effect their retreat. The multitude then rushed confusedly into the apartments, and wreaked their vengeance upon those useless friends of the king who had collected together in the palace, for the purpose of affording him all the protection in their power, and who were known by the people under the name of the Knights of the Poignard. Their arms, unable to resist the fury of the conquerors, irritated them the more, and gave an appearance of truth to the reported designs of the court. Every closed door was broken open without a moment's delay. Two doorkeepers, who defended the entrance of the grand council-chamber, and thus sacrificed themselves to a vain ceremonial, were instantly massacred. The numerous household of the court were now seen hurrying tumultuously through the long galleries; throwing themselves out of the windows; or seeking, in the immensity of the palace, some obscure hiding-place, where they might remain unobserved. The ladies of the queen took shelter in one of her apartments, and expected every moment to be attacked in their place of refuge. The Princess of Tarento had all the doors thrown open, that the irritation of the mob might not be increased by resistance. The assailants then rushed on without further impediment, and had already seized on one of the female attendants of the queen, who was on the point of being murdered, when a voice exclaimed, "Spare the women; do not dishonour the nation!" This expression had an electric effect. The ladies of the queen were not only spared, but escorted from the palace under the care of those who, a moment before, were thirsting for their blood, but who now made every exertion to save them. After the massacre of all who fell into the hands of the populace was accomplished, the work of devastation began. All the magnificent furniture of the palace was destroyed with a Gothic frenzy, and the wrecks of its former splendour scattered far and near. The private apartments of the queen were burst open, and profaned by indecent ribaldry. The most secret corners were ransacked; every closet broken open; and all the papers which could be found were read with eager curiosity. But to the horrors of massacre and devastation, those of fire were now added. The exterior courts of the palace had caught fire, and the flame seemed spreading rapidly towards the grand edifice, menacing that magnificent abode of royalty with complete ruin. This scene of desolation was not confined to the precincts of the palace. The streets were blocked up by broken pieces of furniture and the carcases of the dead. Those who fled from the scene of action, or were even supposed to fly, were treated as enemies, and fired at as they retreated. A continual discharge of musketry had succeeded to the sound of the cannon, and told a tale of fresh murders every moment. Such were the horrors which followed this popular victory, whatever might have been the conquered, the conquerors, and the cause for which they contended.

The executive power being dissolved by the suspension of Louis XVI., there remained in Paris but two authorities, the commune and the assembly. It has been already stated, in relating the events of the 10th of August, that the deputies of the sections, having assembled at the Hotel de Ville, seized upon the municipal authority, by expelling the previous magistrates, and had directed the course of the insurrection during the day and night of the 10th. In fact, they possessed the only effective power; and being inflated with all the pride and presumption of victory, represented that class of fiery revolutionists who had, during the whole session, set themselves against the tardy proceedings of the assembly; which was nevertheless composed of men more enlightened and wise, though less active and enterprising than themselves. The first act of these deputies was the ousting of all the higher authorities, fearing their attachment to power from their near vicinity to it. They also suspended the staff of the national guard, and by removing Mandat from the palace, had disorganized the defence of the Tuilleries, and bestowed the command of the national guard on Santerre. There was not the less anxiety to suspend the functions of the department which, from the high estate in which it was placed, had constantly been opposed to the passions of the populace, having, in fact, no sympathy with them. As to the municipality, they suppressed its general council, and substituted themselves in its place, retaining only the mayor Pétion, the procurator-syndic Manuel, and the sixteen municipal officers. All this took place whilst the people were making their attack on the palace. Danton presided over this tumultuous assembly; and at one moment, when the sharp fire of the Swiss had driven the people back, and they were observed retreating along the quays, he cried out, "Our brethren require our assistance; let us go and give it them," and immediately sallied out to join the mob. His presence brought them back to the scene of battle, and decided the victory. The combat being over, the people demanded the enlargement of Pétion, who had been placed in the custody of the guard, that he might resume his office of mayor. Nevertheless, either through regard for his safety, or a fear that his scrupulous disposition might disapprove of the measures that had been taken during the insurrection, the deputies decided that he should still remain under the protection of the guard for a day or two, pretending that his life would otherwise be endangered. During the same sitting it was also declared, that the busts of Louis XVI., Bailly, and Lafayette, should be removed from the council chamber. The new order who had thus elevated itself threw off the earliest demonstrations of the revolution, in order to substitute their own.

It now remained for this insurrectionary commune to put themselves in communication with the assembly. It is true, they had accused it of tardiness, and even of monarchical principles; but as it was the only existing sovereign authority, they felt by no means disposed to treat it with contempt. Even on the morning of the 10th, a deputation approached its bar, to announce the formation of the commune, and to inform the assembly of their proceedings. Danton was among the members who formed this deputation. "The people, who have sent us to you," said he, "have charged us to declare that they have always considered you worthy of their confidence, but that they will acknowledge no other judge of those measures which necessity has obliged them to have recourse to, than the French people, as well our sovereign as yours, met together in primary assemblies." The assembly replied to these deputies by their president, that they approved of all that the commune had already done, but recommended to them the preservation of order and peace. They also communicated to them the decrees which they had that day passed, and begged that they would promulgate them. After this, a proclamation, calling upon every one to respect persons and property, was drawn up, and some of the members of the assembly were ordered to distribute it among the people.

Their grand object, however, at the present crisis was, to substitute some authority in the place of the regal power, which was now no more. The ministers, meeting under the name of an executive council, were provisionally entrusted with the duties of the administration, and the execution of the laws. The minister of justice was the keeper of the great seal, which being affixed to the decrees of the assembly, stamped them with the authority of the legislative power. The present question, was the choice of persons to compose this ministry. The restoration of Roland, Clavière, and Servan, who had been dismissed for their attachment to the popular cause, naturally occurred to the assembly, as the best selection that could be made. These three ministers were, therefore, unanimously restored to their former situations, Roland to the home department, Servan to the war-office, and Clavière to the finances. But a minister of justice, one for foreign and another for naval affairs, were still wanting. Here was an opportunity to make a free choice, and the desire formed some time since in favour of obscure merit or ardent patriotism, could now be realized without any impediment. Danton, from his influence over the multitude, and the very leading position he had lately assumed, was judged the fittest person for the first of these offices; and although by no means favoured by the Girondists, as being the choice of the rabble, he was nominated minister of justice by a majority of two hundred and twenty-two, out of two hundred and eighty-four. After this concession to the wishes of the people, and this place having been granted to an energetic character, a philosopher was chosen for the marine, this was the learned mathematician Monge, who was proposed and elected on the suggestion of his friend and admirer Condorcet. Finally, Le Brun was appointed to the office of foreign affairs, and the public rewarded in his person one of those painstaking individuals who themselves perform all those operations, of which ministers reap the credit.

After having thus re-established the executive power, the assembly declared that all those decrees to which Louis XVI. had opposed his veto, should be deemed in force. The formation of the camp near Paris, which had been the occasion of such animated discussions, was immediately ordered; and the engineers were authorized, on the same day, to commence their fortifications on the heights of Mont Martre. This revolution being thus accomplished at Paris, it was necessary to secure its success in the departments, and especially in the army, which was commanded by suspected generals. Commissioners chosen from the assembly were consequently sent into the departments, and to the army, to carry information respecting the events of the 10th of August, and also to displace, if it should appear necessary, both the civil and military chiefs then in authority, and to substitute others in their room.

These decrees were all passed in a few hours; and even whilst they were being passed, the attention of the assembly was frequently called to other subjects. Many of the valuables which had been carried off from the Tuileries were brought to the assembly. The Swiss, the household of the palace, and all those who had been arrested in their flight, or saved from the fury of the people, were conducted to its bar, and thus sheltered for a time. Crowds of persons came in, one after another, to give information of the discoveries they had made of the supposed plots of the court. Accusations and calumnies of every description were uttered against the royal family, who overheard them all from the contracted apartment in which they were placed. This apartment was the lodge of the clerk of the journals. Louis XVI. listened calmly to all that was said, and conversed, in the intervals, with Vergniaud and other deputies who were seated near him. Having been confined fifteen hours, he had asked for some refreshment, which he partook of with his wife and children. This afforded occasion for many to indulge themselves in indecent and ungenerous railery concerning his supposed propensity to the pleasures of the table! Such consideration did misfortune receive at their victorious hands! The dauphin reclined on the bosom of his mother, and slept heavily, being overcome by the excessive heat. The young princess and Madame Elizabeth sat beside the queen, their eyes red and swollen with tears. At the further end of the lodge were a few lords attached to his person, who had not deserted him in his misfortunes. Fifty soldiers, chosen from those who had escorted the royal family from the palace to the assembly, constituted a guard for their persons in this narrow apartment. It was from this place the fallen monarch contemplated the spoils of his palace, beheld his regal power crumbled into ruins before his eyes, and saw the small remnant that was left distributed among the popular authorities.

The tumult of the people had not yet ceased; it still continued to rage with extreme violence. The suspension of the royal authority was not enough to satisfy the populace; they demanded its utter abolition. Petitions after petitions were presented to the assembly on this subject, and their answer was awaited with extreme impatience. Multitudes had collected outside the doors of the assembly; the streets and avenues were all blocked up; and the dethronement of the king was the only topic of conversation among this immense mass. The doors of the assembly were absolutely assailed, and, at one time, with so much violence, that it was thought they were broken open, and the most lively fear for the safety of the royal family prevailed among the deputies. Henry Larivière was sent with some others to endeavour to calm the people, and at the moment when the fears of the assembly were at their height, returned and exclaimed with animation, "Yes, gentlemen, I assure you from what I have seen, I am confident that the mass of the people are determined rather to perish than dishonour the cause of liberty by any act of inhumanity. Believe me," added he, "there is nothing to fear, and every gentleman in this assembly may with confidence rely upon the loyalty of the French people." These animating expressions were applauded. Vergniaud then rose, and answered the petitioners, who required that the suspension should be altered to dethronement.—"I am delighted," said he, "with this opportunity of explaining the sentiments of the assembly in the presence of my fellow-citizens. It has decreed the suspension of the executive power, and nominated a convention to decide irrevocably on the question of the dethronement. In doing this, the assembly has done all that is consistent with her powers, which do not permit her to be a judge between herself and royalty. Meantime, the executive power has been so disposed of, that it cannot be abused. Thus this assembly has fulfilled all its duties, and at the same time has not exceeded the limits of her prerogative." These words produced a favourable effect, and the petitioners, being satisfied, took upon themselves the task of satisfying and appeasing the people.

It was now necessary to put an end to this long sitting. The valuables, therefore, which had been brought from the Tuileries, were ordered to be deposited with the commune. The Swiss and the other persons who had been arrested, were either put in the charge of a guard of the feuillans, or taken to various places of confinement; and, finally, it was decided that the royal family should be kept under a guard in the Luxembourg till the meeting of the national convention; but that whilst the necessary preparations were making for their reception, they should be lodged in some place under the care and control of the assembly. Consequently, at one o'clock in the morning of Saturday the 11th, they were carried to the lodging which had been prepared for them, and which consisted of four cells in the old feuillans. Those lords who had not deserted the king, established themselves in the first; the king occupied the second; the queen, her sister, and children, the two others; the woman of the porter's lodge attended upon the princesses, in the place of a numerous train of ladies, who, the evening before, were all anxiety to minister their attendances.

The sitting of the assembly was delayed till three o'clock in the morning. There was still great disorder in Paris. To prevent disturbances, the environs of the palace were illuminated, and the greater part of the citizens under arms.

Such were the events of this terrible day. The king and his family were prisoners at the feuillans; the three disgraced ministers were replaced in their situations; Danton, who the evening before was concealed at an obscure club, was now minister of justice; Pétion was guarded at his home, but his name was hailed as the Father of the people. Marat, having emerged from the mean hiding-place where Danton had concealed him during the attack of the palace, now promenaded the streets of Paris, brandishing his sabre, and heading a battalion of Marseillais; Robespierre, whom no one had seen figure in these terrible scenes, now came forward, made harangues at the Jacobins, conversed with some members who stayed at his house, as to the use they should make of their victory, of the necessity of breaking up the present assembly, and of impeaching Lafayette.

On the day following it still became necessary to quell the enraged populace, who yet continued to massacre those who were taken for fugitive aristocrats. The assembly resumed their sitting at seven o'clock in the morning, and the royal family were replaced in the lodge they had occupied the preceding day, that they might assist in the measures about to be taken, and be present at the scenes which were about to take place in the legislative body. Pétion had been freed from custody by the people; and now came, escorted by an immense multitude, to give the assembly an account of the state of Paris, which he had every where visited, endeavouring to diffuse the spirit of peace wherever he appeared. The citizens seemed to have constituted themselves the guardians of the life of this man. He was received most cordially by the assembly, and left them only to reiterate his pacific exhortations to the people. The Swiss soldiers, who had the evening before been confined in the feuillans, were fiercely menaced. The populace, with great outcries, called for their blood, declaring them the accomplices of the court, and the assassins of the people. They were at last, however, appeased, by being assured that the offenders should be brought to trial, and that a court-martial was about to be formed for the punishment of those who have since been denominated the conspirators of the 10th of August. "I require thee be taken," exclaimed the blood-thirsty Chabot, "to the Abbaye to be tried. . . In the land of equality the law should spare none, not even those that have sat on a throne." The officers were immediately taken to the Abbaye, but it was with much difficulty that the people could be persuaded to desist from executing summary vengeance on the soldiers, and it was only after reiterated assurances that they should be brought to trial without delay, that they would consent to their escaping from their hands.

This thirst for vengeance on the defenders of royalty which the populace experienced, solely occupied their minds, and became the cause of most bitter divisions. In tracing the progress of the insurrection, we have already pointed out the differences which began to divide the popular party. The assembly, composed of enlightened and moderate men, had manifested a spirit of opposition to the clubs and municipalities. These latter were the rendezvous of persons of low birth, mean education, and inferior talents, but of a daring ambition, which prompted them to rush into every extreme. Even on the evening of the 10th of August, Chabot and Pétion had disagreed concerning the dethronement of the king; the latter wishing it to be declared by a decree, and the former effected by force. The advocates of violence and bloodshed now stood before the assembly, and emboldened by their late victory, reminded them of their acquittal of Lafayette, and assured them, with expressions of equivocal respect, that the safety of the people must not be again endangered by the incompetence of their measures. These furious victors composed the whole commune, with the exception of a few ambitious tradesmen and rioters of a still inferior class. They occupied the clubs of the Jacobins and Cordeliers, and some few of them had seats on the lower forms of the legislative body. Chabot, the most violent of his party, was constantly passing to and fro from the tribune of the assembly to that of the Jacobins, and was continually threatening all who differed from him with the pike and the tocsin.

The assembly had pronounced the suspension, and the Jacobins who were most imperious called for a dethronement. In appointing a governor for the dauphin, the assembly had acknowledged regality, but these required a republic. The majority of the assembly thought that all the energy and activity of the nation should be directed against its foreign foes, but that the vanquished should be pardoned. These maintained, on the contrary, that it was altogether as necessary to resist a foreign force as to punish those who, intrenched in the palace, designed the massacre of the people, and contemplated the introduction of the Prussians into Paris. Carrying their views still further, they insisted that the electoral bodies were not necessary in order to form a new assembly, but that every citizen, indiscriminately, was entitled to a vote on such an occasion; it was even proposed by a Jacobin that the women should partake of the same political rights as the men. It was loudly proclaimed that the people ought to present themselves in arms before the legislative body, to make known to them their sovereign will. Marat was the author of this extravagant suggestion; it was his object to incite the people to take vengeance on the assembly, because he thought that it would be, according to his frightful scheme, necessary for the purification of the kingdom. Robespierre, although less sanguinary, and not so much attached to such a system of purification, seconded this design, out of envy to the assembly, and from this motive continually dwelt upon its weakness, and reproached it violently with entertaining principles favourable to monarchy. The darling of the Jacobins, and having been proposed before the 10th of August as a dictator, he was now considered as the most eloquent and incorruptible defender of the rights of the people. Danton, on the contrary, neither envying the praises of the multitude, nor anxious to display his eloquence, never aspired to the dictatorship, yet he certainly gained the victory of the 10th of August by his intrepidity. At present, neglecting all unnecessary display, he only thought of obtaining the ascendancy in the executive council of which he was a member. Being free from the passions of hatred or envy, he entertained no malevolent sentiments against those deputies, the brilliancy of whose talents so much offended Robespierre; but their inactivity occasioned his neglect, and he preferred the more energetic characters of the inferior classes, relying mainly upon them to maintain and accomplish the revolution.

The knowledge of these political divisions had not yet obtained circulation beyond Paris. All that the public of France perceived was the resistance of the assembly to the desires of the people, and the acquittal of Lafayette, in spite of the opposition of the commune and the Jacobins. But these acts were imputed to the royalist and feaillantine majority. The Girondists were still regarded as patriots, and Brissot and Robespierre equally esteemed by the inhabitants of the provinces; but Pétion, who had been so persecuted by the court, was the general favourite, and no one cared to know whether Pétion was considered as too moderate by Chabot, had excited the envy of Robespierre, was regarded as an honest but weak man by Danton, or looked upon as a conspirator and fit subject for his purifying system, by Marat. Pétion was as yet extremely popular with the multitude; but, like Bailly after the 14th of July, he soon became odious, by disapproving of those excesses which it was not in his power to check.

The principal rendezvous of the new revolutionists was the Jacobin club, and the commune. At the former, all public measures were proposed and discussed, and executed immediately afterwards by the same men at the Hotel de Ville, by virtue of their municipal powers, and which they could not but have proposed at their club. This general council of the commune was in itself a species of assembly as numerous as the legislative body. Like it, it had its tribune, its committee, its more noisy plaudits, and a power of action much more extensive. The mayor presided over this assembly, and the office of speaker was held by the procureur-syndic, whose duty it was to enforce all the requisitions which were deemed essential. Pétion, however, soon withdrew from this conspicuous post, and confined himself to his more immediate duty of supplies; but Manuel rushed into the opposite extreme, and by his daily declamations appeared to have abandoned himself to every species of revolutionary excess.

Robespierre, however, was the ruling spirit of this assembly. During the three days ensuing the 10th of August, he had remained in the background, but after the consummation of that insurrection, he presented himself to the committee for the purpose of submitting the powers with which he had been invested to examination, and appeared rather to command than sue for their confirmation. This pride, instead of creating disgust, rather increased the respect that was on all sides paid him. The reputation of his talents, and the general opinion of his uprightness and fidelity, altogether formed a grave and respectable character, which these assembled citizens were proud to see amongst them. While he waited for the meeting of the national convention, of which he was certain of being a member, he exercised in the commune a power more substantial and effective than any he could acquire by the homage of public opinion which he enjoyed in the Jacobin club.

The first object of the commune was to secure the police, for the power of seizing and pursuing our enemies is, in time of civil dissension, of all others the most important and the most desirable. The justices of the peace had been expected to use this power to support the popular cause, but, having displayed great activity against the instigators of the populace, they had alienated the public mind; and, either from private conviction, or the official necessity of their situations, had opposed themselves to the patriotic party. It was not forgotten, too, that one of their number had dared, in the case of Bertrand de Molléville, and the newspaper editor Carré, to summon two deputies before them. The justices of peace were, therefore, deprived of their functions, and every thing connected with that department was vested in the municipal authorities. Agreeing with the commune of Paris on this point, the assembly decreed that the police, called the police of general safety, should be attached to the departments, districts, and municipalities. It was the office of this body to take cognizance of all crimes which threatened the interior or exterior safety of the state; to scrutinize the character of all citizens whose conduct or opinions might bring them under suspicion; and to provisionally imprison, disperse, or disarm, any whose supposed designs should render such a measure necessary. The municipal councils themselves performed this office, and the whole body of the people were thus called on to observe, denounce, and prosecute, the hostile party. It may easily be imagined that this democratic police would act with a vigour, often carried to severe and arbitrary lengths. A denunciation was first submitted to the whole council, and then referred to the committee of surveillances, which issued its warrant for the arrest. The national guard was permanently in requisition, and municipal towns, whose population exceeded twenty thousand, were permitted to add particular regulations to this law of the general safety. Little did the legislative assembly perceive, that they were thus paving the way for those bloody executions which had otherwise approached with slower steps; but beset by enemies within and without, it now called upon the people to keep guard, as it had before, summoned them to take part in the government, and fight for their rights.

The commune of Paris listened to exercise their new powers, and numerous arrests took place. Irritated by the recollection of the dangers of the evening, and the greater perils of the morning, these conquerors determined to crush their enemies whilst in their power, and to prevent the possibility of their regaining their former strength by the intervention of foreign aid. The committee of surveillances of the commune of Paris was composed of the most violent men. Marat, who, during the revolution, audaciously assailed everybody, was its chief; and, of all men, a more terribly formidable one could not have been chosen for such an office.

Besides this principal committee, the commune of Paris established a particular committee in each section. According to their plan, passports could only be issued through the medium of the assemblies of the sections; all travellers were obliged to be accompanied, whether it were to the municipality, or to the gates of Paris, by two witnesses, who were to identify the person who demanded the passport with the traveller himself. Thus the escape of all suspected characters under assumed names was effectually prevented. A list of the enemies of the revolution was also drawn up, and the citizens were called upon to make every exertion to discover the culprits of the 10th of August. All the public writers who had defended the royal cause were placed under arrest, and their presses given to the patriot editors. Marat made restitution to himself in a triumphant manner of four presses, of which he had been deprived, by the orders, as he said, of the traitor Lafayette. Commissioners visited the prisons, to liberate those prisoners who were confined for crimes against the court. Ever prompt to meddle with everything and everybody, the commune, imitating the assembly, sent deputies to carry intelligence to the army of Lafayette, and to gain them over, a subject which occasioned much anxiety to the patriots.

The commune was furthermore charged with a responsibility by no means of small importance, which was to have the custody of the royal family. The Luxembourg had been first thought of as the fittest place of custody for these august personages; but, as it was observed that it would be difficult to guard it strictly, the hotel of the minister of justice was preferred. But the commune, who now governed the police of the capital, and who considered the charge of the king's person an office particularly belonging to them, objected to this arrangement, and declared they could not be responsible for his security, unless the tower of the Temple was fixed on as the place of confinement. The assembly acquiesced in this, and placed the royal prisoners under the care of the mayor and commandant, General Santerre, on their own personal responsibility*. Twelve commissioners of the general council were then appointed to keep an uninterrupted watch in the Temple. Some exterior works had been thrown out, to form a species of parade ground. Numerous detachments of the national guard, alternately relieving each other, formed a garrison; and admittances within it was given to none except by the express permission of the municipality. The assembly also voted a supply of five hundred thousand francs for the maintenance of the royal family till the approaching meeting of the national convention.

The functions of the commune were, as has already been shown, extremely extensive. Placed in the centre of all functions of the state where it exercised the highest powers, and carried away by its energy to execute itself whatever had been too lightly performed by the high authorities, it was continually induced to encroach upon them. The assembly saw the necessity of placing some limits to these popular encroachments, and ordered an election of a new council of the department to replace that which had been broken up on the day of the insurrection. The commune, perceiving itself menaced with the yoke of a superior authority, which, in all probability, would take a high range, opposed the decree, and ordered the sections to defer the election, which had already commenced. The procurator-syndic, Manuel, was also immediately despatched from the Hotel de Ville to the feuillans, to declare explicitly the protestations of the municipality. "The deputies of the citizens of Paris," said he, "have need of an unlimited power; a new authority intervening between them and you can only cause dissensions; and the people will be forced again to have recourse to arms, to deliver themselves from an authority so destructive of their sovereignty."

Such was the menacing language which the people already dared to address to the assembly, which not only listened to but obeyed it, thinking it either impossible or imprudent to resist the energy of the commune, and whether it were that it was considered impossible or imprudent to resist, or whether it were that the assembly looked upon it as a dangerous experiment to fetter the energy of the commune at that particular period, they decided that the new council should have no authority over the municipality, but should merely constitute a commission of finance to superintend the public contributions in the department of the Seine.

But another question of still greater importance soon succeeded to this, which manifested still more strikingly the opposition of feeling and opinion which existed between the commune and assembly. The punishment of those who had fired on the people, and who were supposed determined to join the enemy as soon as they approached, was loudly demanded. These were sometimes called the conspirators of the 10th of August, or the traitors. The court-martial, appointed on the 11th to try the Swiss, was not deemed sufficient, because its commission was confined to the prosecution of military offenders. The criminal tribunal of the department of the Seine appeared to be regulated by formalities too tardy for the present purpose; and moreover, all courts of justice which had existed anterior to the 10th were much suspected. The commune demanded, therefore, on the 13th the constitution of a tribunal for the trial of the crimes of the 10th of August, possessing a sufficient latitude of power to reach all the traitors. The assembly sent this petition to their extraordinary committee, which had been sitting since the month of July, and were employed in devising measures of general safety.

On the 14th a new deputation was sent from the commune to the assembly. They demanded the decree relative to the extraordinary tribunal, and declared, that if it was not yet passed, they had it in charge to wait for it. In reply to this, the deputy Gaston made some severe observations; and the deputation retired. The assembly persisted in refusing the creation of an extraordinary tribunal, and contented themselves with declaring that those already existing were perfectly competent to take cognizance of the crimes of the 10th of August.

On the news of this refusal, a violent feeling of indignation spread through Paris. The section of the Quinze Vingts presented themselves to the council general of the commune, and intimated that the tocsin would be rung in the faubourg St. Antoine if the decree was not immediately passed. The general council then dispatched another deputation, at the head of which was Robespierre. He, in the name of the municipality, addressed the assembly, and, among other insolent remonstrances, uttered the following: "The tranquillity of the people depends upon the punishment of the guilty, and yet you have done nothing to convict them. Your decree is insufficient. It does not explain the nature of the crimes to be punished; for it mentions only the crimes of the 10th of August, whereas the crimes of the enemies of the French revolution are not confined to that day or to the city of Paris. By a similar indefinite expression the traitor Lafayette escaped the vengeance of the law! As to the form of a tribunal, the people can no longer tolerate that already established. Appeals from one court to another are attended with interminable delays; and, besides, all the old authorities are very much suspected; new ones must be instituted; and that at present demanded must be composed of deputies taken from the sections, so that it may be enabled to pronounce final judgment with sovereign authority and without appeal."

This imperious petition acquired additional harshness by the tone of Robespierre. The assembly replied to the people of Paris, by utterly repelling the idea of consenting to an extraordinary commission for the trial of public offences, as unworthy of a free people, and could only be a fit engine for despotism.

These reasonable observations had no other effect, but that of increasing the irritation of the people. Nothing was talked of in Paris but the tocsin, and on the following day a representative of the commune presented himself at the bar of the assembly. "As a citizen," said he, "and magistrate of the people, I think it my duty to inform you that to-night, at twelve o'clock, the tocsin will be rung, and the drums will beat the generale, if the decree is not passed. The people are weary of restraining their wrath. Take heed lest they should do themselves justice in spite of you! I now demand," added the audacious petitioner, "that you do this instant decree, the nomination of a citizen from each section for the formation of a criminal tribunal."

This menacing address greatly roused the indignation of the assembly, and the deputies Choudieu and Thuriot severely reprimanded the messenger of the commune. Nevertheless the subject was again discussed; and being strongly supported by the popular members of the assembly, the decree so loudly called for was finally passed; and thus the populace gained the most complete victory. An electoral body was immediately ordered to assemble for the purpose of electing the members of an extraordinary tribunal, ordained to try the crimes committed on the 10th of August, and all others in any way connected with them. This tribunal, divided into two sections, had the power of pronouncing judgment in the last resort, and without an appeal. Such was the first specimen of a revolutionary tribunal, and the first acceleratory impulse given by vengeance to the forms of law. This tribunal was called the tribunal of the 17th of August.

The effect which the last revolution had produced on the armies, and the manner in which they had received the decrees of the 10th, was not yet known. This was a most important point, for on it depended the fate of the new revolution. The frontier was always distributed among three divisions of the army; that of the north, the centre, and the south. Luckner commanded the north; Lafayette the centre; and Montesquieu the south. Since the unfortunate affairs of Mons and Tournay, Luckner, at the instigation of Dumouriez, had again acted on the offensive in the Low Countries, but soon retired, and on evacuating Courtray, set fire to its faubourgs, which had formed one grand article of accusation against the ministry on the eve of the dethronement. Since that time, the armies had remained in complete inactivity, living in fortified camps, and only occasionally engaged in slight skirmishes. Dumouriez, upon quitting the ministry, joined Luckner as lieutenant-general, but was badly received by the army, where the party of Lafayette had the ascendancy. Luckner being at that time perfectly under its influence, detached Dumouriez to the camp of Maulde, and left him there occupied in forming entrenchments, and occasionally engaging in slight skirmishes.

Whilst the king was in danger, Lafayette felt great anxiety to approach nearer to Paris; and therefore wished to take the command of the army of the north. Not being able, however, to quit his troops, by whom he was much beloved, he entered into an arrangement with Luckner for a change of position, each with his own division, and both of them to shift their camps, the one to bear to the north, the other to the centre. This shifting of the armies in the presence of the enemy might have been attended with much danger, if happily the war had not been completely inactive. The head-quarters of Luckner were thus removed to Metz, and that of Lafayette to Sedan. This cross movement was however accompanied by some risk. Dumouriez, in following the grand army with his small body of troops, came suddenly before the enemy, who threatened him with an attack; and he was obliged to remain in his camp, or leave the entrance of Flanders open to the Duke of Saxe-Teschén. He therefore joined himself with other generals who afterwards arrived, and came to an understanding with Dillon, who commanded a part of the army of Lafayette, the result of which was the calling a council of war at Valenciennes to justify his disobedience to Luckner, on the plea of necessity. Meanwhile Luckner had arrived at Metz, and Lafayette at Sedan; and had it not been for the events of the 10th of August, Dumouriez would certainly have been placed under arrest, and brought to a court-martial for disobedience of orders, for his refusal to march in advance.

Such was the situation of the armies when the intelligence of the overthrow of the crown first reached them. One of the first acts of the assembly, after the accomplishment of that event, was, as has been seen, to despatch messengers to the army to make known their decrees, and administer to them a new oath of allegiance to the present authorities. The three messengers who were intrusted with this mission were received on their arrival at Sedan by the municipality, who held from Lafayette orders to put them under arrest. The mayor first interrogated them concerning the events of the 10th of August, and when they had given a full history of the terrible scenes of that day, declared, according to secret instructions from Lafayette, that it was evident that the assembly were not free agents when they pronounced the suspension of the king; and therefore that they themselves must be considered merely as the emissaries of a faction, and expect only to be treated as such. By the orders of Lafayette, who took the responsibility of this action on himself, they were consequently imprisoned; and instead of administering the new oath, he ordered the old one, of fidelity to the law and the king, to be repeated throughout the army under his command. He determined to attempt to overthrow the revolution of the 10th of August, and to effect this, depended on the co-operation of the seventy-five departments who had adhered to the sentiments of his letter of the 16th of June. Dillon, who was at Valenciennes under the orders of Lafayette, and who possessed a superior command to Dumouriez, obeyed his commander-in-chief, and administered the oath of fidelity to the law and to the king to his troops. He then ordered Dumouriez to do the same in his camp at Maulde; but he, forming a correct judgment of the future, and besides being irritated against the fenillans, seized upon this opportunity of resisting them, and gaining the favour of the new government for himself and his troops by refusing to comply with this order.

On the 17th of August, the same day in which the new tribunal had been so tumultuously established, the news of the arrest and imprisonment of the messengers sent to the army of Lafayette reached Paris. This intelligence excited even more indignation than alarm: the rage of the people against Lafayette became exasperated to a higher pitch than ever. Charges against him were clamorously called for, and the assembly reproached for not having impeached him long before. A decree was also immediately passed against the department of Ardennes; new messengers were despatched with the same powers as the former, and with a commission to set at liberty the three prisoners; other messengers were also sent to the army of Dillon; and on the morning of the 19th, the assembly declared Lafayette a traitor to his country, and framed articles of impeachment against him.

The situation of affairs was now extremely critical; for if the resistance of the army was not conquered, the new revolution would presently come to ruin. France, divided between the republicans of the interior and the constitutionalists of the army, must, in that event, have been greatly enfeebled before the enemy, and exposed at once to a foreign invasion, and a terrific re-action of politics at home. Certainly the revolution of the 10th of August, and the abolition of the constitution of 1791, must have been odious to Lafayette. It indeed accomplished all the prophecies of the aristocracy, and justified completely the hatred of the court to liberty. It was the triumph of democracy; it confirmed the ascendancy of a bloody anarchy, and introduced the prospect of an interminable confusion in the disorganization of all government. Those who have lived to see the term of these calamities can rejoice that the defence of the country against foreign foes was not abandoned on any account; but to Lafayette the future seemed enveloped in terrific uncertainty. The possibility of defending the nation whilst agitated by such great political convulsions appeared dubious; yet he felt a desire to oppose himself to this chaos, and at the same time, to resist both its exterior and internal enemies. His army was devoted to him, but armies are not governed by their own personal wills, but by that of superior authorities. When indeed a revolution breaks out with the violence of that of 1789, they may be carried away by the blind force of the general impulse, and abandon their former masters, because the later impulse is the most powerful; but this was not the case in the present instance. Proscribed as he was, and stricken by the decree of the assembly, the popularity of Lafayette, however great, was not sufficient to turn the arms of his troops against the authorities of the interior; and his personal influence came short of the effect produced by the influence of Paris. Placed between two enemies, and uncertain as to what his duty called upon him to do, he hesitated how to act. This gave great advantage to his adversaries. Decrees after decrees were fulminated against him, and followed up by the most energetic measures. This increased the hesitation of the general, and confirmed the popular inclinations of the army. In fact, the troops, after wavering for some time, seemed to abandon their commander. The civil authorities became intimidated, and obeyed the new emissaries. The conduct of Dumouriez, who declared himself for the revolution of the 10th August, drew every thing along with it, and Lafayette, who declared himself in the opposition, was left alone with his staff, composed of feuillans or constitutional officers.

Bouillé, whose energy was undoubted, and Dumouriez, whose great talents were incontestible, were at different periods compelled to act in the same manner, and found themselves obliged to take flight. Lafayette could not have been more fortunate. Before his departure, he wrote to the several civil authorities who had seconded his resistance, and took upon himself the responsibility of orders which had been issued against the commissioners of the assembly, and quitted his camp on the 20th of August, with a few officers, his companions in arms, professing the same opinions with himself: Bureau de Pusy, Latour Maubourg, and Lameth accompanied him. They left the camp, not taking with them more than their month's pay, and attended by a few servants. Lafayette left every thing in the most perfect order, and every preparation made for resisting the attack of the enemy. Some officers, who accompanied him in the beginning of his journey, he sent back, that he might not deprive France of a single defender; and on the 21st he and his friends took the road to the Low Countries. On their arrival at the advanced posts of the Austrians, these first emigrants of liberty were arrested; and, contrary to the rights of nations, made prisoners of war. The joy was great, when the name of Lafayette resounded through the camp of the allied powers, and that he had become the prisoner of the aristocratic league. To have the opportunity of tormenting one of the earliest friends of the revolution, and to have the power of imputing to the revolution itself the persecution of its first originators, and to see verified all the excesses they had predicted, this was more than sufficient to diffuse an universal satisfaction amongst the European aristocracy.

Lafayette, on his own part, and the part of his friends, claimed the right of individual liberty, but in vain. It was offered him at the price of a retraction, not of all his opinions, but of that alone which related to the abolition of nobility; he refused compliance with these terms, and threatened, if any false construction was put on his words, to give the lie to the public officer who recorded it. Chains were the reward of his constancy; and the fortitude and consistency he displayed at this period were quite admirable. The utter annihilation of liberty, which seemed to be now effected, did not dishearten his courage; nor did the dreadful abuse which it had suffered blind him to its true value. He continued to consider it as the most precious of blessings, and maintained this sentiment both before his oppressors, who detained him in their dungeons, and in his private letters to his old friends in France. "Cherish," said he to the latter,—"cherish always a love of liberty, in spite of the excesses it has apparently led to, and devote yourself to the service of your country." Compare this conduct with that of Bouillé or Dumouriez; the former flying from his country only to return to it under the banners of an enemy, and the latter deserting the party he had engaged to support, not from conviction, but from a quarrel with the Convention he had served; and justice ought now to be rendered to that man who did not abandon France until Truth, in which he had faith, was proscribed; and who neither disavowed or calumniated liberty in the midst of hostile enemies; for who is there to profess and maintain such doctrines in a dungeon?

Yet we must not too hastily condemn Dumouriez. We shall be called upon presently to appreciate his memorable services. He foresaw clearly that the irresistible energy of the people would gain the ascendancy, and, by his disobedience to Luckner, in refusing to quit the camp of Maulde, after his refusal of the oath as ordered by Dillon, he was rewarded by the supreme command of the armies of the north and the centre. Dillon, who was brave and impetuous, but headstrong, was at once dismissed for having obeyed Lafayette; but was afterwards restored to his command by the good offices of Dumouriez, who, desirous to accomplish his own ends, and to hurt as few persons as possible in his progress, did his best to support him with the commissaries of the assembly. Dumouriez was now commander-in-chief of the whole frontier from Metz to Dunkirk. Luckner was stationed at Metz, with his army, the same that was stationed formerly in the north. He had, indeed, in the first instance, whilst supported by Lafayette, appeared to resist the revolution of the 10th of August, but was at last prevailed upon by his troops and the messengers of the assembly to obey the decrees. He shed a few unavailing tears, and yielded to the new order of things.

The events of the 10th of August, and the advance of the season, decided the allied powers to carry on the war with activity. The dispositions of the foreign powers had undergone no alteration with regard to France. England, Holland, Denmark, and Switzerland, maintained a strict neutrality. Sweden, since the death of Gustavus, sincerely embraced the same part. The Italian principalities, indeed, were extremely hostile to France, but, fortunately, very weak. Spain still wavered, and was open to the intrigues of all parties. Russia and the two principal courts of Germany openly declared themselves enemies; but the former had as yet confined its hostility to the dismissal of the French ambassador, and Prussia and Austria alone appeared in arms on the frontiers. Of all the German states, two ecclesiastical electors and the Landgraves of the two Hesses, alone took an active part in the coalition; the remainder appeared to wait to be summoned. In this state of affairs, a large army of the enemy was, however, in the field, a force of a hundred and thirty-eight thousand strong, in an admirable state of discipline, threatened France, who had, to oppose to this force, at most, a hundred and twenty thousand raw and undisciplined recruits, scattered over an extensive frontier, and divided into three bodies, neither of which was strong enough, at one point, to oppose the enemy with any probability of success. Add to this, they had neither confidence in their officers nor themselves, and had hitherto been every day driven from the posts they had occupied. The intent of the allied powers was boldly to enter France by the route of Ardennes, and to make their way directly to Paris through Chalons. The two sovereigns of Prussia and Austria were in person at Mayence. Sixty thousand Prussians, inheritors of the glory of the great Frederick, advanced in a single column on the French centre; they marched through Luxembourg upon Longwy. Twenty thousand Austrians, commanded by General Clerfaut, supported them on the right, and occupied Stenay. On the left, sixteen thousand Austrians, commanded by Prince Hohenlohe-Kirchberg, and ten thousand Hessian troops, flanked the left of the Prussians. The Duke of Saxe-Teschon occupied the Low Countries, and menaced its strong places. The Prince de Condé, with six thousand French emigrants, marched towards Philippsbourg. Several other corps of emigrants were embodied in the Prussian and Austrian armies. It had been first intended to enrol them promiscuously in the German regiments; but they were afterwards permitted to form distinct regiments, and were divided between the allied armies. These regiments were composed chiefly of officers, who had consented to become soldiers, and formed a splendid corps of cavalry; more calculated, however, to display a valorous intrepidity in the perilous day of battle, than to sustain the fatigues of a long campaign.

The French armies were ill prepared to resist this powerful force. Their situations, at this critical period, were peculiarly unfortunate. At Maulde, Maubeuge, and Lille, thirty thousand men, occupying three camps, were commanded by the three generals Beurnonville, Moreton, and Duval. This composed the whole defence of the north, and the Low Countries. The army of Lafayette, about twenty-three thousand strong, disorganized by the departure of its general, and abandoned to the greatest contrariety of sentiments, lay encamped at Sedan; Dumouriez took the command of Lafayette's army. The army of Luckner, consisting of about twenty thousand soldiers, was stationed at Metz, and on the point of receiving a new commander, General Kellermann. The assembly, although displeased with Luckner, did not wish to dismiss him from their service altogether. In appointing, therefore, Kellermann to his command, he received, apparently, still higher promotion; and, with the title of generalissimo, had the task of organizing the new army of reserve conferred on him, together with another, purely honorary, that of giving his counsel to the generals when he might deem it necessary. Besides the troops we have enumerated, Custine commanded fifteen thousand men at Landau, and Biron thirty thousand in Alsace. But the latter was too far removed from the principal theatre of the war to have any influence on the fortune of the campaign.

The only two bodies which were capable of opposing any resistance to the grand army of the coalition, were the twenty-three thousand men Lafayette had commanded, and the twenty thousand of Kellermann, quartered around Metz. If, therefore, the grand army of invasion, duly considering the object of these operations, had marched rapidly on Sedan, whilst the troops were without a general, in a state of disorganization, divided in opinions, under no efficient director, as not yet under the command of Dumouriez, such a movement could not have failed to have cut off the defensive division, and have opened a passage through the Ardennes; whilst, at the same time, it would have obliged the other generals to retreat rapidly, and unite their forces behind the Marne. Perhaps even the enemy might have pushed their success still further, and have advanced from Lille and Metz, to Chalons and Rheims. Paris would then have been open before them, and no other expedient have remained for the new government, but the absurd one of a camp near Paris, or taking flight beyond the Loire.

But if the operations of France were weakened by the disorders of the revolution, those of the enemy were equally so by the different interests of the coalition. The King of Prussia, intoxicated with the idea of an easy conquest, flattered also and deceived by the emigrants, who represented the invasion as a simple military promenade, was inclined to undertake something more adventurous. But the prudence of the Duke of Brunswick checked this presumption, or it might have had the happy effect of a vigorous promptitude. The duke, considering the advanced state of the season, the disposition of the country, which was very different from what the emigrants had represented it, and the energy of the people, as displayed on the 10th of August, thought it most advisable to secure himself a solid basis of operations on the Moselle, by laying siege to Metz and Thionville, and renew hostilities the next season, with the advantage of the preceding acquisitions by conquest. Thus the opposition between the presumption of the king, and the prudence of the general, together with the dilatory and ineffective co-operation of the Austrians, who, instead of fifty, furnished only eighteen thousand men, under the command of the Prince Hohenlohe, prevented the execution of any decisive measure. Nevertheless, the Prussian army continued to march towards the centre, and reached Longwy, one of the strongest and most advanced posts on that frontier, on the 20th.

Dumouriez, who had all along thought that the invasion of the Netherlands would produce a revolution in that country, and thus protect France from the attacks of the Germans, had every thing in preparation to march forward, as soon as he obtained the command of the two armies; and was on the point of acting on the offensive against the prince of Saxe-Teschon, when Westermann, who had so distinguished himself by his activity on the 10th of August, and sent as a commissary to the army of Lafayette, brought information of the events which had happened on the theatre of the grand invasion. On the 22nd, Longwy, after a bombardment of a few hours, had opened its gates to the Prussians. The disorder of the garrison, and the incompetence of the commandant, were the sole cause of this. This conquest, together with the captivity of Lafayette, greatly exalted the confidence of the Prussians, who seemed more than ever to desire some service in which they could act on the offensive. The army of Lafayette would now have been annihilated almost without resistance, had not its new general appeared, to revive its courage, and direct its movements.

Dumouriez, therefore, abandoned his favourite design, and on the 25th or 26th, arrived at Sedan, where he was received at first with murmurs of discontent, and inspired only sentiments of detestation. Lafayette was still beloved among the troops; his enemy, consequently, was proportionably disliked; besides, he was considered as the author of the present unhappy war, it having originated in his ministry; and was regarded rather as a statesman and writer than a general. These ideas were expressed freely in the conversations of the soldiers, and frequently reached the ears of Dumouriez. They did not, however, disconcert his projects. To revive the zeal and courage of his troops was his first object; and by a firm and determined command he sought to corroborate his own authority. Nevertheless the situation of twenty-three thousand men in a state of disorganization, in the presence of an enemy eighty thousand strong, and under perfect command, was appalling in the extreme. The Prussians having taken Longwy, and blockaded Thionville, advanced upon Verdun, a fort much less capable of resistance than the fortifications of Longwy.

The opinion of the council of generals called by Dumouriez was unanimous. To wait for the enemy they represented as dangerous in the extreme, and counselled a retreat behind the Marne as the only step that remained to be taken. There, they said, the fortifications should be rendered as strong as possible; the retreating army might wait to be joined by the others; and thus reinforced might afford effectual protection to the capital, distant only forty leagues from the enemy. They were also of opinion that by exposing themselves to a defeat in their endeavouring to resist invasion, the rout would be complete, that a discomfited army could not make a stand between Sedan and Paris, and that the conquerors would march thither directly and at a conqueror's pace. Such was the military situation of France, and such the pronounced opinion of her generals.

At Paris affairs were not viewed in a more favourable light; and the exasperation of the people increased in proportion to the danger which seemed to threaten them. Nevertheless, that immense metropolis, which had never as yet known the calamity of contending with an enemy within its walls, feared not so much its foreign adversaries, as a perilous re-action on the part of the royalists, at present abased to the very dust. Thus whilst the generals on the frontier were engrossed wholly in the danger threatened by the Prussians, at Paris nothing was thought of but the aristocrats secretly plotting against liberty.

The king, it was said, was a prisoner, but his party were not the less active, and that they still carried on their conspiracies, and were ready, as before the 10th of August, to open the gates of Paris to the enemy. All the great houses at Paris were supposed to be filled with bodies of armed men, in readiness to appear at a moment's notice, to release the king, seize upon all authority, and deliver over France to the sword of the emigrants and the allied powers. This supposed correspondence between the interior and exterior enemy, was the topic of universal conversation. "We must get rid of the traitors," was the general cry; and the frightful idea of sacrificing the vanquished party, an idea which with the majority was nothing but the effect of a terrified imagination, yet was a notion which some men, either more bloodthirsty, more furious, or more inclined to violent acts, could reduce into a practical and meditated design.

We have already observed, that a desire had been expressed of avenging the people in respect of the affair of the 10th of August; and the discussions which took place between the assembly and commune on the subject of the extraordinary tribunal, have been already recorded. This tribunal, by whose sentence Dangremont and the unfortunate Laport, (intendant of the civil list,) had already lost their heads, did not display sufficient activity to satisfy the fury of the people. Forms, therefore, still more summary for the punishment of the traitors, were called for, and sentences against those whose trial had been referred to the high court at Orleans was loudly demanded. The dilatory process of these trials was complained of, and it was proposed that they should be transferred to the tribunal of the 17th of August. The persons principally arraigned by the court at Orleans were ministers, and other considerable functionaries of the state: among these was Delassart; the crime of which he was accused, like that of the others, contained nothing of a positive nature; for he was not charged with any specific act of public delinquency, but with prevarication in the execution of his ministerial duties. To effect the transfer of these causes to the new tribunal, the assembly, instead of being consulted, were rather summoned, to pass a decree of transference, but courageously resisted the demand. The high national court of Orleans, they said, was a constitutional establishment, which they could not change, as not possessing constituent powers; and besides that, the accused had a right to be judged by laws made anterior to their accusation. This question had again raised up a cloud of petitioners, and the assembly had to resist at the same time a furious minority, the commune, and the unrestrained sections. The assembly confined itself to accelerating some of the forms of the high court, but declared that the prisoners brought before it should still remain at Orleans, and be tried by that jurisdiction which the constitution had provided for them.

Thus two parties were formed, the one desirous of sparing the vanquished, and directing all their energies against the foreign enemy; the other thirsting for the blood of those victims already in their power, and deeming the extirpation of their secret adversaries a necessary step, preparatory to their resistance of their avowed foes. This latter notion was not so much the result of reflection, as of a blind and brutal impulse, made up of rage and fear, and exasperated by an increasing danger.

The progress of the enemy greatly alarmed the Parisians for the safety of the city, the scene of all these insurrections, and the principal object of the enemy's march. They accused the assembly, which was composed of deputies of the departments, of being desirous of retiring to their respective provinces. The Girondists, particularly, who formed the moderate majority, so odious to the commune, were charged with being influenced by motives of hatred to the capital. This was imputing feelings to that party which the conduct of the Parisians might have justly called forth; but those deputies loved both their country and their cause too well to think of abandoning the metropolis. It is true they had frequently declared, that if the north was conquered, the government should retire to the south; and, even at the present juncture, some thought it would be prudent to retreat beyond the Loire; but the idea of sacrificing Paris, though rendered by late events odious in the extreme, had never entered into their minds. They possessed too much magnanimity to entertain such a thought; and, besides, were yet very powerful, and expected too much from the approaching convention to think of detaching themselves from Paris.

The Girondists, then, laboured under the odium of a double accusation, indulgence towards the traitors, and dislike to the capital. Having to resist the most violent characters, they were but ill prepared for the struggle; for, although they possessed a majority, and triumphed in the superior strength of reason, they were inferior in activity to their opponents, and wanted energy sufficient to check the popular excesses. In the executive council they had the advantage in the proportion of five to one. Servan, Clavière, and Roland were taken from among themselves; and Monge and Lebrun were members of their own choice; nevertheless, Danton alone threw this majority into the shade; and their moderation and arguments proved but weak barriers against the resistless energy of his eloquence and his measures. Whilst Clavière was employed in his financial labours, Servan busied in procuring reinforcements for the armies, and Roland in circulating exhortations through the provinces, calculated to direct the local authorities, prevent all encroachments on power, and repress the spirit of insurrection; Danton was occupied in filling up all the vacant places of the administration with his own creatures. He sent forth his faithful Cordeliers everywhere; and whilst he advanced his friends out of the spoils of the revolution, he strengthened himself by their support. His colleagues in the council, perceiving his great power, or wrought upon by his artful address, were either terrified, or seduced into compliance with his measures; and Roland alone opposed him with anything like effectual resistance. The inflexible rigidity of this minister's character, indeed, sometimes gained him a victory; nevertheless, Danton continued on a good footing with him; and, contented with his general ascendancy, submitted patiently to occasional defeats.

Danton, whose practicable influence was in Paris, was anxious to preserve it, and had made up his mind to prevent every transference of power to beyond the Loire. Having, on the 10th of August, with unparalleled audacity, proclaimed the insurrection, while every one else had hesitated, he was not the man to draw back, and he considered that he ought to fix himself in the capital. Possessing the ascendancy in the council, united with Marat, a member of the committee of the commune, the orator of all the clubs, and living in the midst of the multitude as in a congenial element, he certainly was the most powerful man in Paris; and this power, founded upon a naturally violent temper, spurred on by the passions of the populace, it was fearful to contemplate in regard to his victims. Danton indulged in every notion of hostility against the Girondists. He was the leader of that Parisian party who declared, "Let what will happen, we will not draw back. If we perish, it shall be under the ruins of the capital, and our enemies shall first become our victims." Thus were their minds tainted with such dreadful associations, and these frightful ideas were exhibited in the most terrific consequences.

On the 26th, the news of the capture of Longwy reached Paris, and, as it spread, the spirits of the people became ruffled with uncommon agitation. During the first day its truth was doubted, but at last it could no longer be disputed, and the public were acquainted that the fortification had opened its gates after a bombardment of several hours. The public excitement rose to such a pitch, that the assembly pronounced sentence of death against any one who should propose terms of capitulation in a besieged town. At the suggestion of the commune, it was also decreed, that Paris and the neighbouring departments should furnish, in a few days, thirty thousand men armed and equipped. The enthusiasm of the moment rendered this levy a matter of easy execution; and the sudden alarm which the success of the enemy imparted was soon abated, though the spirit of indignation it excited renewed its strength daily. The Parisians, feeling their own might, and their undaunted resolution to stand by the cause they had espoused, could not imagine it possible that a hundred thousand Prussians could subdue millions of freemen, whose unshackled energies were bent upon the work of self-defence. Preparations for the formation of a camp near Paris were continued with redoubled activity; and even females assembled together in the churches to contribute their aid in expediting this object.

Danton took his place in the commune, and proposed the most extreme measures. At his suggestion, it was resolved that all the paupers of the nation should be enlisted in the service of the government, and provided with pay and arms; and that those suspected of disaffection should be disarmed and arrested. All who had signed the petition of the 20th of June, and that against the formation of a camp near Paris, were included among the latter. To effect the last part of this project, domiciliary visits were resorted to, and carried into execution with terrible rigour. All the barriers of the city were ordered to be kept closed for forty-eight hours, commencing from the evening of the 25th August, and no permission to pass through them was allowed to be granted on any pretext whatsoever. Vessels were stationed in the river to prevent all possibility of escape by that outlet; and the communes of the neighbouring departments were charged to arrest all who might be discovered in the fields or on the roads. The visits of the inquisitors were announced by beat of drum, when all were obliged to retire to their homes, or they fell under the suspicion of disaffection, and were exposed to be dealt with as traitors. The assemblies of the sections and the grand tribunal itself were subject to this regulation, and all their proceedings were suspended for two days. Commissioners of the communes, assisted by an armed force, performed these visits, and seized upon the arms, and arrested the persons of all the suspected: that is, of all those who had signed the above-mentioned petitions; of all the non-juring priests, denounced citizens, or equivocal characters whatever, &c. After ten o'clock at night, the appearance of any carriage in the streets was prohibited; and the city was illuminated the whole night.

Such were the measures taken to get possession of the wicked citizens who had concealed themselves since the 10th of August. On the evening of the 27th, the visits commenced, and one party being exposed to the denunciations of the other, were in mutual danger of being thrown into prison. All those who had been attached in any way to the court, either by their services, rank, or benevolent attentions to their fallen sovereign, or who were so unfortunate as to possess enemies base enough to seek vengeance by a denunciation, were immured in dungeons; and from twelve to fifteen thousand individuals met with this fate during the two fatal days this inquisition was in active operation. It was the committee of superintendence of the commune that pronounced these sentences, and saw them carried immediately into effect. Those who were arrested, were conducted first from their own houses to the committee of their section, and from thence to that of the commune. There they were briefly interrogated concerning their opinions and actions. This was frequently performed by one member alone of the committee; whilst the others, overcome by fatigue, slept in their chairs or on the tables. Those condemned were first sent to the Hotel de Ville, and afterwards lodged in the prisons, where there was yet room. There were imprisoned all those whose opinions had at any time been triumphant or ascendant previous to the 10th of August. All being equally subverted, found one common receptacle; and humble tradesmen were accused with the same bitterness of being aristocrats as princes and dukes.

Terror prevailed throughout Paris. The republicans were kept in a state of fear by the Prussian armies; and the royalists lived under dread of republican vengeance. The committee of general defence, constituted by the assembly, for the purpose of considering the best means of defence against invasion, met on the 30th, and called for the co-operation of the general council, to devise the best means of securing the public safety. This meeting was very numerous; for many deputies, besides those who composed it, attended, and joined in its consultations. Several measures were proposed. The minister Servan declared, that he placed no confidence in the armies, and thought it impossible for Dumouriez with his twenty-three thousand men to arrest the progress of the Prussians. Between Paris and the enemy, he observed, there were no places sufficiently strong to make head against them and stop their march. Every one was of the same opinion in this respect, and having proposed to place the whole population in arms and in readiness to resist the enemy, with the courage of desperation, outside the walls of the city, a retreat to Saumur was suggested, that a greater number of obstacles might intervene between the government and the hostile armies. Vergniaud and Gaudet did not concur in the proposal to quit Paris. After them Danton rose.

"It has been proposed," said he, "to quit Paris; but you surely are not ignorant, that Paris, in the opinion of the enemy, represents France; and that therefore to give up this post, is to abandon the revolution. To retreat would be ruin; we must stand our ground, and place our safety in our courage.

"Among the several measures that have been submitted to our consideration, not one appears to me to have a sufficiently decisive character. We must not conceal from ourselves the situation in which the 10th of August has placed us. The whole community is now divided between royalists and republicans: the first numerous, and the latter few. We are placed between two fires, and exposed to the arms of the enemy without, and the machinations of that within. It is an undoubted fact, that an assembly of royalists secretly meet, and correspond with the Prussian army. It is impossible to point out their place of rendezvous, or designate the persons who compose this assembly; but if we would disconcert their projects, and cut off their correspondence with the enemy, we must have recourse to measures of severity; we must, I repeat it, we must make the royalists afraid of us."

These expressions, accompanied by a gesture of marked ferocity, caused a shudder to run through the audience:—"I must repeat it again," resumed Danton, "we must make the royalists fear us. . . . It behoves us, especially in Paris, to maintain our power, and this is not to be effected by exhausting our strength in uncertain conflicts with our foreign foes." The assembly were wrapt in dumb astonishment. Not a single word was added to this address, and every one went his way without precisely comprehending, nay even without daring to discover the nature of the design which the minister meditated.

He immediately hastened to the committee of superintendence of the commune, which possessed sovereign power over the persons of all the citizens, and where Marat was all-powerful, supported by Panis, and Sergent, already distinguished on the 20th of June and 10th of August, and those named Jourdeuil, Duplain, Lefort, and Lenfant, his ignorant and brutal colleagues. There it was, that on the night of the 30th and 31st of August, were designed the most horrible intentions against the poor wretches confined in the prisons. Lamentable and dreadful instances of the exasperation of political passions! Danton, who was always free from personal enmities, and often accessible to emotions of pity, brought his extreme hardness to bear on the atrocious reveries of Marat's imagination; they together formed a conspiracy, of which, indeed, many periods have furnished a parallel, but which, at the end of the eighteenth century, cannot plead in its excuse the ignorance of the times and the ferocity of manners. It will be recollected that, three years before, a person named Maillaud figured at the head of the band of women who marched to Versailles on the famous 5th of October.

This Maillard was a bailiff by occupation; in mind intelligent: in disposition blood-thirsty; and he had collected together a band of ignorant and low-born associates, who were prepared for every desperate undertaking. Such, indeed, as are always to be found in these classes, where education has not purified the passions in diffusing intelligence. He himself was captain of this band; and, if we may credit a discovery which transpired so long a time after the event to which it refers, he was employed by Danton and his party in the execution of the most atrocious cruelties. He was ordered to place himself in a situation best calculated to effect his dire intention; to prepare instruments of death; to take every precaution to stifle the cries of his victims; and to have vinegar, holly-brooms, quick lime, and covered carriages in readiness for all these purposes.

About this time the report of a terrible execution secretly spread through Paris. The relations of those in prison became terrified for their safety. The plot itself, like that of the 10th of August and the 20th of June, could only be vaguely guessed; nevertheless the necessity of some fearful example being made to strike terror into the conspirators, who were said to correspond with the enemy, even from the depth of their dungeons, was every where repented. The dilatory proceedings of the tribunal of the 17th of August excited universal complaints; and a more speedy process of justice was loudly demanded. On the 31st the former minister Montmorin was acquitted by this tribunal. This added still more to the indignation of the people; and they declared that corruption everywhere prevailed, for that the guilty were allowed to escape with impunity. On the same day it was reported that a condemned criminal had made important discoveries; that on that very night the prisoners would break from their chains, seize upon arms, spread through the city, commit every species of outrage, satiate their vengeance by the blood of the patriots, carry off the king, and open the gates of Paris to the Prussians; whilst, at that very moment, the poor victims trembled for their lives, their relations were struck with consternation at the fate that seemed to await them, and the royal family expected nothing but death.

It is certain that among the Jacobins, in the sections, in the council of the commune, and in the minority of the assembly, there were some who believed in these supposed conspiracies, and were not ashamed to declare that the extermination of the prisoners was a lawful measure. It is easier to believe that nature does not create men such monsters in one day, than that the spirit of party alone could blind so many men all at once. This reflection should convey a lesson of deep and melancholy import to the people of every country. Observe the progress of crime! Dangers first arise; they beget a resolution to repel them. This heightens into a passionate frenzy against those by whom we are threatened; and, whilst some inconsiderately call for vengeance, others deliberately perpetrate it with bloodthirsty alacrity.

On Saturday, the 1st of September, the forty-eight hours, fixed for the closing of the barriers and the execution of the domiciliary visits had elapsed, and the public communication no longer prohibited. But, suddenly, in the course of the day, the news of the capture of Verdun arrived. This was not true, for Verdun was only invested, not taken; yet, the belief gained ground that the fortifications were carried, and that it had been surrendered in pursuance of a treasonable act, just the same as at Longwy. On the motion of Danton, it was immediately decreed by the commune, that, on the next day, the 2nd of September, the générale should beat to arms, the tocsin sound, the alarm-guns be fired, and all citizens capable of bearing arms should muster in the Champ de Mars, encamp there for the remainder of the day, and march on the following morning for Verdun. In the midst of these terrible preparations, it was easy to perceive that vengeance against domestic foes was not lost sight of. Those who had any relations in prison made every effort for their enlargement. Manuel, the procurateur-syndic, supplicated by a generous lady, is said to have released two prisoners of the Latrémouille family. Another lady, Madame Frusso-Lendry, was bent upon following her uncle, the Abbé de Rastignac, into captivity; and upon requesting permission to do this, Sergeant replied to her: "Madam, you commit a great imprudence; the prisons are not safe."

On the following day, the 2nd of September, the idleness of the people augmented the general tumult. Companies of military were seen in all parts of the city; and it was reported that the enemy might arrive before Paris within three days. The commune informed the assembly of the steps they had taken to arm the whole body of the citizens; and Vergniaud, fired with patriotic enthusiasm by the impending danger and the courage displayed by the Parisians, pronounced a spirited eulogium on their conduct.

"It appears," said he, "that the plan of the enemy is to march direct upon Paris, leaving all the strong places in their route behind them. This design will surely be our safety and their ruin. Our armies, although too weak to stop their march, are strong enough to harass them in the rear. Thus, upon arriving at Paris, they will find an army of citizens ranged before them, and of soldiers behind them. Surrounded on every side, they must sink, overcome by such united forces, and the spot of their anticipated triumph will become the sepulchre of their hopes and themselves together. Yet, in the midst of these flattering prospects, there is a danger to be apprehended which we must not hide from ourselves; and which we must anticipate that we may guard against. I mean, a sudden panic. Our enemies calculate upon this, and spare no trouble or gold to infuse it among us; and you know there are men of so dastardly a nature as to conceive terrors on the slightest appearance of danger. I wish, indeed, we could separate these pusillanimous automatons from the remainder of the citizens, and send them to Longwy, that city of cowards, and refuge of dastards, that they might no longer infest us with their fearful forebodings, magnify dwarfs into giants, and fancy the dust raised by a few *uhlans to be a cloud in which an army is enveloped.

"Parisians! now is the time to display the energy of your character! Why are the entrenchments of the camp in such a state of backwardness? By what means was the altar of the federation raised? or the Champ de Mars levelled? You have manifested a great zeal for fêtes, doubtless you will display an equally ardent one for battles. You have celebrated liberty in your songs; you must now defend it with your swords. You are no longer summoned to overturn kings of brass, but real and living kings, armed with all their power. I call, therefore, upon the national assembly to give the first example of energy, and to send twelve of its members, not to exhort the people, but to work themselves with shovels and pickaxes."

This proposition was adopted with the greatest enthusiasm. Danton rose after Vergniaud. He first took notice of the measures which had been already adopted, and then proposed new ones. "One part of the people," said he, "are about to move towards the frontiers; another to be employed in digging entrenchments; and a third armed with pikes will defend the interior of our cities. But this is not enough; messengers and couriers must be sent to all parts of France to stir up the inhabitants to imitate the example of Paris; and a decree must be passed obliging every citizen, either to serve in person, or deliver up his arms."—He afterwards added, "The cannon you are about to hear is not the cannon of alarm, but the signal for charging the enemies of your country. To conquer and annihilate them, only one thing is necessary—BOLDNESS: this should pervade all your measures; and be the beginning, middle, and end, of every thing you undertake."

The expressions and gestures of the minister produced a powerful effect on his hearers. His motion was adopted, and he left the assembly to attend the committee of surveillance. All the authorities, and every administrative body, the assembly, the commune, the sections, and the Jacobins, were at the present moment sitting. The ministers assembled at the Hotel of the Marine Department only waited for Danton, to hold their council. The whole city was on tiptoe. Extreme terror prevailed in the prisons. The royal family, to whom every noise seemed to convey a threat, anxiously inquired the cause of so much agitation. The gaolers of the several prisons appeared struck with consternation. The keeper of the Abbaye sent away his wife and children in the morning. Dinner was served to the prisoners two hours before the accustomed time; and the knives were taken from their plates. Alarmed at these circumstances, the victims demanded the cause with importunity, but could obtain no answer. At two o'clock the général beat to arms; the tocsin sounded, and the alarm can non resounded through the precincts of the capital. Crowds of citizens met at the Champ de Mars; others surrounded the commune and the assembly; and all the public places were, in like manner, thronged to excess.

There were at the Hotel de Ville twenty-four nonjuring priests, who, taken into custody by reason of their refusal to take the oath, were to be removed from the prison-room to the prisons of the Abbaye. Whether by intention, or whether by chance, this was the time chosen for their being conveyed from one place of custody to the other. They were removed in six hackney coaches, escorted by the Breton federalists and Marseillais, and conducted at a slow pace towards the faubourg St. Germain, along the quays, the Pont Neuf and the rue Dauphine. The rabble surrounded the carriages, and heaped upon them every species of insult. The federalists pointed them out: "Behold," said they, "the conspirators who had designed to murder us, our wives, and children, whilst we were on the frontiers." These words heightened the indignation of the multitude. The doors of the coaches were opened, and the unfortunate priests within endeavoured to shut them to shelter themselves from the outrages which assailed them, but the attempt was ineffectual, and they were forced to sit patiently under the assaults of the infuriated populace. They at last arrived at the court of the Abbaye. An immense crowd had collected there to meet them. This court led to the prisons, and communicated with the hall where the committee of the section of the *Four Nations held their sittings. The first carriage drew up before the door of the committee, and was immediately surrounded by a throng of furious looking men. Maillard was already there. The coach-door being opened, the priest nearest to it descended, and was making his way towards the committee, when he fell covered with a thousand wounds. The second endeavoured to draw back, but was dragged out by force, and suffered the fate of the former. The two others shared the same fate, and their murderers then abandoned the first carriage, and betook themselves to those which followed. These entered, one after another, the fatal court, and the last of the eighty priests was butchered amidst the savage acclamations of the furious rabble†.

At this very moment, Billaud-Varrennes, a member of the council of the commune, arrived on the spot. Of all those concerned in those frightful massacres, he alone dared constantly to approve of them, and appear personally active in their perpetration. He now came forward, wearing his scarf of office, walked in the blood, and trampled on the bodies of the murdered priests, addressing at the same time the butcher throng about him: "People," said he, "you sacrifice your enemies, you do your duty." The voice of Maillard was immediately after heard above the crowd: "There is nothing more to be done here," cried he, "let us go to the church of the Carmelites." His gang immediately follow him, and they simultaneously rush to the church of the Carmelites, where two hundred priests were confined. They broke into the church, and butchered the unhappy priests, who ejaculated a prayer to heaven and embraced one another, on seeing death so near. The archbishop of Arles was first sought out, with loud cries, and, being soon discovered, was despatched by a sabre-cut over the neck. After having employed their sabres, they next used their fire-arms, and general discharges of musquetry quickly strewed the church with the bodies of the dead; some also fell in the garden, others in attempting to climb over the walls, and some in the trees, where they had endeavoured to conceal themselves.

Whilst this massacre was being committed at the church of the Carmelites, Maillard, with a party of his band, returned to the Abbaye. He presented himself at the committee of section of the Four Nations, covered with perspiration and blood, and demanded "wine for his brave comrades, who had delivered the nation from its enemies." The committee, themselves trembling, granted him twenty-four pints.

This was served out upon tables in the court, in the midst of the mangled bodies of those slain in the afternoon. They drank, when suddenly Maillard pointing to the prison, cried out, "à l'Abbaye," (to the Abbey.) He then led the way, and was followed by his gang, who assaulted the gate of the prison with violence. The poor wretches within hear the din, a signal for their death. The doors burst open. The first prisoners who are laid hold of are dragged out by the feet, and thrown bleeding into the court. While they massacred without distinction those who first came to their hands, Maillard and some of his trusty comrades demanded the prison papers, and the keys of the several prisons. One of the gaolers, advancing towards the wicket of the door, mounted on a stool, addressed the multitude: "My friends," said he, "I see you are bent upon the destruction of the aristocrats, the enemies of the people, who would have butchered your wives and children while you were on the frontier. In this you are undoubtedly right; but you are good citizens, you love justice, and would be shocked to dip your hands in innocent blood." "Yes, yes," cried out the executioners. "Well, then," resumed the gaoler, "do you not expose yourself to the danger of confounding the innocent with the guilty, when you rush like tigers upon your prey, making no distinction, and listening to no appeals." Here he was interrupted by one of the gang, who, flourishing his sabre, exclaimed: "Would you have us go to sleep? If the Prussians and Austrians were at Paris, would they distinguish between guilt and innocence? I have a wife and children, whom I will not leave in danger. If you think fit, give the scoundrels arms, and we will engage an equal number of them, but before we go, Paris must be purified." "Right, right," exclaimed many voices, and a push was made forward; nevertheless, they were at last prevailed on to desist, and consent to a species of trial. The gaol book was then given up, and it was decided that one of them should be appointed president, to read the names and the cause of every prisoner's detention, and that immediate sentence should be passed on all the culprits. "Maillard, Maillard, for president," screamed several voices, and he immediately enters upon his office. This horrible president seats himself at a table, places the gaol book before him, is surrounded by a few of his gang chosen at random to assist him by their advice, gets some of the prison officers to bring in the prisoners, and leaves it to others at the gate to complete the work of massacre. To spare the recital of these horrors, it was arranged that these words should be uttered: "Monsieur à la Force," (to the prison of La Force), and then, thrust through the wicket, the prisoner should be exposed to the sabres which awaited him.

The first who were brought before this dreadful tribunal were the Swiss soldiers imprisoned in the Abbaye, whose officers had been removed to the Conciergerie. "It was you," said Maillard, "who assassinated the people on the 10th of August." "But we were attacked," replied the unfortunates, "and obeyed our commanders." "For the matter of that," resumed Maillard, coldly, "all that's to be done, is to send you to the Force," (à la Force.) The wretched victims could not mistake the dire import of these words, for they perceived the menacing sabres on the other side of the wicket; they hung back, and crowded behind one another in fearful recoil, till one, more bold than the rest, asked, "Whither he must pass." The door was opened to him; and, stooping his head, he rushed with hopeless desperation into the midst of sabres and pikes. The rest dashed after him, and shared his fate.

The executioners return to the prison, cram all the females together in one room, the other prisoners are brought forward. Some prisoners accused of forging assignats next suffered. After them, the celebrated Montmorin, whose acquittal had caused so much discontent, but which had not gained him his freedom, was led out. Being presented to the blood-stained president, he declared that he had been tried by the regular tribunal, and could acknowledge no other. "Be it so," replied Maillard; "you will therefore go to the Force to await a different sentence." The ex-minister, who understood not this language, asked for a carriage. He was answered he would find one at the door. He then demanded permission to take with him a few necessaries, but, receiving no answer, he advanced towards the wicket, and there met his death.

After him, Thierry, the valet-de-chambre of the king, was led forward. "Like master, like man," exclaimed Maillard, and he was instantly assassinated. Next come the justices of peace, Buch and Bocquillon, accused of having been members of a secret committee held at the Tuileries, this was sufficient for their being butchered. The night was now fast approaching, and the prisoners, on hearing the howlings of the assassins, felt that they had but a few moments to live.

But what were the constituted authorities, the assembled committees, and citizens of Paris, doing all this time? Tranquillity and tumult, security and terror, could simultaneously prevail in that immense capital, so far distant is one part of the capital from the other. It was not till very late that the assembly heard of the fatal transactions at the prisons; and then, struck with horror at their recital, they despatched some of their deputies to appease the people and save the victims from their fury. The commune also sent messengers to set free all the debtors; to separate, as they termed it, the innocent from the guilty. But the Jacobins, although then sitting, and acquainted with all that was passing, preserved a determined silence. The ministers, assembled at the office of the Marine, were not yet informed of the scenes which were transacting, and awaited the presence of Danton, who was at the committee of surveillance. He declared to the commune that the commandant-general Santerro had given orders which were not obeyed, and that nearly all his men were occupied in guarding the barriers. It is certain, that secret and contradictory orders were issued, and there was every appearance of the existence of a clandestine authority opposed to those publicly established. At the Court of the Abbey, a post of the national guard, the soldiers were permitted to give free admission to all, but to allow none to repass. At all the other posts, the guards waited for, but received no orders. How is this to be accounted for? Had Santerro suddenly lost his reason, as on the 10th of August, or was he engaged in the conspiracy? While the commissioners publicly sent by the commune had been advising how to quiet and check the people, other members of the same commune presented themselves at the committee of the Four Nations, who continued their sittings amidst the carnage which surrounded them, and discovered the nature of their message in their first salutation: "Does all go on as well here as at the church of the Carmolites? the commune has sent us to offer our aid if you have need of it."

The commissaries sent by the assembly and the commune were utterly unable to put a stop to the murders. There was to be seen an immense crowd, who had collected round the prison, and assisted at this dismal scene by cries of "Long live the Nation!" The aged Dusaulx, mounted on a chair, attempted to proclaim forbearance; but his voice could not be heard. Basire, with more skill, pretended to partake of the indignation of the multitude; but the moment he spoke of mercy, he could obtain no hearing. Manuel, the procureur of the commune, touched with pity, exposed himself to the greatest dangers to save the wretched victims, but did not succeed in rescuing even one. These fruitless efforts being reported to the commune, they appeared rather more touched with pity than at first, and sent a new deputation to calm the excitement of the people, and enlighten them as to their true interests. This deputation proved as powerless as the first, and merely succeeded in delivering a few women and debtors.

This frightful massacre lasted the whole of this terrible night. The executioners and judges alternately exchanged their situations. Wine stimulated their thirst for blood, and the goblets out of which they drank were marked with the prints of their blood-dropping fingers. Yet, in the midst of this carnage, some victims were spared, and their lives were granted to them with every frantic demonstration of drunken joy. One young man, who was claimed by one of the sections, and declared free from aristocracy, was acquitted in the midst of acclamations of "Long live the Nation!" and carried in triumph in the blood-stained arms of the executioners. The venerable Sombrouil, governor of the Invalides, was afterwards led forth, and condemned to be taken to the Force. His daughter, from the middle of the prison, hears his fate pronounced, and, springing forward, darts into the midst of the pikes and sabres, clings round her father, and implores mercy from the murderers in such an heart-piercing accent, and such torrents of tears, that their fury is for a moment suspended. To put her sensibility to a new proof, they offer her a goblet full of blood. "Drink," said they to this self-devoted daughter, "drink the blood of the aristocrats!" She drinks, and her father is saved. The daughter of Cazotte also, by twining herself about him, and by the most heart-rending supplications, succeeded in rescuing her parent; but she is still more happy, and has obtained his safety without undergoing such a horrible test of her affection. These scenes cause tears to stream from the eyes of the assassins, and yet they return immediately to demand fresh victims. One of those who had displayed this sensibility, instantly resumes his dreadful office of leading out the prisoners to death; he learns that the unfortunates whom he has just been slaughtering have not had water for the last twenty-two hours, and now he wants to kill the gaoler. Another interests himself in a prisoner whom he is leading to the wicket, because he heard him speak the language of his country. "Why are you here?" says he to M. Journiac de Saint Méard. "If you are not a traitor, the president, who is no fool, will do you justice. Do not tremble, but answer me." He was presented to Maillard, who, looking over the register—"Ah," said he, "M. Journiac, you are he who wrote in the journal of the court and the city." "No," replied the prisoner, "it is a calumny; I never wrote in it." "Take care," replied Maillard, "falseness is punished here with death. Did you not recently absent yourself to join the army of the emigrants?" "This is another calumny," replied he, "I have a certificate attesting that I have been for the last twenty-three months in Paris." "Whose certificate is it? Is the signature authentic?" Happily for M. de Journiac, a person was present to whom the subscriber of the certificate was personally known. The signature was, therefore, declared worthy of credit. "You see, then," resumed M. Journiac, "that I have been calumniated." "If the calumniator was here," replied Maillard, "he should receive terrible justice. But answer me; were you imprisoned here for nothing?" "No," answered M. de Journiac, "I was known for an aristocrat." "Aristocrat?" "Yes, aristocrat; but you are not here to judge of opinions, but actions; mine are blameless; I have never conspired; my soldiers, in the regiment which I command, are devoted to me, and, when at Nancy, urged me to seize on Malsigne." Struck with such courage, his judges fixed their eyes on him with astonishment, and Maillard gave the signal of pardon. Immediately the cries of "Live the Nation!" resounded from all parts. All hastened to embrace him; and two of the bystanders, inclosing him in their arms, led him safe and sound through the hedge of swords and pikes which a few minutes before menaced his life. M. de Journiac offered them money, but they refused it, and only asked permission to embrace him. Another prisoner, saved in the same manner, was conducted to his house with similar enthusiasm. The executioners, all covered with blood, begged to be permitted to witness the joy of his family, and immediately after returned to the carnage. In such a state of overwrought excitement, the mind is keenly alive to all the emotions and instincts of its nature; they succeed each other rapidly and convulsively, alternately melting and firing the soul, and hurrying those who have resigned themselves to their unrestrained away from one extreme to the other with wild caprice; the passions which seemed one moment quenched in tears, rise the next in flame; the whole man is subject to delirious changes, and he weeps and assassinates with the same heartfelt sincerity in the short space of a few minutes. Whilst wading in blood, he is arrested by admiration of courage or devotion; he is sensible of the honour of appearing just, and vain of the semblance of disinterestedness. The events of the deplorable period which we are now narrating afford many instances of these striking contrarieties; and among this number must be recorded the circumstance of the robbers and murderers of this night depositing the blood-stained trinkets found on some of the prisoners, with the committee of the Abbey.

During this night of horrors, a gang of wretches detached themselves, and committed their deeds of blood in the other prisons of Paris. At the Châtelet, at the Force, the Conciergerie, the Bernardins, at Saint-Firmin, at the Salpêtrière, and the Bicêtre prisons, similar massacres had been perpetrated, and streams of blood flowed there, as at the Abbey. When the morning of Monday the 3rd of September dawned upon the havoc of this frightful night, the spectacle it presented to the broad glare of day was as sickening as it was horrifying. Billaud-Varrennes repaired early to the Abbey, where the evening before he had encouraged the workmen, as he termed them. He now again addressed them. "My friends," said he, "in slaughtering these wretches, you have saved your country. France owes you an eternal debt of gratitude, and the municipality is at a loss how to acknowledge your merit. It, however, offers you twenty-four livres a-piece, and you will be paid immediately." Those words excited shouts of applause, and those to whom they were addressed followed Billaud-Varrennes into the committee, to receive the payment which he had promised them. But here a difficulty arose. "Where shall we find the funds," said the president to Billaud, "to pay this debt?" Billaud replied by again eulogizing the massacres, and declared that the minister of the interior ought to have money to be expressly devoted to this purpose. The crowd then immediately hastened to the house of Roland, who had just been informed of the crimes of the preceding night; but he sent them back with indignation, and refused to listen to their demands. The assassins, thus disappointed, returned to the committee, and threatened its members with instant death if they were not immediately paid the wages of their dreadful deeds; every one, therefore, was obliged to empty his pocket, to satisfy them. The commune afterwards repaid these contributors; and their disbursement-book is still to be seen, wherein allusion is made to the payment of the executioners of September. In particular, it appears by these accounts, that 1463 francs were paid to the executioners at the date of the 4th of September.

The recital of these horrors quickly spread through all the quarters of Paris, and produced an universal disgust. The Jacobins still continued to preserve a profound silence; the commune appeared slightly touched with pity, but declared that the people had justice on their side, that none but the guilty had fallen; and that their vengeance had done no more than anticipate the sword of justice. The general council despatched new messengers to calm the ferment, and bring them back to those principles from which they had wandered. Such was the language of the public authorities; and, indeed, everywhere the massacre of the prisoners was partly excused:—"If," said those most influenced by feelings of justice and pity, "if they had been permitted to live, we ourselves should have fallen their victims in a few days." Others palliated the horrors of the carnage by anticipating the victory of the Prussians. "If," said they, "we are conquered and massacred by the Prussians, they have fallen before us." Such are the terrible consequences of the fear which party-spirit infuses, and of the hatred which that fear engenders.

The assembly appeared deeply affected with grief at the disastrous disorganization which on every side surrounded them. They passed decrees after decrees, demanding of the commune an account of the state of Paris, and the commune replied that they had made every exertion to re-establish order and the authority of the laws. Yet this assembly, composed almost entirely of those Girondists who discovered so much courage in prosecuting the September murderers, and braved and welcomed death rather than renounce this prosecution, never conceived the idea of taking themselves, as a body, from their seats to the prisons on the night of the carnage, and interposing themselves between the murderers and their victims. If such a generous idea did not tear them from their benches and lead them to the scene of carnage it must be attributed to the stupor of astonishment, a feeling of their own impotency, or, perhaps, to the weak and insufficient devotion which the danger of an enemy inspires; and, finally, to the unfortunate opinion which prevailed with some of the deputies, that the victims were conspirators, at whose hands that death which they suffered would otherwise have been received.

One man, in the midst of these perils, exerted himself with great energy against the assassins. On the second day of their three days' reign, he protested boldly against them. On the Monday morning, the instant he heard of the crimes of the preceding night, he wrote to the mayor Pétion, who was yet ignorant of them, to Santerre, who still continued inactive, urging them both to exert themselves; and, at the same time, addressed a letter to the assembly, which was received with the greatest applause. This worthy man, who has been so undeservedly calumniated by several parties, was Roland. In his letter, he protested against every species of disorder, against the usurpations of the commune, the fury of the people, and added that he was ready to die at the post which the law had assigned him. Yet, if we would form an idea of the state of the public mind, of the animosity which raged against those who were called traitors, and the management which was necessary to address the frantic passions of the people, we may do so by reading the following passage. Certainly, the courage of the writer, who alone publicly affixed the responsibility of all the massacres on the constituted authorities of the nation, cannot be doubted; yet observe the guarded way in which he was compelled to express himself in this respect:

"Over the events of yesterday, perhaps, it would be better to throw a veil ; I know that the people, terrible in their vengeance, are yet influenced in it by some sort of justice ; they do not seize indiscriminately upon all who present themselves to their fury, but point their wrath against those whom the sword of the law has too long spared, and whose death the peril of the moment seems to call for without delay. But I know also how easy it is for traitors and ill-disposed persons to abuse and mislead this indignation, which should be checked and not encouraged. We owe to all France the declaration that the executive power neither foresaw nor could prevent the late excesses. The constituted authorities are bound by every obligation of duty to put an end to them, or they must consider their own power annihilated. I know that this declaration of my sentiments will expose me to the rage of some agitators. Well, let them take my life. I wish only to preserve it for the defence of liberty and equality ; if these are violated or destroyed, either by the reign of foreign despots or the excesses of an abused people, I shall have lived long enough ; but until my latest breath I will do my duty. This is the sole object of my ambition, and no power on earth can deprive me of it."

The assembly read this letter with great applause ; and, on the motion of Lamourette, demanded of the commune an account of the state of Paris. The commune replied again that tranquillity was restored ; and, being enraged at the courage displayed by the minister of the interior, Marat and his committee became angry, and had the audacity to issue an order of arrest against him. So blind was their fury, that they dared attack a man still enjoying all his popularity. Danton, whom he heard of this, expressed himself strongly against those members of the committee whom he called the enragés (madmen). Although opposed daily by the inflexibility of Roland, he was far from disliking him ; and, besides, in the terrible system of politics, he was afraid of taking any useless step, and thought it quite extravagant to seize, in the midst of his official duties, the first minister of state. He immediately, therefore, hastened to the office of the marine, and then to the committee, where he expressed himself very indignantly against Marat. But he was quickly reconciled to him ; and the order of arrest was put into his hands, which he immediately shewed to Pétion ; and, relating to him what he had done, "See," said he to the mayor, "what these madmen are capable of : but I know how to bring them to reason." "You have been to blame," replied Pétion, coldly ; "this act could only have ruined its authors."

On his part, Pétion, though less ardent, did not demonstrate less courage than Roland. He wrote to Santerre, who, with real weakness or duplicity, replied that his heart was convulsed with grief, but that he could not get his orders executed. He then went personally to the several theatres of carnage. At the Force, he pulled out of their blood-stained seats two municipal officers, who, in their scarfs of office, exercised the same functions Maillard had exercised at the Abbey ; but scarcely had he quitted this place to visit others, when these same officers returned, and continued their executions. Pétion, every where powerless, returned to Roland, who had received so deep an impression of the horrors which were transacted as to make him ill. Of all the prisons, the Temple alone was preserved inviolate, although the charge it contained greatly excited the popular fury. The mode of defence adopted here by the military was very dexterous. A tri-coloured ribbon was stretched between the walls and the populace, and this kept off the mob, and saved the royal family.

The monsters, who had continued to spill blood since the preceding Sunday, became only more and more excited with their horrible task, and had contracted a disposition for murder, which they could not restrain. They even established a species of regularity in their executions, suspending them to carry away the dead and take their meals. The very women visited the prisons to bring their dinner to their husbands, who, they used to say, had business to do at the Abbaye.

At the Force, Bicêtre and Abbaye, the massacres were of longer continuance than at the other prisons. It was at the Force that the unfortunate princess de Lamballe, so celebrated at the court for her beauty, and her intimacy with the queen, was confined. She was conducted, half dead, to the terrible wicket. "Who are you ?" asked the executioners. "Louise of Savoy, princess of Lamballe." "What was your station at the court? Do you know any thing of the plots of the palace?" "I have never known of any plots." "Swear, then, to love liberty and equality; swear to hate the king, the queen, and royalty." "I will take the first oath, but I cannot the second; it is not in my heart."

"Swear, then," said one of the assassins, who wished to save her; but the unfortunate princess no longer possessed any presence of mind; she neither heard nor understood anything. "Let madam go at large," said the chief of the wicket; for here, as at the Abbaye, a word had been fixed on as a signal for death. The unhappy lady was then led out, not with the intention, say some narrators, to put her to death, but to set her free. Nevertheless, she was received at the door by furies thirsting for blood. The first sabre stroke fell on the back of her head, and the blood spurted forth; yet she still advanced, supported by two men, who were perhaps willing to save her; but she had scarcely proceeded a few steps further when she sunk under a second blow; her beauteous form was torn to pieces, the murderers outraged, mutilated, and divided it in pieces among themselves. Her head, her heart, and other portions of her dead body, were carried on the point of a pike about Paris. "We must," said these men, with their abominable language, "take these to the foot of the throne." Upon which they hastened immediately to the Temple, and awakened the unfortunate prisoners by their outcries, who demanded with terror the occasion of the disturbance. The municipal officers endeavoured to prevent their seeing the furious crowd assembled under their windows, and the bloody head raised on the top of a pike. At last one of the national guard said to the queen, "It is the head of the Princess Lamballe which we wish to prevent your seeing." On this intelligence the queen fainted away. Madame Elizabeth, the king, and the valet-de-chambre, Clerj, carried her out of the room; while the shouts of the ferocious gang yet resounded through the precincts of the Temple.

The day of the 3rd, and the night of the 3rd and 4th, continued to be stained with these massacres. At the Bicêtre especially, the carnage was more protracted and terrible than anywhere else. There were some thousand prisoners confined there for different crimes. When they were attacked, they defended themselves, and cannon was obliged to be employed to subdue them. One member of the general council of the commune had even the audacity to demand a force to reduce the prisoners, who defended themselves, but his request was not attended to. Pétion again visited the Bicêtre, but found his interference quite vain. A thirst for blood animated the murderous multitude. A rage for combat and carnage had succeeded to their political fanaticism, and they now murdered their victims from a love of murder itself. The massacre lasted until Wednesday, the 5th of September.

Nearly all the marked victims had now perished, the prisons were empty, yet the assassins called out for more blood; but the dark devisers of so many murders seemed to show themselves accessible to some touch of pity; the expressions of the commune began to soften. Profoundly grieved, as they said they were, by the rigours exercised against the prisoners, they issued new orders to put a stop to them, and this time they were better obeyed. But there were hardly any prisoners left whom their pity could serve. The calculation of the number of victims differs in every report of the time. This calculation varies from six to twelve thousand, who fell in the prisons of Paris*.

But if these massacres spread the uttermost amazement, the hardihood which was demonstrated by their open avowal and recommendation of them, as an example to imitate, was not less the subject of astonishment. The committee of surveillance was shameless enough to send a circular to all the communes of France, which history should preserve, with the seven signatures attached thereto. The following is the composition now consigned to posterity as a record of infamy:—

Paris, September 2nd, 1792.

"Brothers and Friends.—A dreadful plot laid by the court, to destroy all the patriots of the French empire, a plot in which a great number of the members of the national assembly are compromised, having been prepared on the 9th of last month, the commune of Paris have been driven by cruel necessity to have recourse to the power of the people, and have neglected nothing to merit the approbation of their country. After the testimonies which the assembly itself has given in their favour, who could have thought that at the moment when new plots were preparing in silence, and ready to burst out, it would hasten to strip them of all power, as a reward for their ardent patriotism, and in forgetfulness of its own declaration, that they had saved the country? But being informed of these conspiracies, the people, by the clamorous expression of their fears, have made the assembly feel the urgent necessity of uniting themselves more closely with the nation, and restoring to the commune the power with which it had been previously invested.

"Proud of enjoying all the plenitude of the national confidence, which it is determined to merit more and more, placed in the very midst of all conspiracies, and resolved to die for the public safety, the commune will not glory in having done its duty till it has obtained your approbation, which is the object of its desires, and of which it cannot be certain till after all the departments have sanctioned its measures for the public safety; and professing principles of the most perfect equality, having no other ambition than that of placing itself first in the breach, it will always be ready to bring itself to the level of the least numerous commune in the empire, till there shall be nothing left to fear.

"Being aware that Barbarian hordes are advancing against them, the commune of Paris hasten to inform their brothers in all the departments, that a party of ferocious conspirators, confined in the prisons, have been put to death by the people; acts of justice which appeared indispensable to strike terror into the legions of traitors enclosed within the walls of the city, at the moment when all the citizens are about to march against the enemy; and, without doubt, the nation, after the long succession of treasons, which has brought her to the brink of destruction, will hasten to adopt this measure, so useful and necessary; and all, perchance, will say with the Parisians: When we march against the enemy, we will not leave behind us assassins to cut the throats of our wives and children."

CHAPTER VII.

CAMPAIGN OF THE ARGONNE—MILITARY PLANS OF DUMOURIEZ—CAPTURE OF THE CAMP OF GRAND-PRE BY THE PRUSSIANS—VICTORY AT VALMY—RETREAT OF THE ALLIES; REASONS ASSIGNED FOR THIS RETREAT.

THE perusal of this document can impart some idea to what a degree of fanaticism the approach of dangers had excited the mind of the people. But it is now time we should turn our eyes to the theatre of war, where we meet with nought but glorious associations. The council of war held by Dumouriez at Sedan has already been mentioned. Dillon had there given his opinion that the army should retire to Chalons, so as to have the Marne in our front, and defend its passage. The disorganized state of the twenty-three thousand men left under the command of Dumouriez, their perfect incapacity to resist eighty thousand Prussians, disciplined and accustomed to war, and the project of a rapid invasion without stopping before the fortified places, the design attributed to the enemy, were the reasons which induced Dillon to believe that the march of the Prussians could not be arrested, and that he must necessarily retreat before them, and take up such strong positions as might compensate for the weakness and bad condition of the army. The council was so struck with these reasons, that they unanimously adopted his opinion; and Dumouriez, on whom the final decision, as commander-in-chief, depended, replied that he would consider of the subject.

On the evening of the 28th of August, a resolution was taken which saved France. Many have contended for the honour of its authorship, but every thing tends to prove that it belongs to Dumouriez; be this as it may, the execution of it made it his own, and merits for him all the praise of the discovery. France, as every one knows, is defended on the east by the Rhine and the Vosges; on the north by a range of strong places devised by the genius of Vauban, and by the Moselle, the Moselle, and various other streams, which, together with the fortified towns, compose an aggregate of obstacles sufficient for the protection of this frontier. The enemy had entered France by the north, and pursued their march between Sedan and Metz, leaving the attack of the strong places of the Low Countries to the Duke of Saxe-Freschen, and covering, by one of their corps, Metz and Lorraine. To follow up this plan of invasion, they should have advanced rapidly, turned the disorganization of the French army to their own advantage, have alarmed them by decisive attacks, and, finally, cut off Lafayette's twenty-three thousand men, before a new general had united and re-animated them with confidence. But the conflict between the presumption of the King of Prussia, and the prudence of the Duke of Brunswick, was fatal to the execution of every resolution, and suspended the allied armies in a neutral indecision between boldness and prudence. The capture of Verdun still heightened the vanity of Frederick William and the ardour of the emigrants, but communicated no activity to the duke, who still continued to disapprove of an invasion with the resources he possessed, and the dispositions of the country to be invaded. After the taking of Verdun on the 2nd of September, the allied army remained several days on the plains which border the Moselle, confined themselves to the occupation of Stenay, and made not a single step in advance. Dumouriez was at this time at Sedan, with his army encamped in the environs.

The forest of Argonne, a name for ever famous in our history, extends from Sedan to Passavant. This covers a space from about thirteen to fifteen leagues; and from the inequalities of its ground, and the varied distribution of its woods and water-courses, is altogether impenetrable to an army, except in a few principal passes. Through this forest the enemy might have passed to Chalons, and thence proceeded in their route to Paris. With this intention, it is astonishing they had not before occupied all the passes, and anticipated Dumouriez, who was distant from them the whole length of the forest. The evening after the sitting of the council of war, the French general and Thouvenot, an officer, in whose talents he placed the greatest confidence, attentively observed the map of the country, and pointing with his finger to Argonne, and the woods which traverse it, "These," said Dumouriez, "are the Thermopylae of France, and if I can be there before the Prussians all is safe."

This was enough to fire the genius of Thouvenot, and they both immediately set to work to consider the details of their plan. Its advantages were immense; for, besides avoiding a retreat, and the last resource in their power, the defence of the Marne, the progress of the enemy would be at least delayed, the time so opportune for their success lost, and themselves obliged to remain in Champagne, a miserable, uncultivated, swampy, and barren country, incapable of provisioning an army, and unlike the Three Bishoprics (Les Trois Evêchés), a rich and fertile soil, which they would have occupied in case of the retreat to Chalons, and wintered in most plentifully, even supposing they had not forced the Marne. By this disposition, also, if the enemy, having lost some time before the forest, should return towards Sedan, the strong places of the Low Countries, which they could not be supposed able to reduce, obstructed their progress; or should they direct their march towards the other extremity of the forest, Metz and the army of the centre would be ready to receive them. In this possible dilemma, the army of Dumouriez, joining that of Kellermann, and forming a mass of fifty thousand strong, supported by Metz and several places of strength, might take up the offensive, and pursue the enemy with advantage. In any case, their project of marching to Paris would be frustrated, and the campaign lost, for it was already September, and time to enter into winter quarters. This project was certainly well devised, but its execution was by no means certain. The Prussians were encamped along the side of the forest, whilst Dumouriez was at one of its extremities. Thus the success of this grand scheme and the safety of France depended upon a chance, or rather an oversight in the enemy.

Argonne is crossed by five defiles; that of the Chêne-Populeux, the Croix-aux-Bois, Grand-Pré, the Chalade, and the Islettes. Of these, Grand-Pré and the Islettes were the most important, and, unfortunately, the farthest distant from Sedan, and the nearest to the enemy. Nevertheless, Dumouriez was determined to occupy them with his whole force. But he first ordered General Dubouquet to quit the department of the north, and take possession of the passage of the Chêne-Populeux, which was very important, but near Sedan, and consequently not demanding so hasty an occupation as the others. Two routes offered themselves to Dumouriez in his march to Grand-Pré and the Islettes, the one behind the forest, the other before it, in front of the enemy. The first was the safest, but longest; but it discovered our intentions to the enemy, and afforded him time to frustrate them. The second was the shorter, but that also betrayed our design, and exposed our march to the attacks of a formidable army. It was necessary, in fact, to advance along the woods, and pass before Ste-may, where Clerfait and the Austrians were stationed. This route was, however, preferred; for Dumouriez imagined that Clerfait, with Austrian prudence, would, on sight of the French, entrench himself in his excellent camp at Brouenne, and thus afford him an opportunity of escaping to Grand-Pré and the Islettes.

On the 30th [August], Dillon was put in motion, and with eight thousand men marched to Stenay, between the Meuse and Argonne. He there found Clerfait, who occupied the two banks of the river, with twenty-five thousand Austrians. General Miaczinsky attacked his advanced posts with fifteen hundred men, whilst Dillon supported him with the whole of his division. A brisk fire was for some time kept up; but Clerfait immediately re-passing the Meuse, betook himself to Brouenne, as Dumouriez had happily foreseen. Meantime Dillon boldly pursued his course between the Meuse and the Argonne; Dumouriez followed close after him with fifteen thousand men, who composed his main body, and they both advanced towards the posts assigned them. On the 2nd of September, Dumouriez was at Bessy, not more than one day's march from Grand-Pré, and Dillon arrived on the same day at Pierremont, and boldly proceeded, without stopping, towards the Islettes. Fortunately, General Galbaud, who had been sent to reinforce the garrison of Verdun, arriving too late, had fallen back upon that pass, and thus held it in reserve. Dillon came up on the 4th with his eight thousand men; and, having established himself there, also placed a guard over the Châlade, another passage of secondary importance, which was confided to him. Meantime Dumouriez reached Grand-Pré, found the post vacant, and took possession on the 3rd. Thus on the 3rd and 4th the passes were all occupied by our troops, and the defence of France was much advanced.

This was a bold march, and at least as meritorious as the first idea of occupying the Argonne, for it placed Dumouriez in a situation to resist the invasion; but this was not all; it was necessary now to make the passes impregnable; and, for this purpose, a multitude of positions were requisite, of which the success depended on a variety of chances.

Dillon secured himself in the possession of the Islettes; he cleared the ground, raised intrenchments, and, making the best disposition of his artillery, which was numerous and excellent, constructed batteries, which rendered the passage unapproachable. At the same time he occupied the Châlade, and thus made himself master of the routes which lead to Saint-Menehould, and from thence to Chalons. Dumouriez had established himself at Grand-Pré in a camp which both nature and art rendered formidable. He took up his position on heights ranged in the semicircular form of an amphitheatre. At the foot of these heights were spread extensive plains, through which the Aire took its course, forming a defence in front of the camp. Two bridges were thrown over the river; and two very strong advanced guards were there posted, with instructions, in case of attack, to set fire to them and retire.

After having dislodged these advanced guards, the enemy would then have to cross the river without the assistance of bridges, and under the discharge of all our artillery; and even when they had cleared the river, a lap of meadows would still have to be traversed, exposed to a cross fire from a thousand different directions, and, finally, to storm intrenchments very steep, and almost inaccessible. Assuming that all these obstacles should be surmounted, Dumouriez, retiring along his heights, might descend on the rear of the enemy, cross the Aisne, pass over its two bridges, afterwards destroying them, and still have a river between himself and the Prussians. This camp might be regarded as almost impregnable, and Dumouriez was so secure in its strength, that he could devote himself without anxiety to devising future plans of operation on the large scale of the whole probable theatre of the war.

On the 7th, general Dubouquet occupied with six thousand men the pass of the Chêne-Populeux; that of the Croix-du-Bois, the least important, which was situated between the Chêne-Populeux and Grand-Pré, was the only one that now remained unoccupied; and, by the order of Dumouriez, its roads were broken up, its trees felled, and a colonel with two battalions and two squadrons sent to its defence. Thus stationed in the centre of the forest, in an impregnable camp, the general kept the principal pass with fifteen thousand men, having Dillon on his right, at four leagues' distance, who protected the Islettes and the Châlade with a force of eight thousand men; Dubouquet on his left, with six thousand troops, in guard over the Chêne-Populeux; and in the interval, between this post and Grand-Pré, a colonel and a few companies, who defended the road of the Croix-aux-Bois, which was considered but of secondary importance.

Thus, his whole plan of defence being completed, Dumouriez had leisure to wait for reinforcements, and lost no time in giving orders in consequence. He sent instructions to Beurnonville to quit the frontier of the Low Countries, where the Duke of Saxe-Teschen attempted nothing of importance, and to be at Réthel on the 13th of September with ten thousand men; he fixed upon Châlons as the dépôt for live stock and ammunition, and as a rendezvous for any recruits or reinforcements that might be sent him. In this manner he collected behind him every thing necessary for a resistance; and, at the same time, informed the executive power of his occupation of Argonne:—"Grand-Pré and the Islettes," said he, in his communication, "are our Thermopylæ, but I shall be more successful than Leonidas." He moreover required that some regiments of the army of the Rhine, formerly under the command of Kellermann, should be detached to join the army of the centre; and requested that, since it was evidently the intention of the Prussians to march to Paris, which was proved by their not stopping before Montmedy and Thionville, Kellermann might be ordered to hem them in on the left, and thus take them both in flank and rear during their offensive march. According to these arrangements, if the Prussians, renouncing the attempt to force Argonne, directed their course higher up, Dumouriez would succeed them and meet Kellermann arriving from Metz with the army of the centre; or should they descend towards Sedan, he would again follow them, join Beurnonville with ten thousand men, and await Kellermann on the banks of the Aisne; in both cases, this junction would produce a force sixty thousand strong, capable of taking the field.

The executive neglected nothing to second the skilful plans of Dumouriez. Servan, the minister of war, although in ill health, attended incessantly to the provisioning of the army, the transportation of all necessaries and ammunition, and the assembling of the new levies. From fifteen hundred to two thousand volunteers issued daily from Paris. A military fervour had seized upon all, and the citizens enlisted in crowds into the army. The patriotic societies, the councils of the communes, and the assembly, were continually filled with companies spontaneously levied, who marched immediately to Châlons, the general rendezvous of volunteers. These young soldiers wanted nothing but discipline and the experience of the field of battle; and this a skilful general could easily impart to them.

The Girondists were the personal enemies of Dumouriez, and placed little confidence in him, since he had driven them from the ministry; they had even wished to supersede him in his command by another general, named Grimaud; but perceiving now that the destinies of the country depended upon him, they laid aside all their animosities, and Roland, the best and the most disinterested among them, wrote him an affecting letter, assuring him that all was forgotten, and he desired nothing now but to celebrate his victories.

Dumouriez having vigorously occupied the frontier, made himself the centre of the extensive military movements of the nation. He had fortunately possessed himself of the defiles of the Argoonne, which gave the other armies time to assemble and take their several positions behind him; he brought all the corps to their respective posts, and thus created an imposing force; he obliged Kellermann to receive orders from him, commanded with vigour, and acted with celerity; he inspired his soldiers with courage, by mixing frequently with them, and testifying the confidence he reposed in their conduct, making it his business to encourage them to long for the approaching contest with the enemy.

Things were thus situated on the 10th of September. The Prussians came up successively to all our posts, skirmished before the intrenchments, and were every where repulsed. Dumouriez had established secret communications in the interior of the forest, and despatched unexpected succour to the posts which were attempted, which, in the opinion of the enemy, doubled the real force of our army. On the 11th a general attack was made on Grand-Pré; but the generals, Miranda and Stengel, the former posted at Mortaume, the latter at Saint-Jouvin, repelled every attempt with complete success. At many points the soldiers, confident in their position, and encouraged by the opinion of security evinced by their commander, issued from behind their intrenchments, and received with their bayonets the onset of the enemy. These conflicts gave occupation to the army, which was sometimes destitute of live stock, a want occasioned by the inevitable scarcity of provisions attendant on a sudden service; but the cheerfulness of the general, who faced the same as his men, produced a cheerful resignation; and in spite of symptoms of dysentery which began to appear, the soldiers were sufficiently comfortable in the camp of Grand Pré. The superior officers alone, who doubted the capability of the army to hold out long, and the ministry who entertained the same suspicions, spoke of a retreat behind the Marne, and beset Dumouriez with their advice. In answer to these representations, he wrote energetic letters to the ministers, and imposed silence on his officers, telling them that when he wished for their opinions he would call a council of war.

Great qualities have always some deficiencies. The extreme promptitude of the genius of Dumouriez often demonstrated a want of circumspection; and in the heat of conception, he frequently omitted to calculate the obstacles his designs were likely to encounter. This had already happened to him when he ordered Lafayette to remove from Metz to Givet. Here he committed a capital error, which would have lost him the campaign had he not retrieved it with admirable skill and self-possession. Between the Chêne-Populeux and Grand-Pré was another pass which had been thought of very small importance, and which was only defended by two battalions and two squadrons. Engrossed by the numerous cares of his extensive command, Dumouriez had not personally visited this pass; and besides, having but few men to spare for its defence, he easily suffered himself to be persuaded that two or three companies would be sufficient to guard it. To complete his misfortune, the colonel whom he had placed there, induced him to withdraw a part of his men, and represented to him that, if the roads were broken up, a few volunteers would be amply enough for its protection. Dumouriez allowed himself to be deceived by this colonel, an old soldier, whom he considered worthy of confidence.

All this time, the Duke of Brunswick had examined all our different posts, and, at one time, contemplated marching along the forest towards Sedan, in order to take us at this point. It appeared that, whilst this movement was making, spies revealed the negligence of the French general. The Croix-aux-Bois was attacked by the Austrians and emigrants commanded by the Prince de Ligne. The trees had only just been felled, the roads were not broken up, and the pass was occupied without resistance on the morning of the 13th. As soon as Dumouriez learnt this fatal intelligence, he sent General Chasot, an officer remarkable for his great boldness, with two brigades, six squadrons, and four eight pounders, to repel the Austrians and retake the passage. He ordered him to charge with the bayonet without delay, allowing no time to the enemy to entrench themselves. The 13th and 14th elapsed before General Chasot could execute his orders; but on the 15th he attacked and repelled the Austrians, who retreated from their post with the loss of their commander, the Prince de Ligne. He was, however, again attacked himself two hours after by a very superior force, before he could make any entrenchments, and was entirely dispossessed of the Croix-aux-Bois. In addition to this reverse, he was cut off from Grand-Pré, and not being able to join the principal body of troops, it was considerably weakened by his absence. He retired upon Vouziers. General Dubouquet, who commanded at the Chêne-Populeux, and who had been hitherto successful in retaining his post, seeing himself separated from Grand-Pré, thought it no longer prudent to remain in his position, exposed to be surrounded by the enemy, who, having broken the line to the Croix-aux-Bois, were about to bring their whole army into active operation. He resolved therefore to decamp and retire by Antigny and Somme-Puis upon Châlons. Thus the fruit of so many well-combined positions, and such brilliant hopes, was lost. The forest of Argonne, the only obstacle to the invasion, was free, and the road to Paris open.

The army of Dumouriez, separated from Chasot and Dubouquet, was reduced to fifteen thousand men; and, if the enemy had, debouching rapidly by the Croix-aux-Bois, forced the position of Grand-Pré, and occupied the passages of the Aisne, the French general would have been lost. With forty thousand Prussians in front, and twenty thousand Austrians in his rear, Dumouriez shut up with his fifteen thousand men, and surrounded by sixty-five thousand men, by two rivers and the forest, would have had nothing to do but lay down his arms, or uselessly sacrifice his soldiers; and thus the only army on which France placed any reliance would have been destroyed, and the enemy could have taken their route to Paris without opposition.

In this desperate situation, the general did not lose his courage, but preserved an admirable self-possession. His first care, that same day, was to secure his retreat. He considered that Dillon was on his right, still in possession of the Islettes and the road of Saint Menehould, and that by retiring on his rear, they would present two entrenched fronts to the enemy, the one towards the Islettes, and the other facing Saint Menehould. There they might wait to be joined by the two generals Chasot and Dubouquet, also by Beurnonville, who had been ordered to be at Rethel on the 18th, and finally by Kellermann, who had been already ten days on his march, and could not fail to arrive shortly. This plan was the best, and most adapted to the system of Dumouriez, which consisted in avoiding a retreat into the interior, an open country, maintaining his ground in one full of difficulties, temporising, and putting himself in a position to be joined by his army of the centre. If, on the other hand, he had preferred retiring to Châlons, he would have been pursued as a fugitive, and executed a retreat with disadvantage, which he might have accomplished before with much more credit and utility; and would besides have been effectually cut off from the possibility of being joined by Kellermann. This perseverance in his system, after experiencing such a check as that which he sustained at the Croix-aux-Bois, and in spite of the reiterated advice to retire behind the Marne, which he received from all sides, discovered great firmness and intrepidity. But how many fortunate chances he had yet to encounter in carrying his plan into execution! and how difficult to succeed in a retreat with his small body of troops, whilst so diligently watched by a powerful enemy!

His first measure was to order Beurnonville, already on his march to Rethel, Chasot, from whom he had just received favourable news, and Dubouquet, who had retired to Attigny, to proceed to Saint Menehould. At the same time, he repeated his orders to Kellermann, to continue his march, fearing that otherwise he might again fall back on Metz upon the news of the loss of the defiles. After having made all these dispositions, and received a Prussian officer who demanded a parley, and to whom he showed his camp in the most perfect order, he decamped at midnight, and marched towards the two bridges which were the only passages of escape behind Grand-Pré. Happily for him, the enemy had not yet thought of seizing on the French positions. A cloudy sky concealed his retreat. He marched all the night through bad roads, and the army, which fortunately had not had time to become alarmed, retired without knowing the motive of this change of position. On the next day, the 16th, all his troops had crossed the Aisne; Dumouriez had completed his escape, and halted in battle array on the heights of Autry, four leagues from Grand-Pré. He was not pursued, and therefore thought himself safe, and advanced to Dammartin-sur-Hans, to pitch an encampment for the day, when suddenly some fugitives arrived, crying out that all was lost, that the enemy, having attacked him in the rear, had put the army to the rout. Dumouriez immediately hastened to the rear-guard, where he found Miranda and the old general Duval stopping the fugitives, and restoring order in the ranks, which the Prussian hussars had for a moment surprised and thrown into confusion. The inexperience of these young troops, and the fear of treason which at that time possessed every one, rendered these panics very frequent. Nevertheless order was soon re-established, thanks to the generals Miranda, Duval, and Stengel, who were posted on the rear-guard. The troops bivouacked at Dammartin, hoping shortly to fall back on the Islettes, and terminate successfully this perilous retreat.

Dumouriez had been twenty hours on horseback. He dismounted at six o'clock in the evening, when suddenly the sonner qui peut were again heard, with imprecations against the generals, and especially the commander-in-chief, who had, said the soldiers, purposely fallen into the hands of the enemy. Horses were put to the heavy guns, and the artillery corps attempted to take refuge on a hill. All the troops were in confusion. Dumouriez ordered fires to be lighted, and his men to remain in their position during the night. Ten hours were thus passed in mud and darkness. More than fifteen hundred fugitives escaped across the country to spread through Paris and all France the intelligence, that the army of the north, the last hope of the nation, was lost, and had fallen into the hands of the enemy.

On the next day, order was again restored, and Dumouriez wrote to the national assembly with his usual confidence: "I have been obliged to abandon the camp of Grand-Pré. My retreat was already accomplished when a panic seized the army; ten thousand men fled before fifteen hundred Prussian hussars. The loss we have sustained does not amount to more than fifty men and a small quantity of baggage. Every thing is now repaired, and I will answer for our success." Nothing less than this assurance was necessary to calm Paris and the executive council, who were about again to press the general to pass the Marne.

Saint Menchould, whither Dumouriez was proceeding, is situated on the Aisne, one of the two rivers which surrounded the camp of Grand-Pré. Dumouriez had, therefore, to re-ascend to its source, and before he arrived there, to cross three rather deep streams which fell into it, the Tourbe, the Biemme, and the Auve. Beyond these three streams was the camp he was about to occupy. Before Saint Menchould is a circular ridge of heights extending three quarters of a league. At their base lies a marshy plain, through which the Auve runs, flooding the adjacent grounds before it flows into the Aisne. This marshy plain is bounded on the right by the heights of the Hyron, in front by those of La Lune, and on the left by those of Gisaucourt. In the centre are several lesser elevations. On one of them stands the mill of Valmy, which directly faces La Lune. The high road from Châlons to Saint Menchould crosses this level, nearly parallel to the course of the Auve. It was at Saint Menchould, and above this level, where Dumouriez took up his position. He immediately occupied the most important posts in his neighbourhood, and, together with Dillon, now presented two points to the enemy: he commanded the latter to maintain his ground firmly. Thus he occupied the high road to Paris at three points, the Islettes, Saint Menchould, and Châlons.

Nevertheless the Prussians could, by passing through Grand-Pré, leave him at Saint Menchould, and advance to Châlons. Dumouriez, therefore, ordered Dubouquet, whose fortunate arrival at that town he had learnt, to place himself with his division at the camp of the Epine, assemble all the volunteers there, and, finally, protect Châlons from a sudden attack. He was shortly after joined by Chasot, and at last by Beurnonville. The latter had arrived in sight of Saint Menchould on the 18th, and seeing an army in good order, supposed it was that of the enemy, for he could not believe that Dumouriez, who was reported to have been beaten, had so soon extricated himself from the dilemma he was placed in. Under this impression he fell back on Châlons, and being there informed of the truth, returned and took up his position on the 19th, at Maffrecourt, on the right of the camp. He brought with him the ten thousand men whom Dumouriez had disciplined, during a whole month, in the camp of Maulde. Reinforced by Chasot and Beurnonville, Dumouriez could now muster thirty thousand men. Thus, thanks to his firmness and presence of mind, he was again placed in a strong position, and could still temporize for a long time. But, if the enemy, by a prompt movement, had left him behind and advanced upon Châlons, what would have become of his camp at Saint Menchould? This event was always to be feared, and his precautions at the camp of the Epine were far from sufficient to prevent this danger.

Two adverse movements were slowly at work in his neighbourhood: that of Brunswick, who hesitated in his march, and that of Kellermann, who having left Metz on the 4th, had not yet arrived at the point he should have reached, although he had been fifteen days on his route. But if the dilatoriness of Brunswick served Dumouriez, that of Kellermann had singularly compromised him. Kellermann, prudent and irresolute, although personally very brave, alternately advanced and retreated; and on the 17th, when he heard of the loss of the defiles, he fell back and retreated. Nevertheless, on the evening of the 19th, he sent to inform Dumouriez that he was only two leagues from Saint Menchould. Dumouriez had reserved, as his post, the heights of Gisaucourt, situated on the left, and commanding the road to Châlons, and the stream of the Auve, pointing out to him, that, in the event of a battle, he could range some troops on the lesser hills, and on Valmy beyond the Auve; but not having time himself to post his colleague, Kellermann passing the Auve on the night of the 19th, stationed himself at Valmy, in the centre of the valley, and neglected the heights of Gisaucourt, which formed the left of the camp of Saint Menchould, and commanded those of La Lune, whither the Prussians had now arrived.

In point of fact, the Prussians, debouching by Grand-Pré, had now come within sight of the French army, and, having ascended the heights of Lune, discovered the ground, on the summit of which Dumouriez was stationed. Renouncing the idea of a rapid march to Châlons, they rejoiced to find the two French generals together, that they might cut them off at a single blow. Their object was to render themselves masters of the road to Châlons, then to advance to Vitry, to force Dillon at the Islettes, and thus to surround Saint Menchould on all sides, and oblige the two armies to lay down their arms.

On the morning of the 20th, Kellermann, who, instead of possessing himself of the heights of Gisaucourt, had taken his station in the centre of the hollow near Valmy, saw himself commanded in front by the heights of Lune occupied by the enemy; on one side he had the Hyron, in the possession of the French, but which they might easily lose; and on the other, Gisaucourt, which he had left unoccupied, and where the Prussians were about to establish themselves. In the event of being beaten, he would have been driven into the swamps of the Auve, behind the mill of Valmy, and been overwhelmed in this amphitheatre of hills which surrounded him before he could have rejoined Dumouriez. He immediately summoned his colleagues to his aid; but the King of Prussia seeing an extensive movement in the French army, and thinking it was the intention of the generals to retreat to Châlons, determined to block up their passage, and ordered the attack. The advanced guard of the Prussians encountered, on their road to Châlons, that of Kellermann, who was with his main body on the hill of Valmy. They attacked each other with great spirit; the French were at first repulsed, but were afterwards reanimated and supported by the carbiniers of General Valence. From the heights of La Lune the guns of the enemy played upon Valmy, and were briskly answered by those of the French.

Yet the situation of Kellermann was very hazardous; his troops were confusedly crowded together on the hill of Valmy, and too much confined to be brought fully into action. From the heights of La Lune a continual cannonade was kept up; from those of Gisaucourt, the fire of the Prussians galled his left; the Hyron, which flanked his right, was, it is true, occupied by the French; but Clerfuit, attacking this post with vigour, with twenty-five thousand Austrians, might carry it; and then, assailed on all sides, Kellermann would probably have been driven from Valmy into the Aube, before Dumouriez could come to his assistance. The latter despatched Stengel with a strong division, and Beurnonville with sixteen battalions, to support the troops upon the Hyron, and protect the right of Valmy; he directed Beurnonville to support Stengel with sixteen battalions; he also despatched Chasot with nine battalions and eight squadrons to the Châlons road, to occupy Gisaucourt and flank the left of Kellermann; but Chasot passing near Valmy in his way, requested orders from Kellermann instead of proceeding immediately to Gisaucourt, and gave the Prussians time to occupy that hill, and from thence pour upon us a murderous fire. Nevertheless, supported on the right and left, Kellermann could still maintain his post upon the hill of Valmy. Unfortunately, a shell falling on an ammunition waggon, produced an explosion, and threw the infantry into disorder; the cannonade from La Lune augmented upon this appearance of confusion, and the first line already began to give ground. Kellermann perceiving this movement, ran through his ranks, and rallied and encouraged his men. The Duke of Brunswick now thought it was the moment to ascend the hill, and put the French to the rout at the point of the bayonet.

It was mid-day before the thick fog which had enveloped the two armies cleared away. They could now perceive each other distinctly, and the young soldiers saw the Prussians advance in three columns with all the assurance of old troops accustomed to war. This was the first time that they had been on a field of battle of an hundred thousand men, about to cross bayonets; and knowing as yet neither their own nerve nor that of the enemy, they regarded each other with trepidation. Kellermann entered the entrenchments, disposed his troops in columns of battalions in front, and ordered them, when the Prussians should be at a certain distance, not to wait, but to advance upon them with fixed bayonets. He then raised his voice and cried out, "Long live the Nation!" Whether brave or cowardly, all were inspired with courage at this exclamation, and the young soldiers marched on, repeating the above watchword. At sight of this, the duke, who had attempted the attack with great repugnance and the utmost fear for its result, halted his columns, hesitated a few moments, and concluded by ordering a return to the camp.

This proof was decisive. The courage of those cobblers and tailors, of whom the emigrants had said the French army was composed, could no longer be doubted. The Prussians saw them well equipped, well clothed, and full of intrepidity; their officers splendidly attired, and displaying great military experience; General Duval, whose handsome person and white locks commanded respect; Kellermann, and, finally, Dumouriez, acting with as much firmness as skill in presence of an enemy so superior in numbers. The French revolution was, from this moment, properly estimated; and that which seemed before only a ridiculous chaos of discordant elements, now appeared a terrible reaction of national energy.

At four o'clock, Brunswick attempted a fresh attack; but the confident aspect of our troops again disconcerted him, and he turned his columns back for the second time. Being more than ever surprised, and finding all that he had heard of the French army to be false, the Prussian general proceeded with the greatest circumspection; and although he has been reproached with not having vigorously pushed on the attack and overthrown Kellermann, good judges think he acted prudently in relinquishing his attempt. Kellermann, supported on the right and left by the whole of the French army, could have made a strong resistance; and if the duke, driven into a narrow hollow, and into the low and swampy grounds, had been once beaten, he would have risked the destruction of his whole force. Besides, he had by this day's result occupied the Châlons road; the French were separated from their dépôt; and he hoped in a few days to oblige them to quit their position. He had not considered that, being masters of Vitry, they had only to make a larger circuit, and to suffer some delay in the arrival of their ammunition.

Such was the celebrated day of the 20th of September, 1792, a day in which more than twenty thousand cannon were discharged, since called "The cannonade of Valmy." The loss on both sides was equal, the loss of each army amounting to about eight or nine hundred; but gaiety and confidence prevailed in the French camp, reproach and disappointment in that of the Prussians. It is even said that on that very evening, the emigrants received the most lively remonstrances from the King of Prussia, and that the influence of Calonne, the most presumptuous, the most lavish of extravagant promises and false information of all the emigrant ministers, visibly diminished.

On the same night, Kellermann repassed the Aube with as little noise as possible, and encamped on the heights of Gisaucourt, which he ought to have occupied from the first, and of which the Prussians had availed themselves the previous day. They still remained on the heights of La Lune. On the opposite plain, and to the left of Kellermann, Dumouriez had placed himself. In this singular position the French force had their faces towards France, and seemed to be the invading party, and the Prussians, who were bearing towards France, appeared to be on the defensive. Here Dumouriez laid the plan of a new line of conduct, replete with energy and firmness, whether as against the enemy, his own officers, or the French authority. With nearly seventy thousand men, in a good camp, well supplied with live stock, he could hold out for a long time. The Prussians, on the contrary, were short of provisions; disease began to make ravages in their army, and in this situation they could do nothing but wait the result of their perseverance. A severe season in a clayey and humid soil, would not suffer them to protract their stay long; and if, resuming activity and energy too late, they determined upon marching towards Paris, Dumouriez was prepared to follow and surround them so soon as they got engaged with the troops in advance.

These views were just and prudent; but in the camp, where the officers were tired of suffering privations, and where Kellermann felt somewhat galled at being subject to a superior authority, and at Paris, where the citizens saw only their separation from the principal army, and perceived nothing between themselves and the Prussians; where they themselves witnessed the arrival of hulans within fifteen leagues of the city since the forest of Argonne had been open, the plan of Dumouriez was not at all approved. The assembly and council complained of his obstinacy, and wrote him the most imperative letters to induce him to abandon his position and repass the Marne. The camp at Montmartre, and an army between Châlons and Paris were the double rampart which was necessary to quiet the terrified imaginations of the Parisians. "The hulans harass your minds," wrote Dumouriez; "well then, kill 'em; this does not concern us. I shall not change my plan on account of their bravadoes." Nevertheless, he still continued to be plagued with orders and urgent entreaties to renounce his plan of operations. The officers of his camp vented their discontent in various observations. The men alone, cheered by the liveliness of their general, who was continually in their ranks, encouraging them, and explaining the critical situation of the Prussians, endured patiently all their privations. At one time, indeed, Kellermann wished to depart, but Dumouriez, like Columbus, asked for only a few days, and promised that if the Prussians did not beat a retreat in a given number of days, he would decamp.

Meantime the fine army of the allied powers was reduced to a deplorable state; dysentery and famine combined, made great ravages among them. The arrangements of Dumouriez contributed not a little to produce these effects between the two armies; the cannonading upon the front of the camp had been judged inexpedient, because it did not lead to any fixed result, it was therefore arranged between the two armies to suspend it, but Dumouriez stipulated that it should only be suspended in the front. He then immediately detached all his cavalry, especially those troops newly raised, and scattered them over the surrounding country, that they might intercept the convoys of the enemy, who having marched through Grand-Pré, and re-ascended the Aisne, to follow our retreat, were obliged to have their provisions brought by the same circuit. The cavalry officers soon acquired a taste for this lucrative species of warfare, and carried it on with great success. Meantime the season had greatly advanced; it was the end of September; the sufferings of the Prussian army became intolerable, and some officers were sent to the French camp to hold a parley. An exchange of prisoners was at first the only question between the two armies; the Prussians demanded this also for the emigrants, but it was refused. Great politeness prevailed on both sides. From an exchange of prisoners, the conversation turned upon the motives of the war; and, on the part of the Prussians, it was nearly confessed to be of a very impolitic nature. The character of Dumouriez here again discovered itself. Not having now to fight, he betook himself to negotiation; he made representations to the King of Prussia, in which he pointed out to him how little advantage he could gain by joining the house of Austria against France. At the same time he sent him twelve pounds of coffee, the last which remained in the two camps. These representations, which could not fail to have been duly appreciated, were yet badly received, as might have been expected. The Duke of Brunswick replied, in the name of the King of Prussia, by a declaration as arrogant as the first manifesto, and the negotiation was broken off. The assembly, who were consulted on this occasion by Dumouriez, answered, like the Roman senate, that they could not treat with the enemy so long as he continued in France.

These negotiations brought a great deal of scandal upon the general; he was suspected henceforward of holding secret communications with the enemy, and incurred the pretended contempt of that haughty monarch, who was so much humbled by the event of the war. But such was the character of Dumouriez, uniting civil and military courage, and possessing talents of almost every description, he wanted that dignity of character which imposes on men, whilst genius commands their attention. The Prussians, as Dumouriez had foreseen, being no longer able to withstand scarcity and disease, began to decamp on the 1st of October. It was a great subject of astonishment and conjecture in Europe to see so fine and powerful an army retire before a band of labourers and shopkeepers, whom it expected to see led back to their cities in disgrace, and chastised for their insurrectionary insolence. But the inefficiency with which the Prussians were pursued, and the impunity with which they were allowed to repass the defiles of the Argonne, gave countenance to the supposition of secret stipulations, and even of some arrangement having taken place with the King of Prussia; but facts are about to explain, better than all suppositions, the retreat of the allied army.

To remain in so unfortunate a situation was no longer possible. The time for an invasion had elapsed, and the advanced and inclement season rendered such an attempt impracticable. The only resource, therefore, that was left to the enemy, was to retire towards Luxembourg and Lorraine, and to make that country the base of their operations, to be recommenced in the campaign of the following year. Besides, there is reason to believe that Frederick William at this time thought of seizing his share of Poland; for this prince, having formerly excited Russia against the Poles, was now desirous of partaking of its spoils. Thus the badness of the season, disgust at the failure of his enterprise, regretting his alliance with the house of Austria against France, and, finally, his new interests in the north, were sufficient to determine the King of Prussia on a retreat. This he accomplished in the greatest order; but this enemy, who consented to abandon his enterprise, was still very powerful. To attempt to cut him off from a retreat, and oblige him to open a passage by a victory, was an imprudence which Dumouriez could not for a moment think of. He was necessarily forced to content himself with harassing his march; and for not having done this with sufficient activity, he and Kellermann were both justly liable to censure.

All danger was now over. The campaign was finished, and every one returned to his own particular designs. Dumouriez contemplated his enterprise in the Low Countries, and Kellermann his command at Metz; and the pursuit of the Prussians did not obtain that attention from the gene-rais which it merited. Dumouriez, however, hastened to despatch General d'Harville to the Chêne-Populeux to chastise the emigrants; ordered General Miaczinski to lie in wait for them at Stenay, the outlet of that passage, to complete their destruction; despatched Chasot in the same direction to occupy the road to Longwy; posted the generals Beurnonville, Stengel, and Valence, with more than twenty-five thousand men in the rear of the grand army, to pursue them with vigour; and at the same time ordered Dillon, who had all along kept his position at the "Islettes" with the completest success, to advance by Clermont and Varennes, and so block up the road to Verdun. These dispositions were undoubtedly good, but they ought to have been executed by the general himself; he ought, as M. de Jomini justly and ably observed, to have made directly for the Rhine, descended its course with his whole army; and carrying all before him in a moment of success, he would have conquered Belgium in a march. But he preferred coming to Paris to prepare for an invasion by Lille. On their part, the three generals, Stengel, Beurnonville, and Valence, not being very well agreed together, pursued the Prussians with laxity. Valence, who belonged to Kellermann's division, suddenly received an order to join his general, that he might resume his route to Metz. It must be confessed that this movement was rather singular, for it was bringing back Kellermann into the interior, to proceed to the Lorraine frontier. The natural route was to advance by Vitry or Clermont, and this might have been combined with the pursuit of the Prussians according to the order of Dumouriez, who, so soon as he heard of the order given to Valence, commanded him to pursue his march, saying that whilst the armies of the north and centre acted in concert, he held the superior authority. He also remonstrated warmly with Kellermann, who consented at last to resume his first determination, and march by Sainte Menchould and Clermont. Nevertheless, the pursuit was still conducted in a very dilatory manner. Dillon alone harassed the Prussians with great activity, and, by advancing too rapidly, was even engaged in action.

The disagreement of the generals, and their several personal estrangements after the danger was over, was evidently the reason why the Prussians escaped so easily. It was said that their retreat was bought, and that it was paid for by the proceeds of a great robbery, of which we are about to give an account; that it had been previously settled with Dumouriez, and that one of the stipulations was the free retreat of the Prussians; finally, that Louis XVI. had requested it from his prison. But sufficient reasons have been given for this retreat, which can be explained by natural causes; but independent of these motives, it is not credible that a monarch, whose vices were not associated with such base avarice, should suffer himself to be bought. Besides, Dumouriez would have been justified, in the eyes of all military men, in not pursuing the enemy, by avowing a convention which brought no dishonour on himself. Finally, Cloré, the valet-de-chambre of the king, declared that nothing like the pretended letter addressed by Louis to Frederick William, and forwarded by Manuel, the procureur of the commune, was ever written. The whole story, therefore, must have been a fabrication, and the retreat only the natural effect of war. Dumouriez, therefore, in spite of all his faults; in spite of his oversight at Grand Pré, of his negligence during the escape of the Prussians, was, nevertheless, the saviour of France, and of a revolution which has, perhaps, advanced Europe many centuries. Assuming the command of a disorganized army, divided in feeling and destitute of all self-confidence, he united it in mutual confidence, and imparted a vigour and singleness to its views; never despairing in the midst of the most disastrous circumstances, and affording a singular example of self-possession. After the loss of the defiles, and persisting in his first plan of temporizing in spite of the danger of his army, and the remonstrances of the government, in a manner which proved the vigour of his mind and character, he, we repeat, saved the nation from foreign dominion and a counter-revolution, and furnished the impressive spectacle of a citizen saving his fellow countrymen in spite of themselves. No conquest, however extensive, is so glorious as this, or presents so moral a lesson.

THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

CHAPTER I.

RENEWED MASSACRES OF THE PRISONERS AT VERSAILLES—ABUSE OF POWER AND EXCESSIVE EXPENDITURE OF THE COMMUNE—ELECTION OF DEPUTIES TO THE CONVENTION—THE MANNER IN WHICH THE REPRESENTATION OF PARIS WAS FORMED—THE CIRCUMSTANCES AND SCHEMES OF THE GIRONDISTS; CHARACTER OF THE LEADERS OF THAT PARTY—FEDERALISM—STATE OF THE PARISIEN PARTY AND COMMUNE—OPENING OF THE NATIONAL CONVENTION, THE 20TH SEPTEMBER, 1792; ABOLITION OF ROYALTY; ESTABLISHMENT OF THE REPUBLIC—THE FIRST CONTENTION BETWEEN THE GIRONDISTS AND THE MOUNTAIN PARTY; IMPEACHMENT OF ROBESPIERRE AND MARAT—THE REPUBLIC DECLARED ONE AND INDIVISIBLE—DISTRIBUTION AND STRENGTH OF PARTIES IN THE CONVENTION—CHANGES IN THE EXECUTIVE POWER—DANTON QUILTS HIS MINISTRY—CREATION OF VARIOUS ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEES AND OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE.

WHILST the French armies on the frontier checked the march of the Prussians, the greatest tumult and confusion prevailed in Paris. The excesses of the commune, the fury of the people, the impotency of the authorities, and the inactivity of the military during the disastrous days of September, have already been related. The audacity with which the committee of surveillance avowed and recommended the massacres of Paris to the imitation of all France, has also been recorded. The commissaries sent by the commune into the provinces for this last purpose, were, however, every where repelled with indignation, because France, being free from the dangers of the capital, partook not of its fury; but the murders in the environs of Paris are by no means comprehended in those we have noticed. In that city, there existed a gang of assassins whom the massacres of September had familiarized with blood, and who still thirsted for more. Some hundreds of men had set out for Orleans, to drag from its prisons those accused of high treason. These unfortunate victims, by virtue of a late decree, were to have been conducted to Saumur; but their destination was changed on the road, and they were led towards Paris. On the 9th of September, it was said they were to arrive at Versailles on the 10th; and the gang of assassins, either receiving fresh orders, or stimulated in their sanguinary fury by the news of their arrival, occupied Versailles from the 9th to the 10th, and instantly the report of new massacres about to be committed spread through Paris. The mayor of Versailles took every precaution to prevent the threatened calamities. The president of the criminal court hurried to Paris to inform the minister Danton of the dangers which menaced the prisoners; but to all his representations he only obtained one reply: "Those men are very criminal." "Be it so," added the president, Alquier, "but the law alone should execute justice."—"See you not," replied Danton in a terrible voice, "that I should have answered you in another manner, if it had been in my power! What are those prisoners to you? Return to your duties, and do not trouble yourself about those persons."

The next day the prisoners arrived at Versailles; a crowd of unknown persons immediately rushed towards the carriages, succeeded in surrounding them, and separating them from their escort; threw the commandant Fournier, from his horse, carried off the mayor, who had generously determined to die at his post, and massacred the unfortunate prisoners, to the number of fifty-two. There it was that Delessart and D'Abancour, the impeached ministers, perished with Brissac, chief of the constitutional guard under the legislative assembly. Immediately after this execution, the assassins rushed into the prisons of the city, and renewed the scenes of the beginning of September, employing the same means, and observing a mock form of justice, as they had done at Paris. This last massacre happening five days after the first, produced an universal terror. At Paris, the committee of surveillance did not relax their activity; as soon as the prisons were emptied, they began to replenish them by issuing new orders of arrest, in such great numbers, that Roland, complaining of these arbitrary acts to the assembly, produced five or six hundred; some signed by one person alone, others by two or three at most, and nearly all containing no accusation, but simply a suspicion of incision.

Whilst the commune exercised its power in Paris, it despatched commissaries into the country to justify its conduct, urge the imitation of its example, recommend to the electors deputies of its choice, and decry those who opposed its measures in the legislative assembly. It also appropriated to itself immense treasures, by seizing on all the sums found with the treasurer of the civil list, Septuill, by robbing the churches of their silver, and laying hands on all the rich moveable furniture of the emigrants, and by extracting from the treasury considerable sums, under the pretence of supplying a caisse de secours, and completing the works of the camp. All the property of the poor wretches who were massacred in the prisons of Paris, and on the road to Versailles, was sequestered, and deposited with the committee of surveillance; never would the commune render an account either of its nature or value, and even refused to give any answer on this subject either to the minister of the interior, or to the directory of the department, who, as has been explained, were intrusted with all levies. But the commune did not stop here. They put up to sale, on their own authority, the moveable furniture of the great mansions, which had hitherto remained sealed since the absence of their proprietors. In vain did the superior authorities forbid this sale: the subordinate class of citizens, who were commissioned to execute their orders, either belonged to the municipality, or were too weak to oppose that body, and their commands were entirely disregarded.

The national guard, recomposed under the denomination of armed sections, and filled, under this title, with men of all descriptions, was in the most complete state of disorganization, sometimes taking part in the tumults of the city, and at others permitting them to prevail through negligence. The military posts were completely abandoned, because the guards, not being regularly relieved, even after forty-eight hours, retired from their duties fatigued and disgusted. All peaceable citizens had quitted this corps, formerly so regular and useful; and Sauterre, who commanded it, had neither talent nor strength of character enough to restore it to any degree of order.

The safety of Paris, therefore, was left to chance; for the commune and populace combined might undertake and carry out any enterprise. Among the spoils of royalty, the most precious, and therefore the most coveted, were those contained in the Garde-Meuble, the rich depot of all the valuables which formerly decorated and gave splendour to the throne. Since the 10th of August, it had excited the cupidity of the multitude, and more than one circumstance had induced the inspector of the establishment to keep a strict watch on it. He sent requisitions after requisitions to obtain a sufficient guard for this purpose; but whether it was from the general disorder which prevailed, or from the difficulty of supplying all the posts, or from a voluntary negligence, he was not furnished with the complement of men he demanded; and, as might have been expected, the Garde-Meuble was, on the night of September 16, plundered, and the greatest part of its contents passed into unknown hands, which a subsequent authority has made useless efforts to discover. This robbery was attributed to the secret authors of the massacres. Yet in this instance they could neither have been instigated by revolutionary fanaticism nor their sanguinary policy; and supposing them to have been stimulated by cupidity, they had sufficient in the charge of the commune to satisfy the greatest ambition. It has been said, indeed, that the motive of this robbery was to pay for the retreat of the King of Prussia, but this is absurd; and also to maintain the expenses of party, which is more probable, but quite unsupported by any proof. The judgment, however, we must form of the commune and its leaders can be but little affected by the fact. Whether they were guilty of the crime or not, it is certain they were in possession of property and sums to an immense value, of which they would never give any account; that the seals affixed to the drawers of the Garde-Meuble were broken, but the locks not forced, which pre-supposes a cool abstraction, and does not look like a popular pillage; and that all the precious articles they contained disappeared for ever. One part of these valuables was stolen with impunity by subalterns, such as Sergent, surnamed Agathe, from a precious jewel he had seized as his part of the plunder; another part went to defray the expenses of an extraordinary government, instituted by the commune; and was also devoted to the payment of the gangs of assassins, and the messengers sent into the departments. The revolution was a war made against the old system of society; every war has its reprisals, and those are generally stained with murder and pillage.

Such was the state of Paris during the election of the deputies of the national convention. To this new assembly all good citizens looked for that energy which was necessary to restore order; they hoped that the forty days of confusion and crime which had elapsed since the 10th of August might be considered only as a disastrous but passing insurrection. The deputies of the legislative assembly also felt their weakness, and seemed, as it were, to reserve their energies for the meeting of the convention, the common hope of all parties.

The approaching election agitated the whole nation, and the clubs exerted their influence with great earnestness. The Jacobins of Paris printed and circulated a list of all the votes of the legislative session, that they might serve as a document to guide the electors. Those deputies who had opposed popular decrees, and especially those who had acquitted Lafayette, were particularly marked out. Nevertheless, in the provinces, where the divisions of the capital did not prevail, the Girondists, even those most odious at Paris, were nominated; and nearly all the members of the legislative assembly were re-elected. Many of the constituents, whom the decree of non-re-election had excluded from the last session, were also returned to make part of the convention, and in this number were Buzot and Pétion. Among the new members were all those who had signalized themselves in the departments by their energy and patriotism, and those writers who, like Louvet, had become celebrated by their talents in the capital and the provinces.

In Paris, that violent faction which had dominated over the city since the 10th of August, carried all opposition before it, while it returned deputies of its own choice. Robespierre and Danton were the first elected; the Jacobins and the commune received the news of this event with the most vociferous applauses. After them, Camille Desmoulins, celebrated by his writings;

David, the painter; Fabre d'Eglantine, the comic author, who had taken an active part in all the revolutionary troubles; Legendre, Paris, Sergent, and Billard Varennes, infamous for their conduct in the commune, were nominated to be deputies. To these were added the procureur-syndic Manuel, young Robespierre, the brother of the celebrated Maximilien; Collet D'Herbois, formerly a comedian; the Duke of Orleans, who had resigned his titles and assumed the name of Philip Egalité; and finally, the aged Dussaulx, one of the electors of 1789, who had constantly opposed the multitude, and shed so many tears over their excesses. The recollection of the year 1789, or probably his mild and inoffensive character, injurious to neither party, was the cause of his election. There was only now wanting the cynical and sanguinary Marat to complete this singular assembly. But this extraordinary man astonished by the audacity of his writings even those who had been witnesses of the bloody days of September. Nevertheless, the capuchin Chabot, who was ascendant in the Jacobin club, and gained triumphs there which he would have sought for in vain in the legislative assembly, undertook to make his apology; and his election, proposed in this association, was soon carried in the electoral assembly. Another journalist, Fréron, and a few more obscure individuals, completed this famous deputa-tion, composed of shopkeepers, a butcher, a comedian, an engraver, a painter, an attorney, three or four writers, and a self-deposed prince; and this motley assemblage very well represented the confusion and variety of orders which agitated the metropolis of France.

The deputies arrived successively in Paris; as their numbers became greater, and as the days of terror became more distant, the assembly began to resume their courage, and take a decided part in suppressing the disorders of the capital. The fear inspired by the enemy was much diminished by the confidence of Dumouriez, and his position in the forest of the Argonne; hatred against the aristocrats had become converted into pity, since the horrible massacres of Paris and Versailles; and those horrible crimes, which had found so many deluded advocates, and so many timid censurers, crimes rendered still more revolting by a combination of robbery and murder, excited general execration. The Girondists, indignant at so many atrocities, and exasperated by the personal oppression they had suffered for a whole month, became more firm and energetic than ever. Strong in their abilities and animated with courage, invoking justice and humanity to support their cause, they had the public opinion on their side, and already began to threaten their adversaries with a high hand.

In the meantime, although the Girondists were equally indignant at the excesses of Paris, they failed to excite that personal resentment which the animosities of party produce. Brissot, for example, never having ceased to contend for the palm of eloquence with Robespierre in the Jacobin club, had created in him feelings of the bitterest hatred. By his various acquirements and splendid talents, Brissot produced a great effect, but he had not that personal consideration, nor was he possessed of sufficient skill in politics to be the leader of a party, although the hatred of Robespierre elevated him by imputing to him this distinction. When, on the eve of the insurrection, the Girondists wrote a letter to Buse, the king's painter, the report of a negotiation being on foot was spread abroad, and it was pretended that Brissot, amply furnished with money, was about to set out for London. There was no truth in this; but Marat, who, on the most insignificant and false reports, fabricated his accusations, issued an order of arrest against Brissot at the very time of the general imprisonment of the pretended conspirators of the 10th of August. The troubles which immediately followed prevented the execution of this arrest; but the Jacobins nevertheless maintained that Brissot had sold himself to Brunswick; and Robespierre repeated and believed it, so much was his jaundiced mind inclined to believe those criminal who were personally odious to him. Louvet had also incurred his hatred, by supporting Brissot at the Jacobin club, and in the journal called the Sentinel. As bold as he was talented, he assailed his adversaries by direct attacks; and his virulent personalities, republished daily in the Sentinel, made him the most dangerous and detested enemy of the party of Robespierre.

The minister Roland had dispensed the whole Jacobin and municipal party by his courageous letter of the 3rd of September, and by the resistance he opposed to the encroachments of the commune; but not being the rival of any one, he gave occasion only to a general dislike. He had personally offended no one but Danton, and that was by opposing him in the council, but this was not attended with much danger, for of all men Danton was the least liable to be moved by feelings of resentment. His wife, however, excited great detestation. Proud, austere, courageous, and talented, this singular woman drew around her all the Girondists, so remarkable for the cultivation of their minds, and the brilliancy of their abilities, animating them by her smiles, rewarding them with her esteem, and preserving in her circle, with republican simplicity, that politeness which is so odious to the vulgar and uneducated. Roland was already subject to the low raillery of his opponents. His wife, they said, governed for him, directed his friends, and rewarded them with her favours; and Marat, in his ignoble language, called her the Circe of the party.

Guadet, Vergniaud, and Gensonné, although they had been prominent figures in the legislative assembly, and were opposed to the Jacobin party, had not yet provoked the full measure of that hatred which they afterwards incurred. Guadet had even gratified the republicans by bold attacks on Lafayette and the court. Animated, prompt in taking the lead, passing suddenly from bursts of passionate eloquence to the most deliberate coolness and self-possession, and perfectly master of himself in the tribune, he always knew how to hit exactly the mind of the assembly. But he was too fond of displaying the talents he so eminently possessed, and delighted in vanquishing by his eloquence those who soon avenged themselves by his death.

Vergniaud had not gained so much popularity with violent partisans as Guadet, because he had discovered less ardour against the court; neither had he provoked the same enmity, because the indolence and nonchalance of his mind was less frequently roused to make personal attacks on his opponents. The passions of this stormy period little disturbed him; he slipped through them all, and avoiding contests, he escaped, at the same time, the animosities to which they gave rise. Yet he was not indifferent: he possessed a noble heart, a fine and luminous understanding, and a genius full of fire, which broke out at intervals with great splendour. Though not so quick in reply, or happy in repartees as Guadet, he became animated by more lengthened discussions, his exuberant eloquence then came into full display, and he expressed himself with a facility, a luxuriance of expression, and a happy modulation of voice that has never been equalled. The eloquence of Mirabeau was, like his character, powerful but unequal; that of Vergniaud, always elegant and dignified, rose into the grand and terrible as his subject seemed to call for their display. But all the exhortations of Madame Roland were scarcely sufficient to rouse this indolent athlete, who often opposed the imprudent sallies of his friends, and besides thought words could have little efficacy when opposed to brute force.

Gensonné, full of sense and integrity, but possessing only a moderate facility of expression, and capable at the most of inditing good reports, had not as yet cut a very prominent figure in the assembly. Yet strong passions and an obstinate disposition gave him great influence among his friends, and provoked the hatred of his enemies, which is always rather directed against character than talent.

Condorcet, formerly a marquis, and always a philosopher, elevated in his views, impartial, and discriminating, perceived the faults of his party, yet was incapable of abandoning them. Being, however, little adapted to take part in the terrible agitations of a democracy, he kept himself rather in the back-ground, provoked no enmities, and was reserved for more suitable occupations in the composition of works of profound meditation.

Brissot was remarkable for his fine sense, elevation of mind, and courage, which, when joined to a handsome person, and a firm and simple elocution, had an imposing effect, and gave a great moral ascendancy to their possessor in the assembly.

Barbaroux, who had been just elected by his fellow-citizens, with one of his friends, Rebecqui, had only just arrived from the south. This Rebecqui was an uncultivated, bold, enterprising person, and entirely devoted to the opinions of his friend. It will be recollected, that Barbaroux was greatly attached to Roland and Pétion, that he considered Marat as an atrocious barbarian, and Robespierre as a person devoted to an ignoble ambition, especially since Paris had proposed him as indispensably necessary for a dictator. Disgusted at the crimes which had been committed during his absence, he willingly imputed them to those whom he already detested; and declared his conviction, from the moment of his arrival, with so much warmth and energy, as to make an irreconcilable breach between himself and the mob faction. Although inferior to his friends in the extent of his capacity, he was nevertheless intelligent and eloquent, handsome in person, and heroic in mind; and, as he spared not his threats, he incurred in a few days as much enmity as those who had daily attacked both measures and men, during the whole legislative session.

The person around whom all this party ranged themselves, and who at that time enjoyed universal consideration, was Pétion. Elected mayor during the legislative session, he had, in his contest with the court, become, as it were, the organ of the revolution, and was greatly endeared to the people by this circumstance. It is true he had, on the 9th of August, preferred a debate to a personal conflict; he had also since expressed himself decidedly against the scenes of September; and had separated, like Bailly in 1790, from the commune; but this silent opposition, not amounting to a breach with the faction, only made him feared, not detested. Possessing an enlightened mind, rarely speaking in the assembly, calm in his deportment, and a rival to none, he exercised around him, and even over Robespierre himself, the ascendant of a cold, equitable, and universally respected reasoner. Although reputed a Girondist, all parties wished for his suffrage, all feared him; and in the new assembly, not only the right side, but all the moderate party, and even many of the left side, courted his countenance and support.

Such was the situation of the Girondists in the face of the Parisian faction; the public opinion favoured them: a great part of the deputies who daily arrived at Paris went over to their side: all the ministers, except Danton, who often carried every thing before him in the council, but who exerted more of his influence against them, belonged to their party; finally, the mayor Pétion was at their head. But at Paris they were not at home; they were in the midst of their enemies; the violence of the lower classes was to be feared; while the prospect of the future was full of terror.

The first reproach that this party incurred, was their supposed desire to sacrifice Paris. They had been before suspected of wishing to take refuge in the departments beyond the Loire; and the displeasure of Paris being increased since the 2nd and 3rd of September, they were still supposed to harbour the same intention. These suspicions gradually assumed the shape of an accusation. It was pretended that they wished to destroy the national unity, and to convert the eighty-three departments into as many equal states, held together simply by a bond of federalism; and that they aimed at annihilating the supremacy of Paris, and acquiring a personal dominion in their respective departments. It is true, that when France was menaced by an invasion of the Prussians, they had meditated, in case of extremity, fortifying themselves in the provinces of the south; and it is also true that the excesses and tyranny of Paris made them often turn their thoughts towards the departments; but there is a wide difference between these ideas and the project of establishing a confederacy of states; and besides, as the only distinction between a federal and central government consists in the comparative degree of energy that may exist in local institutions, the crime of such a project, if any such existed, was rather vague, and not easily to be discovered. The Girondists seeing nothing culpable in the accusation brought against them, did not defend themselves from the charge; and many of the party, indignant at the absurdity of their supposed design, demanded if, after all, America, Holland, and Switzerland, were not happy and free, although a confederacy of states, and if it would be any very great crime to meditate a similar system for France. These conversations becoming public, added weight to the calumny. At the Jacobin club, the question was gravely discussed, and the most furious indignation became excited against the Girondists, who, it was declared, wished to destroy the revolutionary power, by breaking up that unity which constituted its strength, and afterwards to make themselves kings in their own provinces.

The Girondists replied to these accusations by others more substantive, but unfortunately quite as exaggerated. They reproached the commune with having rendered itself absolute, with having, by its usurpations, encroached upon the national sovereignty, and with having assumed to itself a power that only belonged to the whole nation. They added, also, that it aimed at domineering over the convention, as it had over the legislative assembly; they declared that by holding their sittings in its neighbourhood, the national deputies were not in safety, and that they sat in the midst of the assassins of September. They accused it of having dishonoured the revolution during the forty days which followed the 10th of August, and with having filled the Parisian deputation with men signalised in those horrid saturnalia. So far all was true. But they added reproaches as vague as those which had been directed against themselves. Marat, Danton, and Robespierre were openly accused of aspiring to the supreme power; Marat, because he daily declared in the public journals that a dictator was necessary to purge society of the impure members which corrupted it; Robespierre, because he dogmatized at the commune, and addressed the assembly with insolence, and because, on the eve of the 10th of August, Paris had proposed him to Barbaroux as dictator; and Danton, because he exercised in the ministry, over the people, and everywhere, the ascendant of his powerful mind. These men were called the triumvirs, and yet they were not united among themselves. Marat who was a systematic madman; Robespierre, jealous of every one, but without sufficient greatness of soul to entertain any ambitious views for himself; and Danton, an active leader, passionately devoted to the revolution, and who intermeddled with every thing, more from the natural ardour of his mind, than from any personal views of ambition. But neither of these men was an usurper, nor were they conspirators acting in concert; and it certainly was imprudent in the Girondists to give their adversaries the advantage of a false accusation. Yet with Danton they still contrived to keep some terms, as there was no personal animosity between them; Marat was too much despised to provoke a direct attack; but on Robespierre their whole indignation found vent. The consistency of this man's conduct, which the people called virtue, and his eloquence, greatly irritated them, and they felt all the resentment towards him, that a jealous and highly-exalted mediocrity can provoke from real superiority.

Nevertheless, these discordant parties endeavoured to come to some understanding before the opening of the national convention, and held several meetings for this purpose. Danton, having the success of the revolution solely at heart, and being uninfluenced by any personal pique, sincerely* desired a reconciliation. Pétion displayed in these conferences his usual coldness and reasonableness; but Robespierre felt sore and irritated from the virulent attacks he had sustained; and the Girondists conducted themselves as men, proud, austere, innocent, and indignant, who believed they had already vengeance in their power. Barbaroux declared that an alliance between virtue and guilt was impossible; and all separated, more alienated from each other than ever. The Jacobins rallied round Robespierre, and the Girondists and all the moderate party round Pétion. The latter advised a cessation from all accusations, as it was impossible to discover the authors of the massacres of September, and of the plunder of the Garde-Meuble; he also recommended his party to speak no more of triumvirate, since the ambition of the suspected was not sufficiently proved to call for punishment; and added that the few evil-disposed persons who had been introduced into the assembly should be suffered to remain unmolested in unnoticed contempt, whilst the convention hastened to fulfil their duties in settling the constitution, and deciding on the fate of Louis XVI. and his family. Such was the advice of all temperate men, but it did not suit the warm and the fiery dispositions of many, who entered into projects, whose execution being distant, were subject to the discovery and the consequent irritation of their adversaries. One of these projects was to break up the municipality,—to remove, in case of necessity, the convention,—and to transfer their sittings to some place out of Paris; to constitute themselves a court of justice,—to pass sentence, without appeal, on the conspirators,—and to embody a guard chosen from the eighty-three departments, to maintain their own security and independence, and that of the other public establishments. This design produced no other effect at the moment than that of irritating the animosities of the Jacobins and the mob. The Girondists relied solely on the public, whose moral feelings, so long silenced by terror, they trusted to revive by their eloquence, and by the recital of those crimes they were about to hold up to abhorrence; and they took refuge from their enemies in the tribune of the convention, whence they believed they should soon gain the completest triumph.

Finally, on the 20th of September, the deputies of the convention met at the Tuilleries. Their numbers being sufficient, they constituted themselves provisionally, verified their powers, and proceeded immediately to the nomination of the cabinet (bureau). Pétion was almost unanimously proclaimed president; and Brissot, Condorcet, Rabaud Saint Etienne, Lasource, Vergniaud, and Camus, were appointed secretaries. These elections prove that the influence of the Girondist party still prevailed in the assembly.

The legislative assembly, which had been permanently sitting since the 10th of August, were informed on the 21st, by a deputation, that the convention was formed, and that their authority had consequently expired. The two assemblies had only to mix together, and the convention, thus composed, immediately occupied the chamber of the legislature.

On the 21st, Manuel, who had been suspended on the 20th of June with Pétion, and had become very popular on account of that suspension, who had been since associated with the furious faction of the commune, but was afterwards disgusted with their proceedings, and driven by the massacres of the Abbaye to approach more closely to the Girondists, on the very day of the opening of the convention made a proposition, which excited a great sensation among the enemies of the Girondists; "Citizen representatives," said he, "everything in this assembly should bear a character of dignity and grandeur, to make an impression upon the world. I demand that the president of France be installed in the palace of the Tuilleries; that he be preceded there by the public force and all the insignia of the law; and that the citizens rise up in his presence." Tho Jacobin Chabot, and Tallien, the secretary of the commune, declaimed vehemently against this imitative ceremonial of royalty. Chabot declared that the representatives of the people should assimilate themselves to those from among whom they were chosen, down to the unbreeched mob (sans-culottes), who formed the majority of the nation; and Tallien added, that the president of the convention should rather be found in a fifth story than in a palace, for that was the most frequent abode of genius and virtue. The proposition of Manuel was rejected, and the enemies of the Girondists pretended that they wished to decree sovereign honours to their leader Pétion.

After this proposition, a multitude of others succeeded one another without interruption. All were anxious to exhibit the sentiments which prevailed in the assembly, by authentic declarations. That absolute equality should be the basis of the new constitution, that the sovereignty of the people should be decreed, that hatred should be sworn against royalty, dictatorships, triumvirates, and all individual authority, and that the penalty of death should be affixed to the offence of proposing such establishments, were some of the propositions vented on the first day of the convention. Danton put an end to all these motions, by carrying a decree that the new constitution should have no validity till sanctioned by the people. To this decree it was added, that the abrogated laws should continue in force,—that the authorities, which had not been replaced, should provisionally exercise their functions,—and that taxes should be collected as formerly, till a new system of contribution could be devised. After these propositions, Manuel, Collot d'Herbois, and Gregoire, took up the question of royalty, and demanded that its abolition should be pronounced immediately. "The people," said they, "have just been declared sovereign, but they will not be so in reality till they are delivered from a rival authority, that of kings." On this appeal, the assembly expressed their unanimous reprobation of royalty. Nevertheless, Bazire desired, he said, a solemn discussion to decide on so important a question. "What need is there of discussion," resumed Gregoire, "where all are of one mind! Courts are the nurseries of crime, and hot-beds of corruption; the history of kings is nothing but the martyrology of nations. Whilst we are all equally convinced of these truths, what need is there of discussing them?"

The debate was in fact closed. A profound silence reigned in the assembly; and on the unanimous declaration of the convention, the president declared that royalty was abolished in France. This decree was received with universal applause; its publication was ordered immediately, and messengers were sent to the armies, and all the municipalities, to convey the joyful intelligence.

When the republican institution was decreed, the Prussians still menaced the nation. Dumouriez, as has been related, had marched to Sainte Menesould, and the cannonade of the 21st was not yet known at Paris. On the next day, the 22nd, Billaud-Varennes proposed that the manner of dating should be altered, and that instead of dating of the 4th year of liberty, of the 1st year of the republic should be adopted. This proposition was acceded to; the year 1789 was no longer considered as the commencement of liberty; and the new republican era commenced on the 22nd of September, 1792.

On the evening of this day intelligence of the cannonade of Valmy reached Paris, and spread universal joy throughout the city. On the requisition of the citizens of Orleans, who complained of their magistrates, it was decreed that all the members of the administrative bodies, and of the tribunals, should be re-elected, and that the conditions of eligibility, fixed by the constitution of 1791, should be considered as null. It was no longer necessary to choose judges from among the lawyers, or magistrates from a certain class of landed proprietors. The legislative assembly had already abolished the qualification of the silver mark, and given to all citizens of age an electoral capacity. The convention finished the work of effacing all distinctions, and thus a system of absolute equality was commenced.

On the 23rd audience was given to the ministers. The deputy Cambon made a report of the state of the finances. The preceding assemblies had decreed the issuing of two thousand seven hundred millions of assignats; two thousand five hundred millions had already been expended; two hundred millions still remained, of which seventy-six were not yet prepared, and eighty remained in the treasury. The taxes had been retained by the departments for the purchase of the grain which had been ordered by the last assembly; new extraordinary resources were now wanting, and it was necessary to issue new assignats. The national property augmented daily by the emigration; the convention did not, therefore, hesitate to issue the paper by which it was represented, and a fresh creation of assignats was ordered.

Roland next gave an account of the state of France and of the capital. Quite as severe and still more bold than he had been on the 3rd of September, he dwelt upon the agitations of Paris, exposed their causes, and pointed out the means of preventing them for the future. He recommended the establishment of a strong and vigorous government, as the only guarantee for the preservation of order in free states: His report was received favourably, and with great applause, yet it did not provoke any retort from those who considered themselves as accused of having taken part in the disturbances of Paris.

But scarcely had the assembly time to cast a first glance over the situation of France, when intelligence was brought of the repetition of disorders in certain departments. Roland wrote a letter to the assembly announcing these fresh excesses, and demanding their repression. The reading of this was hardly finished, when the deputies Kersaint and Buzot hastened to the tribune, and complained of the numerous acts of violence which had begun to take place every where. "The assassinations of Paris," said they, "are now imitated in the departments. It is not of anarchy we have to complain, but of tyrants of a new species, who have sprung up in a nation so newly emancipated. It is from Paris that these fatal incentives to crime daily emanate. On all the walls of the capital are affixed placards, inciting to murder and pillage, and lists of proscription designate every day new victims. How is it possible to preserve the people from the most frightful poverty, if so many citizens are condemned to conceal their existence? How is it possible to give France the hope of a constitution, if the convention, from whom she expects it, deliberates under the points of poniards? We must, for the honour of the revolution, put a stop to so many excesses, and distinguish between the civic courage which braved the despotism of the 10th of August, and that cruelty which, since the 2nd and 3rd of September, has been subservient to the purposes of a mute and hidden tyranny.

In conclusion, these speakers required the establishment of a committee, charged—

1st. To give an account of the state of the republic, and of Paris in particular.

2nd. To frame a law against the instigators to murder and assassination.

3rd. To consider the means of giving to the national convention a public force at its disposal, taken from the eighty-three departments.

This proposition greatly roused the indignation of the left side, which was composed of the most violent members of the convention. They filled the assembly with tumultuous and confused cries. "The troubles of France," they said, "were exaggerated; and the hypocritical complaints which had just been heard, proceeded from the depth of those dungeons where the suspected, who had for three years been provoking their country to civil war, had been justly immured. The evils complained of they maintained to be inevitable, and declared that a people in a state of revolution were justified in resorting to energetic measures to secure their safety. At present the critical period which called for such measures," they said, "had passed over, and the declarations which the convention had just made would be sufficient to appease all disturbances. Besides, what necessity," they asked, "was there for an extraordinary jurisdiction? Did not the ancient laws exist, and were they not competent to deal with the instigators of the murders of September? Did the assembly," they demanded, "wish to establish anew martial law?"

The tables were turned. Those who had demanded the extraordinary jurisdiction of the 17th of August, and had wished to establish a revolutionary tribunal, now cried out against the proposed law as one of a sanguinary description!—"Sanguinary," replied Kersaint, "when its tendency, on the contrary, is to prevent the effusion of blood!"—An adjournment was loudly called for—"To adjourn the repression of murderers," exclaimed Vergniaud, "is to allow them! The enemies of France are in arms in our territories, and there are those who would rather that French citizens should slaughter one another, like the soldiers of Cadmus, than repel them!"

Finally the proposition of Kersaint and Buzot was adopted. It was decreed that laws for the punishment of the instigators to murder should be prepared, and for the organization of a guard to be composed from the departments.

This sitting of the 24th created a great emotion in Paris; yet no name was particularly marked out for public indignation, and the accusations yet remained general on both sides. On the next day, the resentments of the previous evening revived. The Jacobin faction murmured at the decrees which had been passed, and the Girondists regretted that they had not expressed themselves with sufficient warmth against that faction which they termed the disorganizers. Whilst on one side, the late acts of the convention were attacked, and on the other defended, Merlin, formerly a municipal officer at Thionville, since a deputy in the legislative assembly, where he identified himself with the most avowed patriots, this Merlin, so famous for his violence and audacity, demanded the attention of the assembly. "The order of the day," said he, "is to discover, as Lasource assured me yesterday, if there exists in the national convention a faction desirous of establishing a triumvirate or dictatorship; let these suspicions either be silenced altogether, or let Lasource point out the guilty, and I will poniard them in the presence of the assembly." Lasource thus called upon to explain himself, repeated the conversation he had had with Merlin, and again declared his belief that a faction of ambitious men existed, who aimed at exalting themselves on the ruins of the monarchy, but he mentioned no names. "They are those," added he, "who have instigated the mob to murder and pillage, who have issued orders of arrest against the members of the legislative assembly, who have destined the most courageous deputies of the convention to the poniard, and who impute to the people those excesses of which they themselves are the concealed authors. When the proper time shall arrive, he will lift up the veil which he had partially raised, even if it were to perish under their blows."

Yet the triumvirs were not pointed out. Osselin then ascended the tribune. "He was persuaded," he said, "that it was against the deputation of Paris that these accusations were directed, but that they were neither so extremely silly or so profoundly wicked, as to have entertained any ideas of a triumvirate or dictatorship; that he would pledge his oath to the contrary, and demanded that sentence of death should be passed upon the first person detected in meditating such projects. Let every one," added he, "follow me to the tribune and make the same declaration." "Yes," replied Rebecqui, the courageous friend of Barbaroux, "the party accused of these tyrannical projects does exist, and I will name it—it is the party of Robespierre. Marseilles is aware of this, and has sent us here to oppose this party."

This daring apostrophe caused great tumult in the assembly; all eyes were turned towards Robespierre; and Danton hurried to the tribune to appease these divisions and divert the accusations which he knew to be partly directed against himself. "That will be a happy day for the republic," said he, "when a frank and fraternal explanation shall take place, and put an end to all suspicions—dictators and triumvirs are spoken of, but such accusations are vague, and ought to be signed." "And I will sign it," exclaimed Rebecqui, again springing towards the bureau. "Do so," replied Danton; "if there are any really guilty, may they suffer the penalty of their crime, even though they were my best friends. For myself, my life is known. In the patriotic societies, on the 10th of August, and in the executive council, I have served the cause of liberty, without any personal object, with all the energy of my nature. I fear, therefore, no accusations, so far as I myself am concerned, but I wish to shield others from them. There is, I confess, a man in the Paris deputation, who may be called the Royou of the republicans, Marat. I have often been accused of having instigated him in the publication of his placards. But I appeal to the president, and I call upon him to declare, if I have not been frequently at variance with Marat in the commune and in the committees. And let it be recollected that this writer, so loudly accused, has passed part of his life in cellars and dungeons; suffering has altered his character, and much allowance should be therefore made for his violence. But let us quit all individual discussions, or endeavour to make them serviceable to the public cause. Let us affix the penalty of death to any one who shall venture to propose a dictatorship or triumvirate." This motion was received with great applause. "But I do not stop here," resumed Danton, "there is another suspicion got abroad among the public, which it is necessary also to destroy. It is said that a party of the deputies is meditating the establishment of a federal system, and the division of France into a multitude of sections. It behoves us to be united. Let us declare then, by another decree, the unity of France and its government. These fundamental positions being laid down, let us banish all mutual distrust, and proceed without dissension to the great objects we have in view."

Buzot replied to Danton, that a dictatorship would be an usurpation, not a grant from the convention; and that therefore to make laws against it would be illusory. As to a federal system, he declared it had never entered into any one's head; and he considered the guard which had been decreed for the security of the assembly as the best guarantee for their unity, as all the departments would be thus called upon to watch over the national representation; with regard to the law proposed by Danton, he said it might be salutary, but ought to be maturely reflected upon, and consequently its consideration should be submitted to the commission of six, which had been constituted by a decree the evening before.

Robespierre having been personally accused, now came forward in reply. He first premised that he was not about to defend himself, but the cause of the public, which had been attacked in his person. Addressing himself to Rebecqui: "Citizen," said he, "you have not feared to accuse me; I thank you. Your conduct very well represents the courage of that celebrated city of which you are a deputy. The country, you, and myself, will all be gainers by this accusation.

"A party," continued he, "which meditates the establishment of a new species of tyranny has been pointed out, and I have been named as its chief. The accusation is vague; but, thanks to my own exertions in the cause of liberty, it will be easy for me to answer it. Have not I, in the constituent assembly, during three years, opposed all factions, whatever name they might have assumed? Have not I continually contended with the court, and despised all its presents? Have not I?"—"That is not the question," cried many deputies.—"He must be allowed to justify himself," replied Tallien.—"As I am accused," resumed Robespierre, "of betraying my country, am I not at liberty to oppose the tenor of my whole life to such an accusation?" He then recommenced the enumeration of his services against the aristocracy, and against the false patriots, who had assumed the mask of liberty. These last expressions were pointed at the right side. At last, Osselin himself, fatigued with his enumerations, interrupted him, and demanded a frank explanation. "What you may have formerly done," said Lecoq de Puiravaux, "is not disputed; what you are accused of now is the question before the assembly." Robespierre again, however, resorted to the support he had given to liberty; dwelt upon the sacred right of defence, and upon the public welfare, as much endangered as himself by this accusation. He was again requested to be a little more brief, but he continued with the same diffuseness. Referring to the famous decrees passed at his suggestion against the re-election of the constituents, and the nomination of deputies to vacant places, he asked if these were the proofs of ambition. Then entering into a recrimination against his adversaries, he renewed the accusation of federalism, and concluded by demanding the adoption of the decrees proposed by Danton, and a serious examination into the accusation against himself. Barbaroux, who had been impatiently waiting for the close of this harangue, now hastened to the bar of the chamber. "Barbaroux of Marseilles," cried he, "offers to sign the accusation made by Rebecqui against Robespierre." He then related an insignificant story, already repeated, that before the 10th of August, Panis had conducted him to the house of Robespierre, and, on leaving it, represented him (Robespierre) as the only man, as dictator, capable of saving the nation; upon which Barbaroux replied, "that the Marseillais would never bow down either to a king or a dictator."

We have before related these facts, but such vague and insufficient declarations of the friends of Robespierre certainly did not warrant a formal accusation against him. Barbaroux replied severally to all the imputations which had been cast upon the Girondists. He demanded the proscription of federalism by a decree; and called upon all the members of the convention to swear that they would rather suffer themselves to be blocked up in Paris and die there, than quit it on any consideration. After great applause, Barbaroux resumed his speech, and said, that as to the scheme of a dictatorship, the fact could not be contested; that the usurpations of the commune, the orders of arrest issued against the members of the national representation, and the messengers sent into the departments, all proved the design of establishing some such domination; but Marseilles watched over the safety of the deputies; that always prompt to support beneficial decrees, she had sent a battalion of federalists in spite of the royal veto; and that now she had sent eight hundred of her citizens, whose fathers had given them two pistols, a sabre, a gun, and an assignat of five hundred livres; that she had added to them two hundred cavalry, well equipped; and that this force would serve as a commencement to the departmental guard which had been decreed for the security of the convention. As to Robespierre," added Barbaroux, "I experience much regret at having accused him, for I still regard him, and formerly esteemed him. Yes, we all both regard and esteem him, and yet we have accused him! Let him acknowledge his errors, and we will desist. Let him cease to complain, for if he has served liberty with his pen, we have defended it with our persons. Citizens, when the day of peril shall arrive, then we shall see if the makers of placards are ready to die with us." Great applause followed this harangue. Placards having been alluded to, Marat demanded permission to be heard; but Cambon, making the same request afterwards, obtained the preference. He assured the assembly that he had read placards in which a dictatorship was represented as indispensable, and that these placards were signed by the name of Marat. On this information every one shrunk from the accused, but he only smiled at the contempt he met with. Cambon was succeeded by other accusers of Marat and the commune. Marat made many efforts to obtain a hearing; Panis, however, occupied the tribune before him, and attempted to answer the allegations of Barbaroux. He denied awkwardly many facts which were true, but which proved little, and which it would have been better to have avowed at once, relying on their insignificance for his justification. He was then interrupted by Brissot, who demanded the reason why an order of arrest had been issued against his person. Panis, in answer to this interrogation, referred to the circumstances of that period, so soon forgotten; he dwelt upon the terror and disorder which then prevailed, on the multitude of denunciations against the conspirators of the 10th of August, on the weight of the reports spread against Brissot, and the necessity there existed of examining their truth.

After these long explanations, broken off and resumed every moment, Marat, insisting on being heard, at last obtained a hearing when it was no longer possible to deny it him. This was the first time he had ever appeared in the tribune; his aspect there produced a feeling of tumultuous indignation in the assembly, and a general cry of "Down, down!" assailed him from all sides. Negligently dressed, carrying in his hand a cap, which he placed on the tribune, and casting a contemptuous smile upon his audience: "I have," said he, "a great number of personal enemies in this assembly."—"All! all!" cried the greater part of the deputies.—"I have in this assembly," resumed Marat, "a great number of personal enemies. I would bring them to some sense of shame. Let them spare their furious clamours against a man who has served liberty and themselves more than they think.

"Triumvirates and dictatorships have been spoken of, and the project of establishing them has been attributed to the deputation of Paris. But I must do them justice, and declare that my colleagues, especially Robespierre and Danton, have frequently opposed me on this point. I am the first and the only writer in France who has ever thought of this measure, as the only means of crushing all traitors and conspirators. I alone am guilty, and alone should suffer; but before I am punished, I must be heard." Here a few applauses were heard. Marat continued: "surrounded by the continual machinations of a perfidious king, a hateful court, and of false patriots, who in the two former assemblies put the public liberty up to sale; do you reproach me with having devised the only means of safety, and of having brought vengeance down on their guilty heads? No, the people would then disavow your reproaches; for they themselves felt that the mean I proposed was the only one possible, and in constituting themselves a dictator, they have delivered the nation from traitors.

"I trembled perhaps more than any one else at the idea of these terrible executions; and that they might not be in vain, I should have wished them to have been directed by a just and firm hand. If, at the taking of the Bastille, the necessity of this measure had been understood, five hundred criminals would have fallen, and peace would at present have been perfectly established. But, not having acted with this wise and necessary severity, a hundred thousand patriots have been sacrificed, and a hundred thousand more are still threatened with the same fatal. To prove that I would not make this species of dictator, tribune, or triumvir (the name signifies nothing,) a tyrant, such as might foolishly be imagined, but a victim devoted to his country, whose situation no ambitious man would envy, I would, at the same time that I limited his authority to a short period, and confined it to the condemnation of traitors, have placed a clog on his leg, and thus kept him always in the hands of the people. My ideas, however revolting they may appear to you, tend only to the public good. If you are not enlightened enough to understand me, so much the worse for you!"

A profound silence prevailed till he pronounced the last sentence, when he was interrupted by bursts of laughter, which however did not disconcert the orator, who was more calculated to inspire terror than excite ridicule. He continued: "Such is my opinion, written, signed, and publicly defended. If it is false, confute me, enlighten me, but accuse me not of despotism.

"I have been accused of ambition! But see, and judge. If I had even fixed a price on my silence, I might have been gorged with gold, and I am poor! Persecuted incessantly from one cellar to another, I have preached the truth from a stack of billets.

"As to yourselves, open your eyes, and instead of consuming your time in scandalizing discussions, reform the declaration of rights, establish the constitution, and lay the foundation of a just and free government, which is the proper object you should have in view."

Universal attention was given to this extraordinary man; and the assembly, stupified by a system so frightful and premeditated, preserved a profound silence. A few partisans of Marat, emboldened by this silence, ventured to applaud him, but their example was not imitated; and he returned to his seat without either applause, or incurring any tokens of anger.

Vergniaud, the most upright and temperate of the Girondists, now attempted to awaken the indignation of the assembly. He first deplored, he said, the misfortune of having to reply to a man who stood charged with decrees of accusation! Chabot and Tallien took great offence at these words, and asked if the decrees alluded to were those issued by the Chalet against Marat for having unmasked Lafayette. Vergniaud repeated his regret at having to reply to a man who had not purged himself of the imputations with which he stands charged, and dropping with calumnies, gall, and blood! These expressions excited fresh murmurs; but he continued with firmness; and, after having made some distinction between David, Dussaulx, and some other members, and the Paris deputation, he noticed the famous circular of the commune, which has been mentioned before, and read the whole of it to the assembly. But, as it was already known, it did not produce so much effect as another paper which the deputy Boileau read afterwards. This was a sheet publication printed by Marat on the very day of the discussion, in which were the following words: "One reflection overwhelms me; it is, that all my efforts to save the people will have been in vain without a new insurrection. From the dispositions of the majority of the deputies of the convention, I despair of the public safety; if in their first eight sittings the foundation of a constitution is not laid, expect nothing further from that assembly. Fifty years of anarchy are before you, and nothing can deliver you from it but a dictator who is a true patriot and statesman.—Oh babbling people, did you but know how to act!"

The reading of this paper was frequently interrupted by bursts of indignation. Scarcely was it finished, when a number of members exclaimed, in unmeasured language, against the author. Some threatened him, and cried out, A l'Abbaye! à la guillotine! others expressed the bitterest contempt for him. A smile was all the answer he returned to these attacks. Boileau demanded an act of impeachment against him, and many wished to put it immediately to the vote. Marat insisted, with the greatest sang froid, on being heard. It was proposed that he should be heard at the bar, but he at last obtained the tribune. According to his accustomed mode of expression, he began by saying he would bring his enemies to a sense of shame. As to the accusations which his adversaries had not blushed to bring against him, he gloried in them, he declared, as the reward of his courage. Besides, the people, in making him their representative, had acquitted him of every charge, and decided between his opponents and himself. As to the paper which had just been read, he would not disavow it, for he was incapable of falsehood, and fear was a stranger to his heart. "To demand from me a retraction," added he, "is to ask me to deny the evidence of my eyes and understanding, and no power under the sun is capable of producing such a derangement in my ideas. I can answer for the purity of my heart, but I cannot change my thoughts; they are such as the nature of things suggests to me."

He then informed the assembly that the paper which had been read, printed ten days previously in placards, had been reprinted, against his will, by his publisher; but that he had just been giving, in his first number of a journal, entitled "The Journal of the Republic," a new exposition of his principles, with which the assembly would be satisfied, if they would hear it.

The assembly consented to the reading of this paragraph, and softened by the moderate expressions contained in this article, intitled "His new plan," treated him with more forbearance, and he even obtained some marks of approbation. He then re-ascended the tribune with his accustomed audacity, and presumed to give a lesson to his colleagues on the danger of passion and prejudice. If his journal had not appeared on this day, he said, to exculpate him, he would have been loaded with irons. "But," added he, showing a pistol which he always carried in his pocket, and which he put to his forehead, "I have the means of keeping myself free; and if you had passed a decree of accusation against me, I would have blown out my brains in this tribune. Behold the fruit of all my labours, dangers, and sufferings! I will remain among you to brave your fury!" These last expressions of Marat roused the indignation of his colleagues, who called him a madman and a wretch, and a protracted disorder was the consequence.

This debate had now lasted many hours, and what was the result? Nothing had come to light respecting the pretended project of a dictatorship or triumvirate; but the character of parties, and their respective force, had been fully developed. The placability and good will of Danton towards all his colleagues, provided they did not look narrowly into his conduct; the envy and pride of Robespierre; the astonishing cynicism and audacity of Marat, repelled by his own party, but trying to habituate men's minds to his atrocious system; all three succeeding in the revolution, by different qualities and vices; disagreeing among themselves, disavowing each other's principles, and having nothing in common but that love of influence, natural to all men, but which can by no means be construed into a design to establish a tyranny; such were the traits exhibited in this discussion. These men agreed with the Girondists in the necessity of holding up to abhorrence the horrors of September; they even allowed them that esteem which was due to their talents and integrity, but considered their accusations exaggerated and imprudent; and could not help perceiving some personal feelings in their resentment. The assembly now divided itself into a right and left side, as it had during the first days of the constituent assembly. The right side was composed of all the Girondists, and of those who, without being attached to them as a party, partook of their generous indignation against the outrages of September. In the centre of the chamber, a considerable number of honest and peaceable deputies took their seats, who, for the most part, agreed with the Girondists, but were neither qualified by their characters or talents to take any other part in the debates than to give their vote; and sought, in confounding themselves with the multitude, oblivion and security. The great number of these professed neutrals, the great respect in which the assembly was still held, and the anxiety which the Jacobin and municipal party manifested to justify themselves in their eyes, all tended to inspire them with courage. They hoped that the authority of the convention would in time put down the demagogues; nevertheless, they were not unwilling to repress their energy, and declared that they thought the Girondists too precipitate in their accusations. They were as yet only reasonable and impartial; they, however, soon became a little more jealous of the brilliant eloquence of the right side; and, once face to face with tyranny, they displayed their weakness and cowardice. This party was called the Plain, in opposition to the left side, which was styled the Mountain, where all the Jacobins were heaped up, as one may say, one above the other. On the graduated benches of this mountain were to be seen all the deputies of Paris, and those of the departments who owed their nomination to the influence of the clubs, and of those whom the Jacobins had gained over since their arrival, by persuading them of the necessity of giving no quarter to the enemies of the revolution. In this party were also included some men of distinguished abilities, but of precise, rigorous, and positive characters, who disapproved of the philanthropic theories of the Girondists, as mystical abstractions. Nevertheless the mountain party were still few in number. The Plain, united to the right side, composed an immense majority; this party had appointed Pétion president, and approved of the indignation of the Girondists against the massacres of September, excepting always their personalities, which appeared premature and unfounded*.

The convention now, dismissing their mutual accusations, passed to the order of the day; but the decree of the preceding evening was insisted upon; and three measures were resolved on—1st. To call on the minister of the interior for an exact and faithful account of the state of Paris. 2nd. To enact a law against the instigators to murder and pillage; and 3rd. To form a departmental guard for the safety of the assembly. As to the account of the state of Paris, the energy with which this duty would be performed might be anticipated, from the character of Roland, to whom it was committed; and with regard to the two other measures, against seditious publications, and the establishment of a guard, every thing might be hoped from the committee to whom they were intrusted, which was entirely composed of Girondists, Buzot, Lasource, and Kersaint being members of it.

These two last measures were vehemently opposed by the mountain party. They asked, if the convention wished to renew martial law, and the massacres of the Champ-de-Mars; and if they wished to surround themselves with satellites and body guards, as the late king. They renewed thus, as the Girondists declared, all the arguments made use of by the court against the camp at Paris.

* See an extract from the Memoirs of Garat, note 48, in the Appendix.

Many of the most violent members of the left side were, in their characters of deputies of the convention, decidedly opposed to the usurpations of the commune, and none of the Paris deputation defended it when attacked, which happened every day. Thus acts were constantly passed against it without opposition. As the commune had delayed to re-elect new members, in obedience to the decrees which ordered the re-election of all administrative bodies, the executive council were commissioned to keep a watchful eye upon its resuscitation, and report to the assembly thereupon in three days. A committee of six members was also nominated to take the declaration signed by all those who had deposited property in the Hotel de Ville, to ascertain the use which had been made of these effects by the municipality. The directory of the department, which the commune had degraded to a simple administrative commission, was likewise reinstated in all its prerogatives, and took again its style of Directory. The elections of the communes for the nomination of the mayor, the municipality, and the council-general, which the commune had wished to make public in order to intimidate the weak, were again made secret by a confirmation of the existing law on that subject. The elections effected in this illegal manner were annulled, and the sections acquiesced in, proceeding upon them anew according to the prescribed form. Finally, it was determined that all prisoners confined without a warrant of arrest should be enlarged forthwith; this was a great blow to the committee of surveillance, who were particularly exasperated against individuals.

All these decrees were passed in the beginning of October; and the commune, so vigorously assaulted, was obliged to bend under the ascendancy of the convention. Nevertheless, the committee of surveillance did not yield without resistance. Its members presented themselves before the assembly, and said they were about to confound their enemies. Being the depositaries of the papers found on Laporte, the keeper of the civil list, and who was condemned by the tribunal of the 17th of August, they had discovered, they said, a letter, in which the price paid for the passing of certain decrees in the two preceding assemblies was detailed; and they now came to unmask those deputies who had sold themselves to the court, and expose their false patriotism. "Name them," exclaimed the assembly, with indignation. "We cannot," replied the deputies of the commune, "do so immediately." To repel the idea of mere libellous accusation, a committee was forthwith appointed, composed of twenty-four deputies, who had not sat either in the constituent or legislative assemblies, to examine the papers, and make their report on them. Marat, the inventor of this expedient, exulted in his journal that he had paid the Rolandists, the accusers of the commune, "in their own coin;" and announced the pretended discovery of the treason of the iron-dists. Yet, in the papers under examination, none of the deputies were at all compromised, and the committee of surveillance were branded as calumniators. The papers were too voluminous for the twenty-four deputies to continue their examination of them in the Hotel de Ville, and they were, therefore, transferred to one of the committees of the assembly. Marat seeing himself thus deprived of the rich materials for his daily accusations, became greatly irritated, and pretended that the convention wished to destroy every proof of treason.

After having thus repressed the extravagances of the commune, the convention turned their attention to the executive power, and determined that the ministers should not in future be chosen from the assembly. Danton being thus obliged to make choice between the situation of minister of justice and that of member of the convention, preferred, like Mirabeau, that which afforded the privilege of the tribune, and quitted the ministry without giving an account of its secret service money, saying he had already settled that account with the council. This was certainly not very regular conduct, but it was not looked into, or rather it was passed over. Francois de Neufchateau having refused to succeed this minister, Garat, a distinguished writer, but more brilliant than profound, and who had become famous by the superior manner in which he got up "The Paris Journal," was appointed to the ministry of justice. Servan, fatigued by a laborious administration, not beyond his abilities but his strength, preferred the command of the army of observation, stationed along the Pyrenees. The minister Lohrman was provisionally intrusted with the affairs of the war department, in addition to those of the foreign office. Finally, Roland also offered his resignation, being wearied with an anarchy so opposed to his probity and his inflexible regard of order. The Girondists proposed offering him the portfolio of the interior, but the mountain party, and particularly Danton, whom he had so often resisted, opposed this motion, as unbecoming the dignity of the assembly. Danton complained that he was a man of weak understanding, and governed by his wife. To this reproach of incapacity, the Girondists replied, by referring to his letter of the 3rd of September; and they might have instanced the opposition Danton himself had experienced from him in the council. Nevertheless, the assembly passed to the order of the day. Roland, pressed by the Girondists, and other persons of moral consideration, to remain in the ministry, yielded to their solicitations. "I continue in the ministry," wrote he to the assembly, "because calumny attacks me, danger awaits me, and the convention appears to desire it. It is a glorious consideration for me," added he, in concluding his letter, "that my enemies could find nothing to reproach me with, but my union with courage and virtue."

The assembly now divided itself into several committees; one of surveillance composed of thirty members; another of war, composed of twenty-four; a third of accounts, of fifteen; a fourth of criminal and civil legislation, forty-eight; and a fifth, of finances, composed of forty-two. To these committees, another still more important was added, to devise the project or prospectus of a constitution, which was composed of nine members, nearly all in the interest of the right side. In this committee, philosophy had its representatives, in the persons of Siyès, Condorcet, and the American Thomas Paine*, lately made a French citizen and member of the convention; the Girondist party was represented by Gensonné, Vergniaud, Pétion, and Brissot; the centre by Barrère; and the mountain by Danton. It is certainly strange that this turbulent demagogue, who had so little speculation in his character, should have been chosen to make one of a committee of philosophers. Robespierre was extremely desirous of that distinction, and much chagrined at not having obtained it. Danton, however, was preferred, on account of the pliability of his disposition, and because no bitter animosities separated him from his colleagues. It was this diversity of opinions in the committees which so long delayed the organization of the constitution.

After having provided for the re-establishment of order in the capital, the organization of the executive power, the distribution of the several committees, and for the formation of a constitution; the attention of the assembly was turned to another subject of the most weighty importance, the fate of Louis XVI. and his family. The most profound silence on this topic had hitherto been preserved by the assembly. In the Jacobin club, the commune, in private and in public, it was discussed; indeed, everywhere but in the convention. Some emigrants had been seized with arms in their hands, and conducted to Paris to suffer the sentence of the law. On this occasion (for the first time), a member asked why the convention, instead of condemning petty criminals, did not think of passing sentence on those confined in the Temple? A profound silence succeeded this interrogatory. Barbaroux first rose; and said, before he asked if it was intended to bring Louis XVI. to trial, he wished to know whether the convention was to be constituted a judicial body, for there were many other criminals besides those in the Temple to be tried. In starting this question, Barbaroux alluded to the project of converting the convention into an extraordinary court, to pass sentence on the agitators, triumvirs, &c.; after a few debates, the subject was referred to a committee of legislation to examine the questions to which it gave rise.

CHAPTER II.

THE MILITARY SITUATION OF FRANCE AT THE END OF OCTOBER, 1792—BOMBARDMENT OF LILLE BY THE AUSTRIANS; CAPTURE OF WORMS AND MAYENCE BY CUSTINE—OVERSIGHT OF OUR GENERALS—INJUDICIOUS OPERATIONS OF CUSTINE—ARMY OF THE ALPS; CONQUEST OF SAVOY AND NICE—DUMOURIEZ RETURNS TO PARIS; HIS CIRCUMSTANCES WITH REGARD TO PARTIES—INFLUENCE AND ORGANIZATION OF THE JACOBIN CLUB—STATE OF FRENCH SOCIETY; THE WITHDRAWING ROOFS OF PARIS—INTERVIEW BETWEEN MARAT AND DUMOURIEZ—AN ANECDOTE—SECOND CONTENTION OF THE GIRONDISTS WITH THE MOUNTAIN PARTY; LOUVET IMPEACHES ROBESPIERRE; DEFENCE OF ROBESPIERRE; THE ASSEMBLY DECLINES TO PROSECUTE LOUVET'S IMPEACHMENT—THE PRELIMINARIES OF THE TRIAL OF LOUIS XVI.

THE military situation of France was now greatly changed. It was about the middle of October; the enemy was already repulsed from Champagne and Flanders; and the foreign power was invaded on three sides, the Palatinate, the Savoy, and the Comté de Nice.

We have seen the Prussians retiring from the camp at La Lune, taking the route of the Argonne, having lost a great part of their army by disease, and only saving the remainder through the negligence of our generals, who possessed no unity of design. The Duke de Saxe Teschen did not succeed better in his attack upon the Low Countries. Whilst the Prussians marched on the Argonne, this prince determined to remain behind, and attempt something dashing. Yet although our northern frontier was almost naked, his means were little more than our own, and he could scarce muster fifteen thousand men, with but a scanty supply of artillery. Feigning, however, false attacks on all the line of our strong places, he put many small camps to the rout, and marched immediately upon Lille to attempt the siege of that place, which the greatest generals with powerful armies, and well supplied with artillery, had failed to effect. Nothing but a possibility of success can justify cruelty in war. The duke could not approach Lille but on one point, and he there established batteries, which bombarded the city six following days, and destroyed more than two hundred houses. It has been said that the arch-duchess Christine was delighted on beholding this awful spectacle. If so, she must have been a witness of the heroism of the besieged, and of the inutility of Austrian barbarity. The inhabitants resisted nobly; and on the 8th of October, when the Prussians abandoned the Argonne, the Duke Albert was also obliged to quit Lille. General Labourdonnaie arriving from Soissons, and Beurnonville from Champagne, forced them to retire with precipitation from our frontiers, and the resistance of the inhabitants, published throughout France, augmented the general enthusiasm.

It was about this time, that Custine attempted some bold enterprises in the Palatinate, but with a brilliant rather than a solid success. Being attached to the army of Biron, which was encamped along the Rhine, he was posted, with seventeen thousand men, at some distance from Spire. The grand army of invasion had but inefficiently protected his rear in advancing into the interior of France. Spire, Worms, and Mayence were only defended by petty detachments; Custine perceiving this, marched upon Spire, and entered it without resistance on the 30th of September. Emboldened by this success, he proceeded to Worms, met with the same good fortune, and obliged the garrison of two thousand seven hundred men to lay down their arms. He then took Frankenthal, and did not overlook the importance of Mayence, which was the most essential place of retreat for the Prussians, and in which they had imprudently left only a small garrison. Custine, with his seventeen thousand men, and no artillery, could not attempt the siege of this place, but he could try a sudden attack (coup-de-main). The new opinions which had been started in France agitated all Germany, particularly the university cities; Mayence was one of these, and Custine determined to practise on its credulity by false intelligence. He first approached its walls, then retired, on the pretended news of the arrival of an Austrian force, again advanced, and by making extensive movements, deceived the enemy as to the strength of his army. A formal deliberation took place in the city. The necessity of capitulating was strongly maintained by the partisans of the French, and on the 21st of October the gates were opened to Custine; and the garrison, except eight hundred Austrians, who rejoined the grand army, laid down their arms. The news of these successes occasioned great joy, and caused an extraordinary sensation. They had certainly been cheaply bought; and when compared with the intrepid constancy of the inhabitants of Lille, and the cool magnanimity displayed at Sainte-Menehould, could not claim much praise; yet the transition from a mere defensive resistance to conquest, captivated the imagination of the people. So far Custine had acquitted himself with great credit; but to make his success complete, he should have terminated the campaign by a movement which was as practicable as it would have been decisive.

At this moment the three armies of Dumouriez, Kellermann, and Custine, were, by a most fortunate coincidence, so situated as to be able to destroy the Prussians, and conquer in one march the whole line of territory, from the Rhine to the sea. If Dumouriez, less pre-occupied with another project, had kept Kellermann under his command, and pursued the Prussians with his eighty thousand men; and Custine had at the same time descended the Rhine, from Mayence to Coblenz, and thrown himself on the rear of the retreating army, they must infallibly have been utterly overwhelmed. Then, following the course of the Rhine to Holland, the Duke Albert, cut off from all retreat, would have been obliged to lay down his arms, and the Low Countries forced to submit; Treves and Luxembourg being comprehended in the line we have described, must necessarily have fallen; the Rhine would have been the boundary of France, and the campaign finished in a month. Dumouriez, although certainly possessing great military genius, overlooked this plan, his mind being occupied with another project. Anxious to return into Belgium, he thought only of hastening to succour Lille, and confronting the Duke Albert; he therefore left Kellermann to pursue the Prussians. This latter might still have marched to Coblenz, passing between Luxembourg and Treves, whilst Custine came down from Mayence. But Kellermann having nothing enterprising in his disposition, and not placing sufficient confidence in his troops, who appeared harassed, encamped in the environs of Metz. Custine, on his part, wishing to render himself independent, and make brilliant incursions into the country, had no desire to join Kellermann, and confine himself within the limits of the Rhine.

He never intended to go to Coblenz. Thus this fine plan, which has been so clearly developed by the greatest of our military historians*, was totally neglected.

Custine joined to a great deal of talent a fiery, haughty, and eccentric disposition. He endeavoured to render himself independent of Biron, and of all the other generals, and conceived the idea of extending his conquests all around him. To take Mannheim, exposed him to violate the neutrality of the Elector Palatine, and was besides forbidden by the executive council. He therefore meditated quitting the Rhine to advance into the interior of Germany. Frankfort, situated on the Maine, appeared a prize worth contending for, and he resolved to march upon it. Yet this free commercial city, which had always remained neuter, and was well-disposed towards the French, did not deserve this fatal preference. Not being defended, it was easy to take, but difficult to keep, and consequently useless to occupy. Its capture could have therefore but one object, the levying of contributions; and there was little justice in thus taxing a people habitually neuter, and trusting to their known inclinations for their protection, and by those very inclinations deserving favour at the hands of France, whose principles she approved, and whose success she desired. Custine committed this violation of justice in entering the city on the 27th of October. He levied contributions, alienated the inhabitants, converted them into enemies, and exposed himself, in thus throwing himself upon the Maine, to being cut off from the Rhine, either by the Prussians, supposing they had ascended towards Bingen, or by the Elector Palatine, if, breaking through his neutrality, he had issued from Mannheim.

The news of these incursions into the enemies' territory gave great joy to the nation, who was as much delighted as astonished at obtaining conquests a few days after the fear of being conquered. The Prussians being alarmed at these successes, threw a flying bridge over the Rhine, for the purpose of re-ascending by the right bank of the river, and driving the French army out of the country. But happily for Custine, they spent twelve days in passing the river. Distress, disease, and separation from the Austrians, had reduced this army to fifty thousand men. Clerfaut, with eighteen thousand Austrians, had followed the general movement of our troops towards Flanders, and hastened to the succour of the Duke Albert. The corps of emigrants had been disbanded, and those who composed it had either joined the regiment of Condé, or entered into some foreign service.

Whilst these events were passing on the northern frontier and the Rhine, we also gained other advantages on the Alpine frontier. Montesquieu, who commanded the army of the south, invaded Savoy, and occupied the Comté de Nice by one of his lieutenants; this general, who had displayed in the constituent the talents of a statesman, and who, before he had time to exhibit those of a warrior, which he was said to possess, was summoned to the bar of the legislative assembly, to give an account of his conduct, being accused of sloth and incapacity. He, however, succeeded in convincing his accusers that want of means, not want of zeal, was the cause of his delays, and he was suffered to return to the Alps. Yet, as he evidently belonged to the first revolutionary generation, his opinions and conduct were incompatible with the new; and being summoned again to appear before the assembly, he would have been deprived of his command, if he had not at that moment made his entry into Savoy; he was consequently allowed to retain his situation, and complete the conquest he had begun.

According to the vast plan conceived by Dumouriez, when, in his capacity of minister for foreign affairs, he presided over the diplomatic and war departments, France should have pushed forward its armies to the limits of its natural frontiers, the Rhine, and the higher chain of the Alps. To effect this, it would be necessary to conquer Belgium, Savoy, and Nice. France had also the advantage in recurring to the natural principles of her policy, that of despoiling none but those enemies who had made war with her, the house of Austria, and the court of Turin. This plan was frustrated in Belgium in April, and had been deferred until now in Savoy, where Montesquieu was about at present to carry it into execution. For this purpose he intrusted one division of his troops to General Anselme to pass the Var, and march upon Nice at a given signal; he proceeded himself, with the greatest part of his army, from Grenoble to Chambéry; menaced the Sardinian troops at Saint-Geniès, and, advancing from fort Barraux on Montmélian, he succeeded in dividing them, and driving them into the valleys. Whilst his lieutenants pursued the fugitives, he himself marched to Chambéry, and on the 28th made his triumphal entry, to the great satisfaction of the inhabitants, who loved liberty like true mountaineers, and the French as men possessing the same language, manners, and religion as themselves. He immediately called an assembly of the inhabitants, to deliberate on a question which could not be doubted, that of their being united to France.

At the same time Anselme, reinforced by six thousand Marseillais, whom he had required as auxiliaries, approached the Var, an unequal torrent, as indeed are all those high mountain-streams, alternately overflowing and dry, and consequently unable to hold a permanent bridge. Anselme boldly crossed the Var, and occupied Nice, which the Count Saint André had just abandoned, and which the magistrates pressed him to enter, to repress the disorders of the populace, and deliver them from their lawless pillage. The Sardinian troops had retired to the upper valleys; Anselme pursued them, but halted before Saorgio, a formidable post, from which the Piedmontese had never yet been dislodged. Meanwhile the squadron of Admiral Truguet, acting in concert with Anselme, had reduced Ville Franche, and had marched to the petty principality of Oneglia. Great numbers of corsairs generally found an asylum in this port, and consequently its capture was by no means unimportant. But while a French boat was advancing to hold a parley, the right of nations was violated, and many men killed by a general discharge of artillery. The admiral then drawing up his vessels before the place, assaulted it with a brisk fire, and immediately disembarked some of his troops, who sacked the city, and made great carnage among the monks, who were very numerous, and had instigated, it was said, the inhabitants to the breach of faith which provoked this retaliation. Such is the nature of martial law, that this unfortunate town of Oneglia was subjected to all its rigour, without exciting the least pity. After this expedition, the French squadron returned to Nice, where Anselme, separated by the swelling of the Var from the rest of his army, was placed in a very dangerous dilemma. Yet by vigilantly protecting himself against Saorgio, and preserving the favour of the inhabitants better than he had hitherto done, his position might be tenable, and he might still retain his conquest.

During these events, Montesquieu advanced from Chambéry on Geneva, and was about to enter the territory of the Swiss, who were very differently disposed towards France, and pretended to discover in the invasion of Savoy a breach of their neutrality.

The sentiments of the Cantons with regard to France were very much divided; all the aristocratical republics condemned the revolution: Berne, and its chief magistrate (aroyér) Stinger, looked upon it with utter detestation, and the more so, as the Pays de Vaud, so oppressed a country, had been most favourably disposed to the revolution. The Helvetic aristocracy, incited by Stinger and the English ambassador, endeavoured to provoke war against us, and to give a colour to their object, complained of the massacre of the Swiss guards on the 10th of August, of the disarming a regiment at Aix, and finally, of the occupation of the passes of Porrentruy, which belonged to the bishopric of Bâle, and which Biron had occupied for the purpose of blocking up the Jura. Yet the moderate party triumphed, and an armed neutrality was resolved upon. The Canton of Berne, however, more indignant and distrustful, marched some troops to Nion, and under pretext of a request from the magistrates of Geneva, placed a garrison in that city. According to the articles of a former treaty, Geneva, in case of hostilities between France and Savoy, had bound herself to receive no garrison from any power within her walls. Some troops of ours having entered the town were obliged to evacuate it immediately; and the executive council, urged on by Clavière, formerly banished from Geneva, and anxious to see the revolution get footing there, ordered Montesquieu to enforce the execution of the treaty; and further enjoined him to place a garrison there himself, which was to imitate the conduct objected to against the Bernese. Montesquieu, however, knowing that he had not the means of taking Geneva, and that by violating the neutrality he provoked a war with Switzerland, opened the east of France, and exposed the right flank of our defence, resolved, at the same time, to intimidate Geneva, and endeavour to persuade the executive council to desist from their present plan. He therefore imperatively demanded the departure of the Bernese troops, and tried to convince the French ministry that they could not, in prudence, exact any further concessions. His intention was, in case of extremity, to bombard Geneva, and make a rapid march into the Pays de Vaud, and thus throw it into a state of revolution. But Geneva consented to the departure of the Bernois troops, on condition that Montesquieu would retire ten leagues, with which he immediately complied. This concession was condemned at Paris; and Montesquieu, placed at Carouge in the midst of Genevese exiles, who were anxious to be restored to their country, and harassed by the fear of embroiling France and Switzerland, and that of disobeying the executive council, who in this instance proved themselves wanting both in military and political wisdom, was certainly most perplexingly situated. The negotiation between him and Paris was necessarily very much prolonged from the distance which separated them, and it was not terminated at the end of October.

Such was the situation of our army, from Dunkirk to Bâle, and from Bâle to Nice, in October, 1792. The frontier of Champagne had been delivered from the grand invasion; the troops employed there had moved towards Flanders, to succour Lille and invade Belgium; Kellermann took up his quarters in Lorraine; Custine separated from Biron, master of Mayence, having advanced imprudently into the Palatinate as far as Mainz, gave satisfaction to France by his conquests, terrified Germany, and exposed himself to be cut off by the Prussians, who had reascended the right bank of the Rhine, and though sick and exhausted, were nevertheless numerous, and still capable of surrounding his little army. Biron was encamped along the Rhine; Montesquieu, master of Savoy, by the retreat of the Piedmontese beyond the Alps, and preserved from fresh attacks by the falls of snow, had determined the neutrality of Switzerland, either by his arms or by his negotiations; and finally Anselme, having gained possession of Nice, and being supported by a squadron at sea, could retain his present position in spite of the swelling of the Var, and the Piedmontese posted above him at Saorgio.

Whilst the war was thus transferred from Champagne to Belgium, Dumouriez had demanded permission to come to Paris for two or three days, to concert with the ministers a plan for invading the Low Countries. His enemies declared that his object was applause, and that he quitted the duties of his command for a frivolous indulgence of vanity. These reproaches were greatly exaggerated, for his army did not suffer by his absence; simple marches might be conducted without him, and his presence was very useful to the council in devising a general plan of military operations; besides, the love of praise may easily be pardoned when it does not trench upon duty.

On the 11th of October he arrived at Paris. His situation was embarrassing, for he was not exactly at home with either of the two prevailing parties. The violence of the Jacobins repelled him; and he had committed a deadly breach with the Girondists, by driving them a few months before from the ministry. Yet he was very well received, and especially by Roland, who always sacrificed his personal resentments to public considerations. On the 12th, he presented himself to the convention, and scarcely was his name announced, when applause and acclamations arose from all parts. He delivered a simple and energetic speech, in which he briefly retraced all the events of the campaign of the Argonne, and eulogised his own and Kellermann's troops with great warmth. His staff then presented a flag taken from the emigrants, and offered it to the assembly as an emblem of the vanity of their projects. The deputies now flocked round the general, and adjourned their sitting to give a free vent to the felicitations with which he was welcomed. The Plain, comprising the greatest part of the convention, the impartials, as they were termed, who having nothing with which to reproach him, either rupture or revolutionary lukewarmness, were most cordial in the reception they gave him. Nor were the Girondists backward in their welcome; yet, on whichever side was the fault, their reconciliation was not complete, and an air of coldness and reserve was plainly perceptible. The Mountain party, who had formerly accused him of attachment to Louis XVI., and thought him too like the Girondists in manner, merit, and the elevation of his views, observed the testimonies of favour he received from them with much ill-will, and supposed them to be more sincere than they really were.

After having waited on the convention, Dumouriez visited the Jacobin club, for this association had become so powerful, that a victorious general found it necessary to pay his court there also. It was here that public opinion in a state of ferment, formed all her notions, and settled her judgment. Was any important law, any great political question, or any revolutionary measure about to be agitated; the Jacobins hastened to open the discussion, and pass their judgment. They then communicated their views to the commune and the sections, and wrote to all the corresponding clubs; thus any opinion they might express, or any project they might form, was sure to be presented to the assembly, in the form of an address from all parts of France, and in the form of an armed petition from all the quarters of Paris. If it so happened that the municipal councils, the sections, or the other popular authorities hesitated from some remaining respect for the law, the Jacobins, who considered themselves perfectly free from all restraint, boldly solved their doubts; and no insurrection ever broke out that was not previously determined upon in this club. That of the 10th of August was the fruit of a whole month's deliberations. But besides thus taking the lead in every public question, they arrogated to themselves the power of prying with inexorable severity into all the details of the government. If a minister, a secretary, or a commissary was accused of any delinquency, messengers were immediately despatched from the Jacobins, who examined their desks, and demanded their accounts with magisterial imperiousness, and which were delivered up as to an acknowledged authority without resistance. If any complained of an act of the government, he had nothing to do but present himself to this society, and official advocates were commissioned to see justice done him. Sometimes the soldiers complained of their officers, and workmen of their employers; and on one occasion, an actress lodged her complaint against her manager, and a Jacobin demanded reparation for the seduction of his wife by one of his colleagues. Every one was anxious to attest his patriotic zeal by becoming a member of the society, and nearly all the new deputies joined it immediately on their arrival at Paris; a hundred and thirteen were added to its number in one week, and even those who had no intention of attending its sittings nevertheless demanded admission. So great was its influence, that the affiliated or corresponding clubs were accustomed to write from the provinces, to know if their representatives had caused themselves to be admitted members, and if they were assiduous in their duties. The rich sought to avert odium from their opulence, by adopting Jacobin principles, and wearing the red cap; and their equipages might be seen daily rolling up to the door of this rendezvous of equality. It often happened that whilst the hall was full of members, and the galleries crowded with spectators, immense multitudes waited at the entrance, and loudly demanded admission. Sometimes this multitude, dripping in the rain, became impatient, and then some member would stand up and demand admission for the good people who were waiting at the door. Marat was generally their advocate on these occasions; and when admission was granted, and frequently before, a crowd of men and women would rush in upon the society, and mix familiarly with its members. Its sittings were held towards the close of the day, when all the heat and fire of party, at the same time fanned and smothered at the convention, broke out with a terrible explosion. Night, the crowd, and the orators, all contributed to inflame the passions; and frequently when a sitting was prolonged, interminable confusion and tumult ensued; and the disturbers of the public peace wrought up their courage for some desperate enterprise on the next day. Yet this society, so ripe for demagogic excesses, had not yet reached its climax. The equipages of those who came to abjure the inequality of the states and conditions of men, were still permitted to drive up to its doors. Some members had indeed attempted to speak with their hats on, but they were obliged to uncover. It is true Brissot had just been expelled by a solemn vote of the house; but Pétion still continued to preside there with universal applause. Chabot, Collot-d'Herbois, and Fabre d'Eglantine were the favourite orators; Marat still appeared strange, and Chabot described him in the language of the place, as a porcupine, impervious on all sides.

Dumouriez was received by Danton, who presided during that session. He was welcomed by unanimous applauses, and the Jacobins seemed to pardon his supposed intimacy with the Girondists. He delivered a short and suitable address, and promised before the end of the month to be at the head of sixty thousand men, to conquer kings, and save their people from tyranny.

Danton, replying to him in a similar style, told him that in the affair of Sainte Menesould he had deserved well of his country; but that another career was now opening to him; that the glory of humbling crowns before the red cap with which the society had honoured him had been given into his hands, and that if he proceeded in this object, his name would figure among the most distinguished characters of France. Collot d'Herbois then harangued the general, and his speech is a good specimen of the style of that period, and shows the dispositions of the Jacobins with regard to Dumouriez.

"It is not a king, O Dumouriez, who has appointed thee to the command of the army, but thy fellow-citizens. Bear in mind that the general of a republic should serve none other. Thou hast heard of Themistocles; he, after having saved his country at Salamis, being calumniated by his enemies, was driven to seek an asylum in the land of a tyrant, who endeavoured to bribe him to take up arms against his country; his answer was a dagger in the tyrant's heart. Dumouriez, thou hast enemies, thou wilt be calumniated; remember Themistocles!

"An enslaved people look to thee for succour; thou wilt shortly deliver them. What a glorious mission!—But thou must beware of an excess of generosity towards thy enemies. Thou hast sent back the King of Prussia a little too much in the French fashion. But we hope Austria will be made to pay double.

"Thou art about to go to Brussels, Dumouriez. I see I need say nothing on this subject.—Yet if thou shouldst there find an execrable woman who came under the walls of Lille, to regale her ferocity by the spectacle of the conflagration of the city!—But this woman does not expect thee.—

"At Brussels, liberty is about to spring up under thy feet.—Men, maidens, women, and children will press around thee; what happiness art thou about to enjoy;—My wife is from Brussels, she will also embrace thee * 1"

Danton then left the club with Dumouriez, whose company he had engaged, and to whom he did the honours of the new republic. Danton having displayed as much courage at Paris as Dumouriez at Sainte Menesould, they were regarded as the two saviours of the revolution, and received joint applause whenever they appeared. An instinctive attraction seemed to unite these two men, in spite of the difference of their habits and opinions. They very well personified the eccentric aberrations of two systems of society: Danton that of the people; Dumouriez that of courts: but more fortunate than his colleague, the latter had waged a generous open war against enemies with arms in his hands, whereas the former had stained a great character by the atrocities of September.

The brilliant withdrawing rooms in which the great men of the last century, Voltaire, Diderot, D'Alembert, and Rousseau, had received the homage their splendid talents commanded, no longer existed. A simple and select society at the house of Madame Roland was now the only rendezvous of wit and distinction. Here the handsome Barbaroux, the intellectual Louvet, the grave Buzot, the brilliant Guadet, and the eloquent Vergniaud were accustomed to assemble; here a pure discourse, interesting conversations, and polished manners might still be found; here the ministers met twice a week, and partook of a plain repast, consisting of a single course. Such was the character of this republican society, which united the graces of the ancient regime with the seriousness of the new, but which shortly disappeared, and gave place to demagogic brutality. Dumouriez was invited to one of these simple entertainments, and experienced at first some embarrassment at being thus placed in the midst of his former friends, whom he had a few months before driven from the ministry, and confronted with a woman whose principles he thought too rigid, and who considered him as too licentious; but he acted his nnewed in the electoral assembly, and carried to the highest pitch ever since he found himself face to face with his jealous rival in the national convention. To an extreme petulance of temper, he united a credulous imagination, which misled him, and made him fancy conspiracies where they did not exist. He believed sincerely in his own suppositions, and endeavoured to force his friends into the same belief. But in the cold good sense of Pétion and Roland, and in the indolent impartiality of Vergniaud, he met with obstacles which greatly disconcerted him. Buzot, Barbaroux, and Guadet, without being equally credulous, believed in the evil designs of their adversaries, and seconded the attacks of Louvet by their indignation and courage. Salles, the deputy of the Meurthe, and the obstinate enemy of all anarchists, both in the constituent assembly and the convention, whose mind was tinctured with gloom and violence, was alone accessible to all the suggestions of Louvet, and believed, like him, in extensive plots devised in the commune, and reaching into foreign countries. Being both passionate zealots of liberty, Louvet and Salles could not consent to impute foreign policy to so many evil designs, they rather supposed that the mountaineers, but especially Marat, were paid by the emigrants and England, to involve the revolution in crime, dishonour, and a general confusion. Less certain as to the particular manner in which Robespierre was implicated in this plot, they nevertheless saw in him a tyrant, eaten up with pride and ambition, and advancing, by all possible means, to the supreme power.

Louvet having determined to vigorously attack Robespierre, and to give him no rest, had his speech ready on the day Roland gave in his report; he was therefore fully prepared to support his accusation when he occupied the tribune, which he did immediately after Roland.

The Girondists were already sufficiently inclined to put an evil construction on most of the late events, and to suspect the existence of a plot, where there was only a collision of violent passions; but to the credulous Louvet it was evident beyond a doubt, that a conspiracy was formed and combined in the most dangerous manner. In the increasing extravagance of the Jacobins, and in the ascendancy which the domineering pride of Robespierre had obtained among them during the year 1792, he saw circumstances confirming the truth of all his suspicions. He described Robespierre as surrounded by satellites, to whose violence he delivered over all his opponents; he declared, that he had made himself an object of idolatrous worship among his partisans, and accused him of having propagated a report before the 10th of August, that he alone could preserve the liberties of France; on the 10th, he described him as hiding himself from public observation, re-appearing after all danger had passed over; taking a most active part in the acts of the commune, in spite of his promise to accept of no place, and in full authority seating himself at the bureau of the general council; gaining an unlimited control over the multitude, urging them to commit all manner of excesses, and in their name insulting the legislative assembly, by threatening them with the besin, if they did not issue decrees; directing secretly the massacres of September, to support the municipal authority by terror; sending emissaries to all parts of France to hold up the crimes of September to imitation, and persuading the provinces to acknowledge the superiority and the authority of Paris. His object, added Louvet, was to destroy the national representation, to substitute the commune, of which he was perfect master, in its place, and to establish the government of Rome, when, under the title of municipalities or dependencies, the provinces would be subject to the metropolis. Thus being supreme in Paris, he would have had all France under his control, and would have succeeded to the throne of annihilated royalty. Seeing, however, the near approach of a new representation, he had passed from the general council to the electoral assembly, and by the influence of terror, directed its choice of deputies, hoping to become master of the national convention by means of the Paris deputation. In addition to these charges, he pointed out Robespierre as the person who had recommended to the electors that man of blood, whose incendiary placards had filled all France with astonishment and horror. This libeller, with whose name, said Louvet, he would not pollute his lips, he described as the adopted child of assassination, who possessed more courage in preaching crime and calumniating others than the timid Robespierre. As for Danton, Louvet did not include him in the present accusation, and expressed his astonishment that he had rushed to the tribune to repel an attack which was not directed against him. Yet he did not exculpate him from all the odium attached to the massacres of September; as when all the authorities, the assembly, the ministers, and the mayor lifted up their voices in vain to put a stop to those horrors, he alone, the sole minister of justice, was silent, and moreover was exempt from the calumnies with which the most upright citizens were assailed. "And can you," exclaimed Louvet, "can you, O Danton, ever wash out from your reputation, in the eyes of posterity, this dishonourable exception." These imprudent but noble expressions were followed by great applause.

This accusation, though it gave general satisfaction, was nevertheless interrupted by frequent murmurs; one word in particular frequently repeated during the sitting, had repressed them. "Command silence for me," said he, "for I am about to probe the wound." "Go on," replied Danton, "probe it;" and every time that murmurs arose, "Silence," cried they, "silence ye wounded."

Louvet then resumed his accusation. "Robespierre," cried he, "I accuse you of having calumniated and proscribed the most honourable citizens, of having made yourself an object of idolatry to your partisans, and of having given out that you were the only man capable of saving the country; I accuse you of having slandered, insulted, and persecuted the national representation; of having tyrannised over the electoral assembly of Paris, and of having aimed at the acquisition of supreme power, by spreading calumny and terror around you, and resorting to every species of violence; and I demand a committee to examine into your conduct." Louvet then proposed the passing of a law which should condemn to banishment all those who should make their names rallying points of divisions in the state; to which he added another proposition: viz., that the armed force of the nation should be placed at the disposition of the minister of the interior. "Finally," said he, "I demand an immediate decree of accusation against Marat!—gods!" exclaimed he, "gods! I have at last named him!"

Robespierre, stunned by the applauses with which his adversary was saluted, attempted to make some reply to his accusations; in the midst of the uproar and murmurs of indignation excited by his presence, he hesitated, his countenance became pale, and his voice faltered; yet he succeeded in making himself heard, and demanded time to prepare his defence. This was granted, and his defence was adjourned to the 5th of November. This was a fortunate delay for him, for the assembly were wrought up to a high pitch of indignation by the eloquence of Louvet.

In the evening this caused a great sensation at the Jacobin Club, who passed judgment upon every sitting of the Convention. A host of members hastened thither, almost at their wits' end, to narrate the horrible conduct of Louvet, and demanded his immediate expulsion. He had, said they, calumniated the society, criminated Danton, Santerre, Robespierre, and Marat, demanded an accusation against the two last, proposed sanguinary laws hostile to the liberty of the press, and finally suggested the renewal of the ostracism of Athens. Legendre observed that his attack was a got-up affair (un coup monté), as he had previously prepared his speech, and that the report of Roland was undoubtedly only brought forward to introduce this diatribe. Fabre d'Églantine complained that "the slanders of those who made a virtue of calumniating Paris and the patriots increased every day. From petty conjectures and suspicions, a vast conspiracy had been hatched, but where it existed, who were its agents, and what its means, none could tell. If any impartial man, the friend to truth, and well acquainted with, and disposed towards, both the Jacobin and Girondist parties, could be found, he surely would be able to throw some light on this subject. This man was Pétion; let him be called upon for a declaration of all he has seen, and let him decide upon the truth of the crimes imputed to the patriots. However compliant he may be to his friends, he would venture to say that their intrigues had not corrupted him; that he still remained sincere and upright, and that he should therefore be called upon to explain himself."

Merlin opposed the idea of making Pétion a judge between Robespierre and Louvet, for this would be violating equality, and making one citizen supreme over others. In other respects, Pétion was certainly highly respectable; but he was capable of erring: he was the friend of Brissot and Roland, and received Lasource, Vergniaud, Barbaroux, and all that intriguing faction who compromised the cause of liberty.

The motion of Fabre was therefore abandoned, and the younger Robespierre, affecting a tone of lamentation (as the relations of the accused used at Rome), expressed his grief at what had happened, and regretted being exempt from the calumny with which his brother was attacked. "The present moment," said he, "is full of danger; all the people are not for us; none but the citizens of Paris are yet sufficiently enlightened; the remainder are but imperfectly so. It is possible then, that innocence may fall on Monday, for the convention have listened to the long fabrications of Louvet. Citizens," cried he, "I tremble greatly; it appears to me that assassins are about to stab my brother. I have heard some say that he should perish by their hands; and another declared to me that he would be his executioner." Many members now rose, and declared that they also had been menaced by Barbaroux, by Rebecqui, and several other citizens of the tribune; and that those who menaced them said to them, "they must get rid of Marat and Robespierre." The younger Robespierre was then surrounded by the members of the club, who promised to watch over the safety of his brother; and it was agreed that all those who had friends or relations in the departments should write them an account, to explain what had happened. The younger Robespierre, before he quitted the tribune, did not fail to give vent to a falsehood, for he declared that Anacharsis Clootz had assured him that he was every day at the house of Roland, breaking lances against federalism.

The turbulent Chabot now rose. That which wounded him most in the speech of Louvet, was his attributing the 10th of August to himself and his friends, and the 2nd of September to two hundred assassins. "For myself," said Chabot, "I recollect addressing myself, on the evening of the 9th, to the gentlemen of the right side, and proposing to them the insurrection, to which they replied by a contemptuous smile. I do not see, therefore, what right they have to attribute the 10th of August to themselves. As to the 2nd of September, its authors are the same people who obtained the victory of the 10th, and followed it up with vengeance. Louvet has declared that there were not two hundred assassins; but I can assure him that I passed under an arch of ten thousand sabres, with the messengers of the legislative assembly; and among this multitude I recognised more than a hundred and fifty federalists. There are no such things as crimes in revolutions; and Marat, who had been so frequently accused, is only persecuted on account of revolutionary acts. To-day, Marat, Danton, and Robespierre are accused; to-morrow, it will be Santerre, Chabot, and Merlin."

Emboldened by these hardy expressions, a federalist presented himself to the club, and acknowledged, which no one had as yet dared to do, that he had done business with a great number of his comrades at the prisons, but that he believed none but conspirators and forgers of false assignats were put to death; that he thanked the society for the goodwill they had ever testified towards them, and that, the army being about to quit Paris on the morrow, they were unwilling to leave the patriots exposed to such great perils.

This frightful declaration terminated the sitting. Robespierre did not appear during the whole week, being engaged in preparing his defence, leaving to his partisans the task of acting upon public opinion. Meantime the commune persisted in their old system, and pursued the same line of conduct as before. It is said that they had taken ten millions of francs out of the chest of the treasurer of the civil list; and they even now were busy in circulating a petition through the forty-four municipalities against the project of giving a guard to the convention. Barbaroux proposed the passing of four formidable acts, which were perfectly adapted to accomplish their object :

By the first, the capital ought to be deprived of the right of national representation, the moment she became unable to protect it against insult or violence.

By the second, the federalists and national gardes were ordered, in concert with the armed sections of Paris, to mount guard over the national representation and the other public establishments.

By the third, the convention was constituted a court of justice to pass sentence on all conspirators.

And by the fourth, the convention dissolved the municipality of Paris.

These four acts were certainly well adapted to the circumstances of the period, and were well calculated to avert the danger of the moment, but in order to pass them it was requisite to possess that power which could only be the result of the acts themselves. To effect the consequences of energy, energy itself is required, and every moderate party who desires to stop a violent party in its career is confined within a vicious circle, the limits whereof it can never pass. Undoubtedly the majority, who inclined to the opinions of the Girondists, could have passed these decrees, but that very moderation which gave such a tendency to their inclinations, made them dilatory, temporising, distrustful of the future, and averse to vigorous measures. A decree of a less energetic nature, the first of those which had been confided to the committee of nine for their approval, had been lately rejected. This latter had been proposed by Buzot, and was directed against the concealed authors of the scenes of September. By this decree, a direct instigation to murder or pillage was made punishable by death, and an indirect one by ten years' imprisonment; the first the majority deemed too severely retaliatory, and the latter too vaguely defined. In vain did Buzot repeat that there existed a necessity for revolutionary, and consequently arbitrary measures, to subdue adversaries who were at open war with the assembly. He was not listened to; revolutionary measures were what the majority condemned in the Jacobin party, and therefore were not likely to tolerate them when employed against that society. The consideration of this law was adjourned, and the committee of nine, appointed to devise means of securing the public tranquillity, were thus rendered useless. The assembly, nevertheless, displayed somewhat more energy in repressing the extravagances of the commune. They then appeared to defend their authority with a kind of jealousy and vigour. The council-general of the commune was called before the bar of the assembly, to explain their conduct in disseminating a petition against the project of a departmental guard. In justifying themselves, they were not, said the assembly, the same council as that of the 10th of August; there were then among them, they avowed, many equivocal characters, who justly were amenable to accusation, but asserted that they were no longer in any way connected with those individuals; they begged the assembly not to confound the innocent with the guilty, and solicited that confidence from them of which they stood so much in need, and by means of which alone they should be enabled to establish that tranquillity in the public mind, which was so necessary to the convention, before they could frame laws for the good of the community. As to the petition, they declared that it was at the suggestion of the sections it had been sent into the provinces; that they were merely subordinates, but that they would engage to desist from this practice.

This submission disarmed even the Girondists, and at the request of Gensonné the honours of the sitting were accorded to the council-general. If, however, this tractability of the heads of the council might gratify the pride of the assembly, so far as concerned the truest sentiments of the Parisians it could do nothing. The turbulence of the people increased as the 5th of November approached, the day fixed for the defence of Robespierre. On the previous evening, contradictory reports were afloat; bands paraded the city, some crying out "to the guillotine with Robespierre, Danton, and Marat;" and others crying out "Death to Roland, Lasource, and Guadet." It was made the subject of a formal complaint of the Jacobins, that nothing was spoken of but these exclamations against Robespierre, Danton, and Marat. These exclamations were imputed to dragoons and federalists, who were then devoted to the convention. The younger Robespierre again appeared in the tribune, again lamented the dangers to which innocence was exposed, and rejected a plan of conciliation proposed by a member of the society, by saying that the adverse party was decidedly counter-revolutionary, that neither peace nor truce could be made with them, that undoubtedly innocence would perish in the struggle, but that it was better she should sacrifice herself, and Maximilian Robespierre be permitted to fall, when it was considered that the destruction of one single individual did not involve that of liberty itself. These fine sentiments were loudly applauded, and the club assured the younger Robespierre that his fears were needless, and that his brother should not perish.

Complaints of quite a different nature were made in the assembly, and the menaces thrown out against Roland, Lasource, and Guadet, met with condemnation. Roland complained of the neglect of his requisitions to the department and to the commune for the purpose of obtaining an armed force. A long debate ensued; mutual reproaches took place, and the day elapsed without any measure being taken. On the day following, the 5th of November, Robespierre at last appeared in the tribune.

The crowd was immense, and the result of the solemn discussion about to be entered into impatiently awaited. The speech of Robespierre was very elaborate, and prepared with great care, and his answers to the accusations of Louvet were such as are always resorted to on similar charges. "You accuse me," said he, "of aspiring to tyrannical dominion; but to accomplish this object, there must be means, and where are my funds and my armies? You pretend that I have reared the edifice of my power in the club of the Jacobins. But how do you prove this? Is it because I command more attention, and appeal to the reason of that society with greater effect than you, that you wish in this assembly to avenge your wounded vanity? You assume that that celebrated association is degenerated; why not then demand a decree of accusation against it? I shall then be ready to stand up in its vindication, and we shall see whether you will be more successful than Leopold or Lafayette. You assert that I did not take my place in the commune till two days after the 10th, and that then I established myself, on my own authority, in the bureau. But I must inform you that I was invited some time before to become a member of the commune, and when I presented myself at the bureau, it was not to install myself in power, but to prove my legal competency. You add, that I have insulted the legislative assembly, and menaced them with the tocsin. This is false. I was indeed questioned about sounding it, and answered my interrogator that the real sounders of the tocsin were those whose injustice exasperated the minds of the people; and upon this, one of my colleagues, less reserved than the others, added, that it should be sounded. Behold the sole foundation on which my accuser has fabricated this fable? It is true that in the electoral assembly I addressed the electors, but it was previously agreed that this liberty should be allowed to all, and many availed themselves of it as well as myself. I neither accused or recommended any one. That man whom you accuse of being in my service, Marat, was never my friend, nor was he recommended by me as a deputy. If I judged of him by his accusers, he would be absolved, but I offer no opinion on this point; I shall only declare that he has always been a stranger to me, and that he never was in my house but once, when I made some observations to him upon his writings, on their exaggeration, and the regret which the patriots experienced in seeing him compromise this cause by the violence of his opinions; but he thought my views too narrow, and declared it the next day in his paper. It is therefore mere calumny to suppose me the instigator or ally of this man." Having thus replied to the personal accusations, he passed on to those which had been directed against the commune. He echoed the assertion of all its advocates, that the 2nd of September followed as a natural consequence after the 10th of August; that the exact point at which a popular insurrection should stop could not be determined; that without doubt the executions in the prisons were illegal, but that without illegal measures the yoke of despotism could never have been shaken off, and that the reproach of illegality might be applied to the whole course of the revolution; that the taking of the Bastille, and the overthrow of the throne, were both illegal acts! He then painted, in strong colours, the dangers to which Paris was at that time exposed, the indignation of the citizens, their concurrence around the prisons, and the irresistible fury with which the thought of leaving conspirators behind them to assassinate their families animated them. "It has been asserted," continued the orator, "that one innocent person has perished, one only. Citizens, bewail this cruel mistake! We have long lamented it; he was a good citizen, and one of our friends! We must deplore even the fate of those who should have been reserved for the sentence of the laws, but who fell under the sword of popular justice. But let your grief have some term. Keep some tears for still heavier calamities. Weep for the fate of a hundred thousand patriots who became the victims of tyranny! Deplore the fate of those citizens who expired in their flaming abodes, whilst their children were massacred in their cradles, or in the arms of their mothers! Weep for human nature crushed under the iron yoke of tyrants!—But, if, discarding the suggestions of vile and petty passions, you are determined to provide for the welfare of your country, console yourselves for the past, and rejoice in the prospect of the future.

"That sensibility which is interested only for the enemies of liberty, appears to me of a very suspicious nature. Cease to display before my eyes the bloody robe of a tyrant, or I shall believe you wish to put Rome again in fetters."

With this jumble of crafty logic and revolutionary declamation, Robespierre succeeded in captivating his audience, and obtained universal applause. That part of his defence which related to himself was certainly just; and the Girondists were much to blame in imputing a project of usurpation to one who merely desired to enjoy an ascendancy with his party, and construing the acts of the commune into a proof of an extensive conspiracy, when they were merely the natural effects of a strong excitement of popular passions. This line of conduct brought great odium upon the Girondists with the assembly. Gratified by seeing the leader of the pretended conspirators forced to justify himself, delighted at having to impute all the crimes of September to an inevitable insurrection, and flattering themselves by a delusive prospect of the future, the assembly determined to discard all personalities, and thereupon proposed to pass to the order of the day. But Louvet darted forwards in conflict with this determination, and demanded the liberty of reply. Many other orators came forward at the same moment, some for, and others against going to the order of the day. Barbaroux, despairing of gaining a hearing, sprang to the bar, that at least he might be heard as a petitioner. Lanjuinais proposed the immediate discussion of those important questions to which the report of Roland gave rise. At last Barrère obtained a hearing. "Citizens," said he, "if there existed in the republic any man with the genius of Caesar, the audacity of Cromwell, and the capacity of Sylla, possessing at the same time dangerous resources; if there existed any legislator among us of extraordinary genius, vast ambition, and of a reflecting mind, a general, for instance, crowned with laurels, domineering over the laws and trampling upon the rights of the people, I should move for a decree of accusation against him. But why confer such honour on characters of mere mushroom importance, on contemptible fomenters of disorder, whose civic crowns are unwreathed with cypress, whose baneful verdure will wither and die of itself!"

This singular mediator then proposed to frame the order of the day thus. "The national convention considering it their duty to devote their time solely to the interests of the republic"—"I am against," exclaimed Robespierre, "any proposition to pass to the order of the day which includes any preamble injurious to myself." The assembly therefore left out the preamble of Barrère, and passed to the order of the day without specifying their motive.

The Jacobins celebrated this victory with great rejoicings, and Robespierre was received as having obtained a complete triumph. The moment he appeared at the club, he was received with the most extravagant applause. One member requested that he might be allowed to recite the particulars of his victory, but another declared that his modesty would not permit him to undertake this recital. He himself enjoyed this enthusiastic admiration in silence, and left to others the task of adulation. He was called Aristides, his simple and masculine eloquence was highly praised, and these praises were made so conspicuously prominent as proved the knowledge his eulogisers had of his taste for this species of flattery. The convention was re-established in the good graces of the society; the triumph of truth, they said, had commenced, and that they no longer despaired of the welfare of the republic.

Barrère was now interrogated as to his expression of contemptible fomenters of disorder; and he explained himself by declaring that he intended to designate by those words, not the patriots accused with Robespierre, but their adversaries.

Such was the result of this celebrated accusation. It certainly was extremely imprudent, and very well characterized the general conduct of the Girondists. They experienced a generous indignation at the sight of crime, but this indignation was mingled with much personal resentment, and many false and chimerical suppositions, which gave those who wished to remain blind to danger, a pretext for withholding credit from their exaggerated pictures of impending calamity, and made the timid hesitate, and those who pretended to impartiality suspend their decisions; it was these three classes who composed the whole of the Plain. Pétion, however, was not carried away by the exaggerations of his party; he caused to be printed the speech he had prepared, wherein all matters were discreetly weighed. Vergniaud also, whose good sense and fastidious indolence placed him above the reach of his passions, partook not of the irregular bias of his party, and the conduct of the Girondists had no other effect than that of rendering any reconciliation between themselves and the Jacobins impossible, of having employed and expended in a profitless conflict the most powerful and yet the sum of their available resources, accusation and indignation, and of aggravating the animosity and fury of their adversaries, without obtaining a single advantage.

Wo to the conquered, when their conquerors fall out! The latter then animate their fury against their down-trodden enemies, and endeavour to surpass each other in zeal in their inflictions of vengeance. A thunder-cloud of revolutionary passions was now about to burst on the heads of the prisoners in the Temple. Monarchy, aristocracy, and all that excited the hatred of the people, appeared to be personified in the unfortunate Louis XVI. And the way in which the de-throned prince was treated, in itself was sufficient to demonstrate how much the idea of a counter revolution was abhorred. The legislative assembly, too nearly attached to the constitution which declared the king inviolable, not having dared to decide upon his fate had merely suspended or imprisoned him, they had not abolished royalty, but had committed these measures to be decided on by the convention. Royalty being abolished, a republic decreed, and the labours of framing a constitution being intrusted to the consideration of the most distinguished intellectual ornaments of the assembly, all that remained was to determine the lot of Louis XVI. Six weeks had already elapsed, and the multiplied avocations of the assembly, the well ordering of the victualling department, the superintendence of the armies, the cares of the public provisioning which was constantly defective, as is always the case in troublous times, the burden of the police, and all the burdensome details of government, which had not been, since the fall of royalty, transferred to an executive council, without extreme misgivings; lastly, violent dissensions had prevented their turning attention to the prisoners in the Temple. Once indeed the subject had been alluded to, and its consideration, we have seen, had been referred to the committee of legislation. Meantime, it formed the topic of all conversations; at the Jacobin club, every day, the judgment of Louis XVI. was called for, and the Girondists were accused of diverting attention from this subject by quarrels, in which it must be confessed each took quite as active a part as they themselves. On the first of November, during the interval which elapsed between the accusation and defence of Robespierre, a section complained of the publication of a new placard inciting to murder and pillage, and, as was always the case, the Girondists called for a trial against Marat. They assumed that he and his colleagues were the instigators of every disorder. Their enemies, on the contrary, affirmed that the origin of all disturbances was to be traced to the Temple; that the new republic could not be established, and that tranquillity and security could never be restored, till the ex-king should be immolated, and the conspirators by this terrible blow be thus deprived of all hopes of success in their designs. Jean de Bry, that deputy who in the legislative assembly proposed that the law of public safety should be the only rule of action to the national representation, on this occasion proposed that Marat and Louis XVI. should be brought to trial together. "Marat," said he, "has merited the title of man-eater; he is worthy of being a king, he is the cause of those troubles of which Louis XVI. is the pretext; let us pass sentence on them both together, and restore the public tranquillity by this double example of justice." The convention, in consequence of this representation, ordered that the charges against Marat should be prepared during the present sitting, and that in the course of eight days, at latest, the committee of legislation should give in their opinion as to the forms to be observed in the trial of Louis XVI. If at the expiration of these eight days, the committee should not have presented their report to the assembly, every member should be at liberty to discuss the question without farther delay. Fresh altercations, and fresh cares, delayed the report against Marat, which was not presented till long afterwards; but the committee were diligent in preparing their plan of proceedings against the august and unfortunate family imprisoned in the Temple.

The eyes of Europe were at this juncture anxiously fixed upon France. With astonishment did every one behold subjects, at first deemed so feeble, but now become victorious, bold enough to hurl defiance at thrones. Their evident intentions were the subject of much anxiety, and it was yet hoped their audacious policy was approaching its termination. Meantime military events were preparing, which, in their sequel, increased the intoxication of the French republicans, and spread a panic through the civilized world.

CHAPTER III.

THE SEQUEL OF DUMOURIEZ'S MILITARY OPERATIONS—ALTERATION IN THE MINISTRY, PACHE MINISTER OF WAR—VICTORY OF JEMMAPES—MORAL AND POLITICAL CONDITION OF BELGIUM; POLITICAL CONDUCT OF DUMOURIEZ—THE CAPTURE OF GHENT, MONS, BRUSSELS, AND ANTWERP; CONQUEST OF BELGIUM UP TO THE MEUSE—CHANGES IN THE MILITARY DEPARTMENT; MISUNDERSTANDING BETWEEN DUMOURIEZ, THE CONVENTION, AND THE MINISTRY—THE STATE OF OUR AFFAIRS AT THE ALPS AND THE PYRENEES.

Dumouriez set out for Belgium towards the end of October, and on the 25th arrived at Valenciennes. His general plan of operations was regulated in conformity to his favourite idea, that of attacking the enemy in front, and thus taking advantage of their great numerical superiority, to increase the glory of his own triumphs. It was possible, by following the course of the Meuse with the greatest part of his army, to hinder the junction of Clerfaut, who had just arrived from Champagne, to attack the Duke d'Albert in the rear, and to execute that which he had formerly omitted to do, by neglecting to direct his march upon the Rhine, and from the Rhine to Cleves; but his plan did not then admit of this movement, and he preferred a brilliant action, which redoubled the courage of his soldiers, already excited by the cannonade of Valmy, to a skilful march. The cannonade of Valmy had already destroyed that opinion which had prevailed in Europe for fifty years, that the French, though admirably adapted for a coup-de-main, were incapable of gaining a pitched battle. The enemy's superiority of number afforded him an opportunity of making a fair trial of his present plan, and this idea was quite as talented as the manœuvres which he was reproached for not adopting. Yet he neglected nothing to turn the enemy's flank, and to prevent the junction of Clerfaut. Valence, stationed for this purpose along the Meuse, was ordered to march from Givet upon Namur and Liège, with the army of Ardennes, eighteen thousand strong. D'Haville, with twelve thousand men, received orders to march between the grand army and Valence, to turn the enemy at a nearer point. Such were the dispositions of Dumouriez on his right; on his left, Labourdonnaie, quitting Lille, was ordered to traverse the coast of Flanders, and seize upon all its maritime towns. On his arrival at Antwerp, he was commanded to keep along the Holland frontier, and take up his station on the Meuse at Ruremonde. Belgium was thus perfectly enclosed in a circle. Dumouriez occupied the centre, with a mass of forty thousand men, and was ready to overwhelm the enemy at the first point where they could make head against the French.

Impatient to open the campaign, and to commence upon the vast career, whither his ardent imagination had transported him, Dumouriez endeavoured to hasten the arrival of the stores he had been promised from Paris; and which should have reached Valenciennes on the 25th. Servan had given up the ministry of the war department, preferring the less turbulent functions of a military command, to the confusion and anarchy of the present administration; he added to his experience, and restored his health in his camp at the Pyrenees. At the recommendation of Roland, Pache, a man of simplicity, talents, and industry, who had formerly quitted France to reside in Switzerland, was chosen as his successor. This minister had, at the commencement of the revolution, returned to France; he gave up a pension he had received from the Marshal de Castries, and distinguished himself greatly in the office of the interior, by extraordinary talent and application to business. Carrying in his pocket a piece of bread, and not even quitting the office to take his meals, his diligence and simple habits completely captivated Roland. Servan had demanded his assistance during his difficult administration of August and September, and Roland parted with him with much regret. Pache was equally zealous and industrious in this post as in the former, and when the ministry of the war department became vacant, he was immediately proposed to fill it, as one of those retired but praiseworthy beings who are entitled by justice and the public interest to rise rapidly in estimation. Pache, who by his retiring and modest manners gained the favour of all who conversed with him, could not fail to be universally acceptable. The Girondists naturally expected that a man so calm and prudent would be moderate in his political views, and counted on the co-operation of one who owed his rise to their good offices. The Jacobins, who perceived in his manners much deference towards themselves, praised his modesty, and contrasted it with the pride and inflexibility of Roland. Dumouriez, for his part, was delighted with a minister who appeared more manageable than the Girondists, and more disposed to adopt his own views. He had indeed new causes of complaint against Roland. This latter had written him a letter, in which he reproached him with endeavouring to force his plans on the ministry. Roland, however, was a generous adversary, and what he gave vent to in a private correspondence, he would have disputed in public. But Dumouriez, mistaking the upright intentions of Roland, made his complaints to Pache, who received them willingly, and consoled him with flattery, and mistrust of his colleagues. Such was the new minister of war. Placed between the Jacobins, the Girondists, and Dumouriez, and giving an attentive ear to the complaints of each, he gained the favour of all by his soft speeches and compliant manners, and each party hoped to find in him a supporter and a friend.

Dumouriez attributed the delay of the arrival of stores to this change of ministry; not more than the half of what he had been promised had yet reached him, and he renewed his march without waiting for the rest; writing to Pache, at the same time, that it was indispensably necessary that thirty thousand pairs of shoes, twenty-five thousand blankets, camp equipage for forty thousand men, and two millions of money in specie, to pay the soldiers, as the assignats would not pass in an enemy's country, should be sent him without delay. A compliance with all these demands was instantly promised, and Dumouriez, exciting the ardour of his troops, and encouraging their hopes of a speedy and certain conquest, advanced rapidly, although destitute of the necessary stores for the maintenance of a campaign entered on in the winter, and ill-protected from the inclemency of the climate.

The march of Valence being retarded by a diversion on Longwy, and by a want of military stores, which he was not furnished with till November, permitted Clerfaut to pass from Luxembourg into Belgium without impediment, and to join the Duke d'Albert with twelve thousand men. Dumouriez, renouncing, for the moment, the idea of availing himself of the co-operation of Valence, ordered the division of General d'Harville to approach nearer to head-quarters, and then, marching through Quarouble and Quiervain, he hastened to encounter the enemy. D'Albert, faithful to the Austrian system, had formed a line from Tournay to Mons; and although he had an army of thirty thousand men, he could hardly collect twenty thousand before the latter city. Dumouriez arrived, on the 3rd of November, before the mill of Bossu, and ordered his advance guard, commanded by the brave Beurnonville, to drive off the enemy posted on the heights. This attack, though successful at first, was afterwards repulsed, and his advance guard were obliged to retire. Dumouriez, feeling how important it was that his troops should receive no check in the commencement of the campaign, ordered Beurnonville in advance again, routed all the enemy's outer posts, and on the evening of the 5th found himself in presence of the Austrians, who were entrenched upon the heights which overlook the city of Mons.

On these heights, which take a circular form before the place, are situated three villages, Jemmapes, Cuesmes, and Berthaimont. The Austrians, who expected to be attacked in this position, had formed the imprudent resolution to maintain it, and had long been diligently employed in rendering it as difficult of access as possible. Clerfaut occupied Jemmapes and Cuesmes; a little further on, Beaulieu was encamped below Berthaimont. Steep declivities, wood, felled trees, fourteen redoubts, a formidable line of artillery ranged in tiers, and twenty thousand men, protected these positions, and made them almost inaccessible. Tyrolese sharp-shooters were posted in the woods, which extended along at the foot of the hills. The cavalry placed in the valleys which divided them, and more particularly in that which separates Jemmapes from Cuesmes, held themselves in readiness to débouche and charge upon our columns so soon as they should be disordered by the fire of the batteries.

It was in the face of this camp, so strongly fortified, that Dumouriez established himself. He drew up his army in the form of a semicircle, facing the enemy's position. General d'Harville, who had joined the principal force on the evening of the 5th, was posted on the extreme left of our line. On the morning of the 6th, he was ordered, by keeping along the positions of Beaulieu, to get round at the back, and seize upon the heights behind Mons, the only retreat to which the Austrians could have recourse. Beurnonville, forming then the right of the attack, received orders to march upon the village of Cuesmes. The Duke de Chartres, who served in the French army with the rank of general, and who commanded the centre, was directed to approach Jemmapes in front, and to attempt at the same time to gain possession of the vale which separates Jemmapes from Cuesmes. Finally, General Ferrand, commanding the left, received instructions to pass through a little village called Quaregnon, and march upon the skirts of Jemmapes. All these attacks were to be executed by battalion columns, and the cavalry were ready to support them in rear and in flank. Our artillery was so disposed as to open a fire upon all the enemy's redoubts in flank, and, if possible, to silence the fire of their artillery. A reserve of infantry and cavalry was stationed behind the brook of Wame, where they awaited the event of the engagement.

During the nights of the 5th and 6th, General Beaulieu proposed making a sudden sally from the trenches upon the French, and thus put them to the rout by an unexpected and nocturnal assault. This energetic proposition was not complied with, and at six o'clock in the morning the French were drawn up in battle array, animated with hope and intrepidity, though under a murderous fire, and within sight of intrenchments almost impregnable. Sixty thousand men covered the field of battle, and a hundred pieces of artillery roared responsive in front of both armies.

The cannonade commenced early in the morning. Dumouriez ordered the generals Ferrand and Beurnonville to commence the attack, whilst he himself waited in the centre for the proper moment to bring it into action; and d'Harville, keeping along the positions of Beaulieu, hastened to cut off all possibility of retreat from the enemy. Ferrand conducted his attack inefficiently, and Beurnonville did not succeed in silencing the fire of the Austrians. It was already eleven o'clock, and the enemy was not yet sufficiently disconcerted in flank to justify an assault in front. Dumouriez then dispatched his faithful Thouvenot to the left wing with an additional force, to decide the day. Thouvenot, ordering the cessation of an ineffectual cannonade, traversed Quaregnon, and marching silently and secretly round by Jemmapes with fixed bayonets, ascended its height, and reached the flank of the Austrians. Dumouriez being informed of this movement, resolved to commence his attack in front, and advanced the centre directly upon Jemmapes. The infantry marched forward in column, and the hussars and dragoons were so posted as to cover the vale between Jemmapes and Cuesmes, where the enemy's cavalry were stationed, ready to dart forward at a moment's notice. The French troops traversed without hesitation the intermediate space, except one brigade, who, seeing the Austrian cavalry issue from their covert, were thrown into confusion, retrograded, and discovered the flank of our column. At this moment the youthful Baptiste Renard, a servant of Dumouriez, incited by that intrepidity and prompt sagacity which a critical emergency so frequently calls forth, hastened to the general of this brigade, reproached him with his pusillanimity, pointed out to him the danger, and succeeded in leading him back to the valley. The centre was now observed to waver; and our battalions began to give way under the fire of the batteries. The Duke de Chartres rallied his troops, placed himself in the midst of a battalion, which he named at the moment, the Battalion of Jemmapes, and advanced undauntedly upon the enemy. The attack was then renewed with redoubled vigour, and Clerfaut already assailed in flank, and menaced in front, nevertheless resisted with heroic firmness.

Dumouriez observing all these movements, but still doubtful of success, hastened to the right, where the battle was still undecided in spite of the efforts of Beurnonville. He determined now either to bring the combat on this point to a sudden and decisive issue in his favour, or to recall the right wing to protect the retreat of the centre, if a retrograde movement should become necessary.

Beurnonville, having exhausted all his efforts against the village of Cuesmes, was about to retreat, when Dampierre, who commanded one point of the attack, taking with him a few companies, intrepidly threw himself into the midst of the redoubt. Dumouriez arrived at the moment Dampierre had executed this bold attempt; he found the remainder of his battalions without their general, exposed to a terrible fire from the enemy, and wavering in presence of the imperial hussars, who were about to charge them. These were the battalions who at the camp of Maulde had become so strongly attached to Dumouriez. He reanimated their courage, and exhorted them to remain firm against the enemy's cavalry. A discharge of musketry arrested the charge of the enemy's cavalry for the moment, and the hussars of Berchini coming up opportunely, put them to flight altogether. Dumouriez then placing himself at the head of his battalions, and chaunting with them the song of the Marseillais, led them forward with rapidity, got possession of the entrenchments, carried all before him, and seized upon the village of Cuesmes.

This exploit being completed, Dumouriez galloped off to the centre, followed by a few squadrons, but before he arrived there, the Duke de Montpensier met him, and announced the victory of the centre, attributable principally to the exertions of his brother the Duke de Chartres. Thus Jemmapes being besieged in flank and in front, and Cuesmes being carried, Clerfaut could no longer resist, and was obliged to retreat. He quitted his position after a noble defence, leaving Dumouriez a dearly bought victory. It was now two o'clock; the troops were exhausted with fatigue, and demanded a short interval of rest. Dumouriez granted it, and halted upon the heights of Jemmapes and Cuesmes. He relied upon d'Harville for the pursuit of the enemy, who had been directed to cut off the rear of the Austrians. But this order, not being sufficiently clear, or being badly understood, d'Harville remained before Berthaimont, Clerfaut retired under the protection of Beaulieu, who had not been attacked, and both took the road to Brussels, which d'Harville had left open.

In this battle the Austrians lost fifteen hundred prisoners, and four thousand five hundred killed and wounded, and the loss of the French was nearly equal. Dumouriez, however, concealed the truth, and acknowledged only the loss of a few hundreds. He was afterwards reproached with not having marched on his right, and turned the enemy on that point, and with not having assailed him in the rear instead of obstinately persisting in his attack on the left and centre. He indeed, at one time, had thoughts of following this plan, when he despatched d'Harville to keep along by Berthaimont; but he abandoned this idea; but his extreme promptitude, which often prevented deliberation, and his desire to gain a splendid victory, made him prefer at Jemmapes, and indeed during the whole campaign, an attack in front. Besides all this, with the greatest presence of mind and vigour in the midst of action, he had encouraged our troops, and imparted to them his own heroic courage. The sensation produced by this victory was prodigious. The victory of Jemmapes filled France with joy, and afforded Europe a new source of surprise. No one knew which to admire most, either the self-possession which braved the enemy's artillery, or the boldness with which the enemy's redoubts were occupied. The peril and the victory were both enlarged upon, and Europe once more confessed that French soldiers were capable of gaining great battles.

At Paris, all sincere republicans rejoiced at the news of this victory, and prepared to celebrate it with brilliant fêtes. The young Baptiste Renard, the servant of Dumouriez, was presented to the assembly, and honoured with the civic crown and an officer's epaulet. The Girondists, from feelings of justice and patriotism, applauded the success of the general. The Jacobins, although suspecting the intentions of Dumouriez, also lauded him, their praises being rather called forth by the prosperous course of the revolution, than by any sentiment of gratitude towards the general. Marat alone grumbled at their transports, and maintained that Dumouriez must have concealed his losses; that he could not even have attacked a mountain at so small a price; that he had taken neither baggage or artillery; that the Austrians had departed without molestation; that they were not defeated, but merely forced to retreat; and, mingling with this sagacity of remark a rabid spirit of calumny, he added that the attack in front had only been ordered to sacrifice the brave battalions of Paris; that his colleagues at the convention, at the Jacobin Club, and all the nation, so prompt to admire this victory, were light-headed; and that, for himself, he should pronounce Dumouriez a good general when the whole of Belgium should be subjugated without a single Austrian escaping; and a good patriot when that country should be completely revolutionized and made perfectly free. "You Frenchmen," said he, "with this inclination to admire everything off-hand, are yet constantly exposing yourselves by your inconsistency. One day you off-hand condemn Montesquieu; the next day, on hearing that he has conquered Savoy, you dote upon him. You then proscribe him again, and thus become a laughing-stock by this running backwards and forwards. As for me," continued he, "I distrust, I always accuse; and as to the inconveniences attending such a disposition, they are incomparably less than those of a contrary turn of mind, for they never compromise the public safety. Without doubt they expose me to be misunderstood by some individuals; but, considering the corruption of the age, and the many enemies liberty has to encounter, it is a thousand to one but I am right in looking upon most men as intriguers and scoundrels, ready to undertake any evil enterprise. I am, therefore, little likely to be deceived in my estimate of public functionaries; and, whilst the fatal confidence which the generality of men place in them, induces them to conspire against their country with as much audacity as security; the constant suspicion with which the public would regard them, according to my principles, would not suffer them to take one step without trembling, for fear of being unmasked and punished*."

The battle of Jemmapes opened Belgium to the French, but singular difficulties surrounded Dumouriez; and two striking pictures presented themselves to his view in the conquered territory: the French revolution being held up as an example, tended to accelerate the course of neighbouring revolutions, or assimilate them to their grand prototype; and in their army, the military code being founded on demagogue principles, no discipline could be preserved.

Belgium was divided into many parties: the first, that of the Austrian domination, was confined to the imperial army, put to flight by Dumouriez; the second, consisting of the whole nation, nobles, priests, magistrates, and people, unanimously repulsed a foreign yoke, and ardently desired to establish their independence; but this latter was subdivided again into two other parties,—the nobles, priests, and privileged orders wished to preserve the ancient institutions, distinctions of rank, the old divisions of the provinces, and finally everything in its present state, with the exception of the Austrian power, which they wished to throw off; this party were supported by the superstitious part of the population, who remained attached to the clergy. Finally, the demagogues, or Belgian Jacobins, longed for a complete revolution, to establish the sovereignty of the people. With these, absolute equality formed the basis of what they called liberty. Thus each party adopted that part of the French revolution which seemed to suit their own views. It was thought that Dumouriez would preserve a medium in his own conduct towards them. Repelling Austria, and condemning the exclusive pretensions of the privileged orders, he was yet unwilling to transplant the Jacobin principles of Paris to Brussels, and to raise up new Chabots and Marats in that city. His object then was, without subverting the ancient organization of the country, to reform the feudal parts of its institutions. The enlightened part of the population came into his views immediately, but it was difficult to unite them in one common bond, on account of the slight relationship that existed between the cities and provinces; and by convoking an assembly, there was danger lest this temperate party should be overborne by their violent opponents. Dumouriez, however, notwithstanding these difficulties, meditated, either by an alliance or an union, to attach Belgium to the French empire, and thus complete the natural boundaries of our territory. He also took great pains to prevent his soldiers from committing any outrages, either by devastating the country or destroying property, that the immense resources of the nation might be at his disposal for the prosecution of the war, and that no class of the inhabitants might be alienated from his interests, or tempted to impede the progress of his army, or otherwise frustrate his objects by hostile insurrections. His chief care was to soothe the clergy, who still possessed great influence over the minds of the people. He aimed at attaining those objects which all experience in revolutions proves are impracticable, and which every administrative and political faculty must, at the very outset, entirely renounce. We shall shortly see how his projects and plans were developed.

On entering Belgium, he pledged himself by a proclamation to respect property, persons, and the national independence. For this purpose he ordered that all public functionaries should retain their situations, that the taxes should continue to be collected, and that the first assemblies should be called together immediately, that they might form a national convention, empowered to decide on the fate of the Belgic nation.

Other weighty difficulties now arose. Motives of policy, the public welfare, and the common feelings of humanity, naturally made Dumouriez desire that a prudent and moderate revolution should take place in Belgium, but his most pressing solicitude was the subsistence of his own army. As a general, his first object was victory; discipline and resources were absolutely necessary to secure this. On entering Mons, on the morning of the 7th, in the midst of the joyful acclamations of the Brabançons, who honoured him and the brave Dampierre with a crown of victory, he found himself in the greatest embarrassment. His commissariats were still at Valenciennes; none of the promised stores had arrived. Clothing for his soldiers, almost bare, live stock, horses for the artillery, baggage waggons, and, above all, money to pay his troops, as the assignats would not pass in Belgium, were all wanting. The emigrants having circulated a great number of false assignats, they had lost all credit; besides, no nation is willing to participate in the difficulties of another, by accepting that paper which represents its debts.

The impetuosity of Dumouriez's character, which amounted frequently to imprudence, makes it very probable that he would not have remained from the 7th to the 11th at Mons, nor have suffered the Duke of Saxe-Teschen to have retired without molestation, if the details of the commissariat department had not detained him in spite of himself, and had not entirely absorbed that attention which should have been exclusively occupied with military preparations. In this difficulty he adopted a very well conceived expedient, that of making himself the medium of all commercial intercourse with the Belgians. This plan afforded him many advantages. The objects of consumption were upon the spot, and no delay had to be apprehended. These purchases interested many of the Belgians in the presence of the French army; in paying the sellers in assignats, they were interested in promoting their currency; this also dispensed with the necessity of a compulsory circulation, an important point: for every individual who receives a compulsory circulating medium regards it as stolen property by the authority who prescribes it, and this is the sure way to damnify it in the eyes of the public. He also entertained another plan, that of borrowing money from the clergy on the security of the French nation. This would have afforded him funds in specie, and although it seemed to bear hard upon the ecclesiastical body, it was calculated to inspire them with confidence, by acknowledging their existence as an order, and the personal nature of their property. Finally, France having to demand of the Belgians the liquidation of the expenses of a war undertaken to procure their freedom, the sums thus obtained might have repaid the clergy, so that with a small balance the whole cost of the war would have been defrayed at a very slight charge, whilst Dumouriez fulfilling the promises of his proclamation, would have subsisted his army in Belgium free of expense, without either galling the inhabitants, or disorganizing their government. But these plans only demonstrated great talent, and, in times of revolution it would seem that talent is called upon to act methodically; and either to anticipate the disorders which are about to take place and immediately retire, or else foreseeing them, to permit them to take their course, and in assenting to a state of disorder, continue to be serviceable at the head of the military or civic power. No man has ever been so detached from the affairs of the world as to be able to adopt the former line of conduct; but there has been a description of character, who, having been in an elevated station, found it practicable to be virtuous, in pursuing the latter course, it was he*, who being a member of the Committee of Public Safety, without participating in its public acts, dedicated himself to the labours of the war department, and organized the means of obtaining victory, which, under every form of government, is deemed honourable, legitimate, and under every circumstance, patriotic.

Dumouriez, in his financial operations, and his mercantile arrangements with the Belgians, obtained much assistance from Malus, the commissary of war, a man skilful and active, who had gained his esteem by his useful talents, and whose accounts the general did not therefore inspect with much accuracy; he also employed d'Espagnac, formerly a libertine abbé, one of those corrupt intellectuals of the old regime, and one of those men whose versatile talents accommodate themselves with grace and aptitude to all occupations. Dumouriez despatched this man to the ministry to explain his plans, and to obtain the ratification of all the engagements he had entered into. He had already excited sufficient prejudice against himself by the species of administrative dictatorship he had assumed, and by the moderation he had manifested with regard to the Belgians, without allying himself to men already suspected, or, if they were not, on the eve of becoming so. At this time, in fact, a general murmur was raised against the old administrations, which were filled, said the people, with rogues and aristocrats.

After having provided for the subsistence of his soldiers, Dumouriez turned his attention to accelerating the march of Labourdonnais. This general having obstinately persisted in remaining in the rear, did not enter Tournay till very late, and then took part in scenes worthy of the Jacobins, and levied heavy contributions. Dumouriez ordered him to march rapidly on Ghent and the Scheldt on his way to Antwerp, and then to complete the circuit of the country to the Meuse. Valence finally arrived in line, after many involuntary delays, and immediately received orders to reach Nivelles on the 13th or 14th. Dumouriez, believing that the Duke de Saxe-Teschen had retired behind the canal of Vilvorden, directed that Valence, by going round the forest of Soignies should get behind this canal, and there should receive the duke at the passage of the Dyle.

On the 11th Dumouriez left Mons, and came up slowly with the enemy, who retired with order, but also very leisurely. From the delay of his baggage and stores, he was not able to arrive in time to make up for the many days he had unavoidably lost. On the 13th, however, advancing with only the advanced guard, he found himself unexpectedly in the midst of the enemy at Anderlecht, and hardly escaped being surrounded; but with his usual promptitude and courage he drew up his men, and arranged the few pieces of artillery he had with him in such a manner as to make the Austrians believe that he occupied the field of battle with his whole army. He thus succeeded in checking the enemy and gained time for the arrival of his main body, who hearing that he was in jeopardy, hastened with all speed to relieve him.

On the 14th he entered Brussels, and there was again impeded by the same commissariat embarrassments, having neither coin or any of those resources necessary for the maintenance of his troops. Here he learnt that the ministry had refused to consent to any of the contracts he had made with the exception of one, and that all the old military commissariat establishments had been replaced by a committee called the committee of supply.

This committee had alone, for the future, the right of entering into contracts, and making purchases for the supply of the armies, and no general was allowed in any way to interfere with their proceedings. This was the first measure of a revolution which was about to introduce a complete temporary disorganization into all the departments of the administration of the country.

Those departments of government which require long study to fulfil their duties, are commonly the last affected by a revolution, because they are less the objects of ambition, and there is an absolute necessity that persons competent to fill such situations should be preserved from revolutionary fury. Thus hardly any change had taken place in the staffs of the army, in the offices of the several ministries, in the commissariat department, and especially in the naval administration, which of all others requires a peculiar kind of knowledge and information. But a cry was now raised against the aristocrats who filled these several offices, and the executive council were reproached with not having removed them and substituted other officers in their place. The administration against which the most violent outcries were raised was the commissariat. The commissaries, who taking advantage of the troubled state of public affairs, exacted the most exorbitant prices for their goods, which they took care should be of a very inferior description, and who robbed the nation with unparalleled effrontery, became objects of just and bitter reproaches. The deputy Cambon of Montpellier was their most implacable adversary. Passionately attached to financial studies, and watchful in preserving the public economy, this deputy had obtained a great ascendancy in questions of this nature, and possessed the entire confidence of the assembly. Although a decided democrat, he had loudly inveighed against the exactions of the commune, and astonished those who did not perceive that he condemned, as a financier, those disorders which as a Jacobin he would have pardoned. He declaimed with great energy against the commissaries, and sought to bring them to punishment with all that violence of temper for which he was remarkable. He daily brought to light new frauds; and in demanding their prevention in future, he found his audience all of one mind; all honest men desired the punishment of delinquents, the Jacobins were eager to persecute the aristocrats, and intriguing characters were delighted at the prospect of so many places becoming vacant.

The idea of a committee of supply, which we have before alluded to, was then started. It was thought that this committee, forming one body, and made responsible, would prevent the state being imposed upon by the frauds of individual commissaries, and by laying in stores of every description, would not be subject, in a moment of need, to purchase supplies at an exorbitant price, which ministers had hitherto been obliged to do; for the commissaries, forming a combination, always refused to sell their goods under the standard price they might fix among themselves. This institution was established with the concurrence of all the ministers, and Cambon was particularly its chief partisan; more especially, as this new and simple process was in accordance with his vigorous turn of mind. It was, therefore, immediately signified to Dumouriez that in future he was forbidden to form any contracts in his own name, and that those he had already entered into must be immediately annulled. At the same time the commissariat fund was suppressed, and the assembly made some difficulty in paying out of the national treasury a sum which a Belgian merchant had lent to the army, on the security of a promissory note from Dumouriez.

This change in the commissariat department, which was certainly effected with laudable intentions, unfortunately, in concurrence with other circumstances, turned out extremely disastrous in its effects. Servan, during his ministry, had to provide for the subsistence and other wants of the troops which were so hastily assembled in Champagne; and it was as much as he could do to furnish the necessary supplies at that embarrassing moment. After the campaign of the Argonne, the stores collected with so much labour were found to be exhausted; the volunteers who had left their homes with a single coat were almost naked; each army required a perfect equipment; and this new requisition was to be complied with in the midst of winter, and in spite of the rapidity of the Belgian invasion. Pache, the successor of Servan, had then a difficult task to accomplish; but unfortunately, although diligent and talented, he was also weak and supple, and being disposed to gain the favour of all, especially the Jacobins, possessed no commanding authority over any one, and his ministry was perfectly destitute of that decisive vigour which the exigencies of the moment made so necessary. If to the pressing necessities of the army we join the consideration of the difficulties incident to the winter season, the urgent call for extreme promptitude, the weakness of the new minister, the general disorder of the state, and consequently of the whole revolution in the administrative system, we may form some idea of the confusion of this moment, the destitution of the armies, their bitter complaints, and the violent reproaches which were interchanged between the generals and the ministers.

The news of these changes of administration excited the indignation of Dumouriez in a very high degree. Whilst the new system was organizing, he saw his army exposed to perish through privations, if the contracts he had entered into were not fulfilled. He took upon himself, then, the responsibility of enforcing them, and ordered his agents, Malus, d'Espagnac, and a third named Petit Jean, to superintend their execution. He wrote at the same time to the ministry in so lofty a tone as increased the suspicions of the demagogues, who were disgusted at his lukewarmness, and at the administrative dictatorship he appeared to assume. He declared that he would not continue his services without he was allowed to provide as he thought proper for the wants of his army. He maintained that the committee of supply was an absurdity; that they would be obliged to transport with great labour from a distance that which he could furnish himself with, with more facility, on the spot; that this transportation would be attended with enormous expense, and be subject to delays, during which his army might perish of hunger, cold, and privation; that the Belgians, according to the proposed system, would lose all interest in the presence of the French troops in their country, and would no longer favour the circulation of assignats; that the speculations of commissaries would in no wise be prevented, as the facility of robbing the state by affixing exorbitant prices to goods would always call into existence public speculators; that nothing could prevent the members of the committee of supply becoming interested speculators, in spite of all the prohibitions of the law; that thus their proposed plan was nothing more than a mere dream of economy, which, even if it were not chimerical, would, at the moment, be attended with the most disastrous effects, by interrupting the services of public officers. The composition of the committee of supply, which was filled by the creatures of the minister Clavière, whom he believed to be selected from motives of distrust, exercised by the Girondists towards himself, also greatly irritated Dumouriez. Yet this selection was one certainly made in good faith, and approved of by all parties, and certainly had no reference whatever to party feeling.

Pache, as a firm and patriotic minister, should have endeavoured to satisfy Dumouriez, for the sake of the republic. For this purpose it was necessary to examine his demands, to attend to those which were just, to reject the rest, and conduct everything with authority and vigour, so as to silence reproaches and disputes, and prevent confusion. Far, however, from acting this part, Pache, already reproached with inefficiency by the Girondists, and therefore somewhat alienated from them, allowed the general, the Girondists, and the convention, to continue their altercations. At the council he read those inconsiderate letters of the general, in which he complained of the suspicions of the Girondist ministers; at the convention they promulgated his imperious demands, in which he offered his resignation in case they were not complied with. Concurring nothing, but explaining nothing, and putting on the hypocritical semblance of fidelity, his communications produced the most disastrous effects. The Girondists, the convention, and the Jacobins, were all offended at the lofty tone of the general. Cambon thundered his invectives against Malus, d'Espagnac, and Petit Jean; mentioned the prices of their articles, which were exorbitant; deplored the shameful luxury in which d'Espagnac indulged; enumerated the former delinquencies of Petit Jean, and induced the assembly to impeach all three. He pretended that Dumouriez was surrounded by intriguers, from whom he should be immediately freed; he maintained that the committee of supply was an excellent institution; that to provision the army from the theatre of war would be robbing the trades of France, and exposing the country to mutinies for want of work; that as to the assignats, no address was necessary to force their currency; that the general was to blame in not authoritatively enforcing their reception, and in not transporting the French revolution into Belgium with all its financial and other systems; that the Belgians to whom France had given liberty should accept of it with all its advantages and disadvantages. At the tribune of the convention Dumouriez was looked upon as the dupo of his agents; but at the Jacobin club, and in Marat's newspaper, he was thought to be in concert with them, and even to be a partaker of their robberies, a suspicion which rests upon no probability but that of the frequent examples of other generals.

Dumouriez was obliged to deliver up his commissaries, and was himself personally affronted by their being arrested in spite of the assurance of protection he had given them. Pache assured him, with his accustomed smoothness of language, that his demands should be examined, that his wants should be provided for, and that for this purpose the committee of supply had already made considerable purchases; he announced at the same time numerous arrivals of stores which had never taken place. Dumouriez not receiving them, complained incessantly; so that in reading the letters of the minister one would have thought that every thing was in abundance, and in reading those of the general that he was perfectly destitute. Dumouriez had recourse in his difficulties to many expedients, and among others to borrowing money from the chapters of churches; he subsisted also for some time on a purchase of Malus, which, in consideration of his pressing necessities, he was permitted to make use of. He had been now kept at Brussels from the 14th to the 19th.

Meantime Stengel, detached with the advanced guard, had taken Malines; this was an important capture, on account of the ammunition in powder and arms of all descriptions which this place contained, and which indeed was the arsenal of Belgium. Labourdonnaie had entered Antwerp on the 18th, where he established clubs, and alienated the Belgians by the encouragement he gave to popular agitations; meanwhile he conducted the siege of the citadel but very feebly. Dumouriez, no longer able to endure a lieutenant so much occupied with clubs and so little by war, replaced him by Miranda, an intrepid Peruvian, who had arrived in France during the revolution, and had attained to a high rank in the army through the friendship of Pétion. Labourdonnaie, deprived of his command and recalled into the department of the north, omitted nothing to excite the zeal of the Jacobins against César Dumouriez. This was the name which was already given to the general.

The enemy, on his repulse from Femmepes, had first meditated taking up his position behind the canal of Vilvorden, and keeping up a communication with Antwerp. He thus committed the same error that Dumouriez had fallen into by attempting to approach the Scheldt, instead of hastening to the Meuse, which they should have both done, the one to retire, and the other to prevent the retreat. Finally Clerfaut, who had assumed the command, felt the necessity of speedily repassing the Meuse, and abandoning Antwerp to its fate. Dumouriez then directed Valence to march from Nivelles upon Namur, and to besiege that place, and in this he certainly committed a very serious error, for he should rather have despatched him to the other side of the Meuse to cut off the retreat of the Austrians; the defeat of the defensive army would naturally have led to the reduction of Namur. But the new system of war had hardly been begun to be known, and Dumouriez proved himself in this instance, as in many others, deficient in reflection. He left Brussels on the 19th; on the 20th, he marched through Louvain; and on the 22nd, came up with the enemy, and cut off four or five hundred of his troops. Here again absolute want of necessary provisions stopped him; he started again on the 26th, and on the 27th arrived before Liège, and was warmly engaged with the rear-guard of the enemy at Varoux. General Staray, who commanded it, defended himself nobly, and received a mortal wound. Finally, on the morning of the 28th, Dumouriez entered Liège, amidst the acclamations of the people, who, in that city, were extremely friendly to the revolution. Miranda took the citadel of Antwerp on the 29th, and could now complete the circuit of Belgium, by marching straight to Ruremonde. Valence occupied Namur on the 2nd of December. Clerfaut directed his march towards Roer, and Beaulieu towards Luxembourg.

The whole of Belgium, as far as the Meuse, was now occupied, but it still remained to subdue the territory extending to the Rhine, and great hindrances here presented themselves to Dumouriez. Either from the difficulty of transporting stores in the winter season, or through official negligence, nothing had yet reached his army, and although provisions were abundant at Valenciennes, they were wanting altogether on the Meuse. Pasche, to satisfy the Jacobins, had thrown open the desks of his office for their inspection, and the greatest disorder prevailed there. All official duty was neglected, and, owing to inattention, the most contradictory orders were given. All business was thus fatally impeded, and whilst the minister believed that the stores had already reached their destination, the operations of Dumouriez were suspended from absolute want. The institution of the committee of supply had greatly augmented this disorder. The new commissary, Ronsin, who succeeded Malus and d'Espagnac, found himself in the greatest embarrassment. Badly received by the army, he was frightened at the task he had undertaken, and by the orders of Dumouriez, in spite of the late decisions of the convention, he continued to make purchases on the theatre of war. By this means, the army obtained bread and meat, but clothes, carriage, money, and fodder for their cattle, they were perfectly destitute of, and their horses died daily of hunger. Another calamity afflicted the army, this was desertion. The volunteers, who, in a moment of enthusiasm, had hurried to Champagne, felt their courage cool after the danger had passed over; they were besides disgusted with the varied privations they were obliged to endure, and they deserted in companies. The body which Dumouriez personally commanded had already lost at least ten thousand men, and its numbers daily dwindled. The Belgian levies, which had been promised, never took place, for it was almost impossible to embody or discipline the different classes of a population, and the different provinces of a country, which were greatly at variance with each other. Liège was friendly to the revolution, but Brabant and Flanders observed with distrust the growing ascendancy of the Jacobins in the clubs which had been established at Ghent, Antwerp, Brussels, and other towns. The Belgians were not very cordially disposed towards our soldiers, and manifested a great unwillingness to receive their assignats; indeed they would not upon any account accept our paper money, and Dumouriez refused to give it a forced currency. Thus, although victorious, and master of the country, the French army found itself most unfortunately situated, from the combined effects of scarcity, desertion, and the dubious and almost unfavourable dispositions of the inhabitants. The convention beset by the contradictory representations of a general, who complained laughingly of his destitute situation, and of a minister who certified modestly, but with assurance, that the most abundant supplies had been sent to the army, despatched four commissaries, taken from among themselves, into Belgium, to ascertain the true state of the case. These four commissaries were Danton, Camus, Lacroix, and Cossuin.

Whilst Dumouriez was engaged, during the month of November, in occupying Belgium, as far as the Meuse, Custine, keeping near Frankfurt and the Maine, was threatened by the Prussians who had reascended the Lahn. He would have desired that the whole war should have been carried on in the neighbourhood of his army, to protect him in the rear, and enable him to repeat his irregular incursions into Germany. Thus he complained continually of Dumouriez, because he did not arrive at Cologne, and of Kellermann, because he did not march on Coblenz. We shall see, immediately, the difficulties which hindered Dumouriez advancing more speedily: and to have made it possible for Kellermann to quit his present post, Custine must have renounced those incursions on the enemy which made the galleries of the Jacobin club, and the journals, ring with acclamations, have confined himself within the limits of the Rhine, and fortifying Mayence, have occupied Coblenz himself. But he wished the other generals to take their posts behind him, that he might have the honour of assuming the offensive in Germany. Pressed by his solicitations and complaints, the executive council recalled Kellermann, replaced him by Beurnonville, and gave the latter instructions to capture Trèves whilst the season was yet much advanced, and in the heart of an impoverished country which was extremely difficult of occupation. There was only one way of carrying this enterprise into effect, and this was at first to march between Luxembourg and Trèves, and thus arrive at Coblenz, whilst Custine reached the same city by the Rhine. By this means the Prussians, not yet recovered from their defeat in Champagne, would have been crushed, and assistance have been rendered to Dumouriez, who ought by that time to have arrived at Cologne, or in case he had not arrived, could have aided him in his march thither. In this manner, Luxembourg and Trèves, cities impossible to take by main force, would have fallen by famine, cut off, as they would have been, from all possibility of succour. But Custine having persisted in his incursions into Wétéravia, and the army of the Moselle having remained in its cantonments, there was no time, at the end of November, to march against these places for the purpose of supporting Custine against the Prussians, who were now reascending the Rhine with renewed courage. Beurnonville urged these arguments, but the nation being emulous of conquest, and desirous of punishing the Elector of Trèves for his conduct towards France, Beurnonville received orders to commence the attack, which he attempted with as much spirit as if he had approved of the enterprise. But after some brilliant and well fought engagements he was obliged to renounce his undertaking and retire towards Lorraine. Thus situated, Custine found his successes on the banks of the Mayence greatly endangered, but being unwilling to acknowledge his temerity and the instability of his conquest by a retreat, he still persisted in maintaining it as long as it was possible. He had stationed a garrison of two thousand four hundred men in Frankfurt, and although this force was altogether insufficient for the protection of an open town, inhabited by a population greatly alienated by unjust impositions, he ordered the officer commanding to defend it to the last; and he himself, posted at Ober-Ysel and Hombourg, a little below Frankfort, affected a vain and ridiculous show of spirit. Such was the situation of the army in this quarter, towards the end of November and at the beginning of December.

Nothing had yet been done on the borders of the Rhine. At the Alps, Montesquieu whom we left negotiating with Switzerland, and endeavouring at the same time to make Geneva and the French ministry listen to his reasonable arguments, had been obliged to emigrate. An accusation had been directed against him, for having, so said his accusers, compromised the dignity of the nation, by allowing an article by which our troops were forced to evacuate Geneva and its neighbourhood, to be inserted in his capitulation with that city, and more especially by enforcing the execution of this article. An impeachment was launched against him, and he took refuge in Geneva. But his diplomacy was confirmed by the discretion which characterised it, and whilst he was subjected to impeachment, the ministers carried on their negotiations with Geneva, upon the terms of the fundamental articles settled by him. The troops of Berne retired; the French troops took up their cantonments within the required limits; the all-important neutrality of Switzerland was confirmed to France, and one of her frontiers was protected for many years. This important acquisition was not properly estimated, thanks to the suggestions of Clavière, and thanks also to the vanity of the parvenus, that we were diverted from the path on the eve of attaining our victories.

In the Comté de Nice, the ministry had gloriously recaptured the post of Sospello, of which the Piedmontese had, for a moment, deprived us, and which they had lately lost after sustaining a considerable check. This success was attributable to the skill of general Brunet. Our naval force, mistress of the Mediterranean, sailed to Genoa and Naples, where branches of the house of Bourbon reigned, and to all the states of Italy, to obtain their acknowledgment of the new French republic. This was not extorted from Naples till after a cannonade had been opened on the town, and our fleets returned encouraged by the concessions wrung from the enemy. In the Pyrenees every thing remained perfectly stationary. Servan, for want of means, had great difficulty in re-organizing the army of observation. In spite of the enormous expenses which the nation sustained, of a hundred and eighty to two hundred millions of francs per month, the armies of the Pyrenees, the Alps, and the Moselle, were in the same distress, by the disorganization of the service, and by the confusion which prevailed in the war department; yet, in the midst of these afflicting circumstances, the pride and intoxication of victory was still undiminished. At this juncture, the extravagant spirit of France triumphing in the victory of Jemmapes, the capture of Frankfort, the occupation of Savoy and Nice, and the sudden estimation to which we had risen in the eyes of Europe, beheld, in imagination, thrones tumbled to the ground, and all the nations of the world forming themselves into independent republics. "Ah, if it were true," said a member of the Jacobin club, in reference to the union between Savoy and France, "if it were true that the moment of the awakening of nations had arrived; if it were true that the overturning of thrones would be the immediate consequence of the success of our arms and of the revolutionary volcano; if it were true that the virtues of republics were about finally to avenge the world for all the crimes that royalty had committed; that every nation liberated from slavery were about to establish a government, conformable to the extent of dominion which nature has assigned it; and that from the national conventions of all people, a certain number of extraordinary deputies would form an universal convention in the centre of the globe, to watch incessantly over the rights of man, the liberty of commerce, and the peace of the human race *!"

About this time, the assembly being informed of some acts of tyranny exercised by the Duke de Deux-Ponts against some of his subjects, in a moment of enthusiasm issued the following decree.

"The national convention declares that she will afford succour and fraternity to all nations who wish to recover their liberty; and she has given it in charge to the executive power to give orders to the generals of the French armies to aid all citizens who may have been, or shall be oppressed in the cause of liberty.

"The national convention order the generals of the French armies to have printed, and publicly to promulgate this decree, wherever the arms of the republic may be carried.

"Paris, November 19th, 1792."

* Speech of Milhaud, deputy of Cantal, delivered in the club of the Jacobins, in November, 1792.

CHAPTER IV.

STATE OF PARTIES AT THE TIME OF THE TRIAL OF LOUIS XVI.—CHARACTERISTICS AND OPINIONS OF THE MEMBERS OF THE MINISTRY AT THIS PERIOD, ROLAND, PACHE, LEBRUN, GARAT, MONGE, AND CLAVIÈRE—REMARKS UPON THE DOMESTIC LIFE OF THE ROYAL FAMILY WHILE IN THE TOWER OF THE TEMPLE—COMMENCEMENT OF THE DISCUSSION AS TO PUTTING LOUIS XVI. ON HIS TRIAL; SUMMARY OF THE DEBATES; OPINION OF SAINT-JUST—UNFORTUNATE STATE OF THE PROVISION MARKET; REMARKS AND REFLECTIONS UPON POLITICAL ECONOMY—SPEECH OF ROBESPIERRE UPON THE KING'S TRIAL—THE CONVENTION DECREES THAT THE KING SHALL BE TRIED AT THE BAR—PAPERS FOUND IN THE IRON CHEST—THE FIRST INTERROGATORY ADMINISTERED TO LOUIS XVI. BY THE CONVENTION—CONFLICTING OPINIONS AND INTERESTS DURING THE PROCESS; RESTLESSNESS OF THE JACOBINS—CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE DUKE OF ORLÉANS; HIS BANISHMENT PROPOSED.

THE trial of Louis XVI. was at last about to commence; parties were about to measure their strength, discover their intentions, and exhibit their real characters to each other. The Girondists, to check the slightest symptom of pity, accused those who appeared touched by the contemplation of fallen grandeur of royalism.

The Jacobins, who attacked in Louis XVI. monarchy personified, had undoubtedly made some progress, yet they still met with strong opposition in Paris, and a still stronger in the remaining part of France. They domineered over the capital by their club, by the commune, and by the sections; yet the middle class, resuming their courage, offered some resistance. Pétion having refused the majority, the physician Chambon had obtained a great majority of suffrages, and accepted, with regret, of a situation, which was little suited to his moderate and unambitious character. This choice proves that the middle classes of Paris still possessed great influence. The landholders, traders, and in fact all persons of the middle classes, had not as yet deserted either the municipal councils, those of the departments, or the popular societies, and sent up addresses to the majority of the convention, which always breathed moderation and attachment to the laws. Many affiliated Jacobin societies disapproved of the mother institution, and demanded in a high tone the expulsion of Marat; and even some of them, of Robespierre. Finally, the Bouches-du-Rhône, the Calvados, the Finistère, and the Gironde, despatched new federalists, who, anticipating the decrees of the assembly, as they had done on the 10th of August, came, they said, to protect the convention and maintain its independence.

The Jacobins at present had no hold on the armies; the staffs and military officers continued to repel all their approaches. They had, however, invaded the ministry of the war department. Pache had weakly suffered them to do this, and had dismissed all his former clerks to replace them by members of the Jacobin club. They took possession of his office, attended in slovenly and dirty dresses, made motions, and introduced into its service a quantity of married priests recommended by Audouin, who was himself a married priest. One of the leading members in this ministry was Hasenfratz, formerly an inhabitant of Metz, who becoming a bankrupt, had been obliged to fly the country, and who, like many others, had risen to a high rank in the public estimation by his demagogic zeal. Thus the organization of the army was completely altered, and so far as it was practicable, the army itself was filled with a new class of very opposite opinions to their predecessors; and thus, whilst Roland incurred the hatred of the Jacobins, Pache was cherished and eulogised by them. His gentleness, his modesty and vast capacity, were contrasted invidiously with the unbending firmness of Roland, which they mis-called pride. Roland, indeed, had excluded the Jacobins entirely from the ministry of the interior. To watch over the conduct of the constituted authorities, to retain them within the proper limits of their administrations, to maintain the public tranquillity, to keep a watchful eye on the popular societies, to provide for the subsistence of the population, and to protect commerce and property, was the arduous task of Roland, and he fulfilled it with extraordinary ability and energy. He daily denounced the commune, and made every effort to put a stop to its various excesses; he intercepted its correspondence, as also that of the Jacobins, and substituted in the place of their violent letters, others full of moderation, which produced everywhere a more salutary effect. He preserved inviolate the emigrant property, which had devolved on the state, repressed those disorders to which scarcity gave rise, and exerted the authority of the law, and even force, when it was possible, to keep down those revolutionary passions which occasioned so many tumults. The difference which the Jacobins found between Pache and Roland may easily be conceived, and the families of the two ministers rendered this difference still more striking. The wife and daughters of Pache attended the clubs and sections; they might be seen even in the barracks of the federalists, whose favour it was important to gain, and distinguished themselves by a low Jacobinism, which strikingly contrasted them with the wife of Roland, remarkable chiefly for a proud mind, a cultivated understanding, and polished manners, and above all, the centre of attraction to those orators so brilliant and so much hated.

Pache and Roland, then, were the two persons around whom all the members of the council ranged themselves. Clavière, minister of finances, although frequently embroiled, by the irascibility of his temper, with all parties, when appeased, always returned to the party of Roland. Lebrun, a weak man, but strongly attached to the Girondists by their superior intellect, had frequently associated Brissot with him in his diplomatic labours; and the Jacobins, denouncing the latter an intriguer, maintained that he was master of the whole government, because he often lent his assistance to Lebrun. Garat, contemplating all parties from the height of metaphysical elevation, contented himself with forming a judgment of their respective characters, but felt himself by no means called upon personally to oppose their errors. He seemed to believe, that because he had discovered the faults of the Girondists he was freed from all obligation to support them, and considered his own indolence in the light of true discretion. Nevertheless, the Jacobins felt that the neutrality of so able a man was an important advantage, and repaid him with occasional praise. Finally, Monge, a dry mathematical genius, a decided patriot, perfectly uninfluenced by the moral theories of the Girondists, thought it safest to follow the example of Pache, allowed his administration to be seized upon by the Jacobins, and, without disavowing the Girondists, to whom he owed his elevation, accepted the eulogiums of their adversaries, and took his share of popularity with the minister of war.

Thus the Jacobin party, though possessing two truckling slaves in Pacho and Monge, and though assured of the neutrality of Garat, found an inexorable adversary in Roland, who was sure of the co-operation of Clavière and Lebrun, and frequently prevailed on the other ministers to grant him their support. The Jacobins, therefore, could by no means be said to have a controlling power in the state; they repeated daily that there was not one king the less in the new order of things, but that on the other hand, the same despotism, the same intrigues, and the same treasons existed; and that the revolution would never be complete and certain in its effect, until the originators of all these secret machinations and opposing influences, already imprisoned in the Temple, should be utterly destroyed.

Such, we saw, was the respective strength of parties, and the state of the revolution at the time when the process against Louis XVI. was commenced. This prince, with his family, was confined in the great tower of the Temple. The commune having the disposal of the armed force and charge of the police of the capital, had consequently under their command the guard of the Temple, and it was, therefore, to their ungenerous suspicions and scowling authority that the royal family were subject. This unhappy family, being guarded by a class of men very inferior to that of which the convention was composed, could neither expect that lenity or respect which minds refined by education are always inclined to pay to misfortune. They had been at first imprisoned in the small tower, but were afterwards removed to the great one, which was deemed the most secure. The king occupied one floor, and the princesses and children another. They met daily, and were permitted to spend the sad season of their captivity in each other's society. A single domestic had been allowed to follow them to their prison; this was the faithful Clergy, who, having escaped the massacres of the 10th of August, had returned to Paris, to offer his services, in their calamity, to those whom he had formerly served in all the splendour of their power. This devoted servant endeavoured to supply the place of the numerous attendants by whom his master had in former days been surrounded. Breakfast was always served at nine o'clock, in the chamber of the king.

At ten the whole family met in the queen's room. Louis XVI. there employed himself with the education of his son. He taught him to repeat passages from Racine and Corneille, and gave him instructions in geography, a science he had cultivated with much success himself. The queen occupied herself in the education of her daughter; or, with her sister, whiled away the heavy hours with needlework tapestries. At one o'clock, when the weather was fine, the whole family were conducted into the garden to take a short walk. Several municipal officers and officers of the guard accompanied them, and sometimes they had the mournful satisfaction of perceiving these attendants softened into commiseration, and sometimes obdurate and contemptuous. Men of uncultivated minds are seldom generous; and fallen grandeur, to such characters, is only an object of scorn. When we figure to ourselves this illustrious family, who were reproached with having so long been elated by power and pampered by luxury, ruled by gross and ignorant mechanics, we can easily imagine with what low malevolence and petty tyranny they would naturally treat them! The king and queen frequently overheard the most base and cruel conversations, and saw written up on the walls, courts, and corridors of their prison, sentences expressive of all the hatred the ancient system of government had inspired, but which Louis XVI. and his consort had done nothing personally to deserve. Yet they experienced some consolation from the useless expressions of interest and pity their misery sometimes called forth; and they continued their melancholy walks on account of their children, to whom exercise was necessary. Whilst they paced with sad steps the gloomy court of the Temple, they perceived, at the windows of some of the neighbouring houses, a throng of faithful subjects who remained still attached to monarchy, and who had come to counter the narrow bounds of the narrow bounds was imprisoned. finished, and dining was accented he slept, the queen needlework occupied another room, and juvenile plays as evening, one of their grief with ing sipped, every after taking a of each other, emotion. press an involuntary emotion, and ought, in consideration of the virtues of the man, to have pardoned the errors of the prince.

The commune, however, disquieted by suspicion, had recourse to the most vexatious precautions. The municipal officers never lost sight of any of the royal family, and would hardly consent to be separated from them by a closed door when they were retiring to rest. They placed beds for themselves at the entrance of each chamber, so as to preclude all egress. Santerre, with his staff, visited the whole tower daily, and sent in a regular report to the commune. The municipal officers of the guard formed a species of permanent council, who, having a chamber in the tower allotted to their use, gave all orders, and replied to all the demands of the prisoners. At first, pens, ink, and paper had been left in the prison, but they were shortly taken away, as likewise all edged instruments, such as knives, razors, scissors, and penknives, for the discovery of which the most minute and offensive search was made. This was very vexatious to the princesses, who were thus disabled from mending their clothes, which were much in want of it, not having been repaired since their first arrival in the Temple. In the sack of the Tuileries nearly everything personally useful to the royal family had been destroyed. The wife of the English ambassador* sent some linen to the queen, and the commune, on the demand of the king, had some made up for all the family. As to other articles of dress, the king and queen never thought of asking for them, but would, doubtless, have obtained them, had they expressed any wish of the kind. With regard to money, they were given, in September, the sum of two thousand francs for their expenses; but subsequently the commune were unwilling to grant any further supply, fearing the use that might be made of it. A sum had been deposited in the hands of the governor of the Temple, and, on request by the prisoners, many articles were bought with it, of which they stood in need.

We must not exaggerate the crimes of human nature by supposing that the guardians of the royal family, adding the most execrable malevolence to the fury of fanaticism, imposed upon them ungenerous privations, and endeavoured thus to aggravate the bitterness of their recollections of former grandeur. Distrust was the sole cause of many denials. Thus, whilst the fear of plots restricted the number of the king's attendants to one servant in the interior of the prison, many domestics were employed in preparing his food at a small distance from the tower. The reports of the expenses of the Temple, in which the greatest decorum is observed, in which the prisoners are mentioned with respect, in which their temperance is highly commended, and in which Louis XVI. is justified from the reproach of fondness for the luxuries of the table,—these reports, which have never been suspected, make it appear that the expenses of the table of the Temple amounted in two months to the sum of twenty-eight thousand seven hundred and forty-five francs. Of the thirteen servants who were employed in the kitchen, one alone had permission to enter the prison and assist Clery in his attendance on the royal family at their meals.

* The then Duchess of Sutherland.

And, such is the ingenuity which captivity exercises, that it was by this servant, whom Clery had interested in the misfortunes of his master, that news from abroad found admission sometimes into the Temple. The unfortunate prisoners were kept in perfect ignorance of public events; or if there were any exceptions to this rule of treatment, the representatives of the commune confined themselves to communicating to them information of the victories of the republic, which were calculated to deprive them of all hope.

Clery, in order to make the royal family acquainted with the public news, imagined an expedient which succeeded well enough. By means of the communications he secretly carried on out of doors, he had taken into his hire a public crier, who, under the pretext of selling his journals, placed himself under the window of the Temple, and uttered with a loud voice the principal news of the day. Clery, at the appointed hour, stationed himself at this window, and thus obtained a knowledge of every thing which was passing, of which he informed the king, leaning over his bed, at the moment when he appeared to be drawing the curtains around him. Such was the situation of the unhappy family who had fallen from a throne to a dungeon, and such were the expedients by which their zealous, faithful, and industrious servant endeavoured to counteract the effects of the gloomy distrust of their jailors.

The committee finally presented their plan of proceedings against Louis XVI. to the assembly. Dufriche-Valazé first made a report of the facts laid to the charge of the monarch, and of the evidence by which they were supported. This report, too long to be heard throughout, was printed by order of the convention, and a copy of it given to each of its members. On the 7th, the deputy Mailhe, speaking in the name of the committee of legislation, presented a report on those great questions to which the proceedings against the king had given rise; the first of which was, can Louis XVI. be brought to trial. What tribunal is competent to pass sentence upon him?

Such were the two essential questions now to be discussed, and which deeply agitated the public mind. The printing of the report was immediately ordered. Translated into all languages, it immediately circulated through France and Europe. The discussion was adjourned to the 13th, in spite of the opposition of Billaud-Varennes, who wished the first question to be carried by acclamation at the moment.

A last struggle was now about to take place between the opinions of the constituent assembly and those of the convention; and this struggle, as might be expected, was extremely violent, as the life or death of the king depended on its result. The constituent assembly was democratic in its ideas, and monarchical in its feelings. Thus whilst all their institutions were republican, a relic of affection and respect for Louis XVI. induced them to preserve royalty, together with those attributes which have been deemed necessary for its maintenance, in a limited system of monarchical feudalism. Hereditary descent, executive power, a participation in legislative acts, and personal inviolability, are the prerogatives which are acknowledged at the throne of modern monarchies, and such were the prerogatives which the first assembly had left in the possession of the reigning family. Participation in legislative acts and the executive power, are functions which may be variously modified, and are not so essential to modern royalty as hereditary descent and personal inviolability. Of these two last, the former secures the perpetual and natural transmission of monarchical power; the second places the person of each inheritor beyond the reach of personal attack; and, in fine, both of these establish an uninterrupted perpetuity of authority, inaccessible and unimpeachable. Obligated to act through the medium of its ministers, who are responsible for their actions, royalty is open to attack but on that one point, where it may be stricken without being shaken. Such is the character of feudal monarchy, as gradually modified by lapse of time, and made compatible with that degree of liberty to which nations of the present age have attained.

Yet the constituent assembly had, in some measure, restricted the sense of royal inviolability, for the flight to Varennes, and the conduct of the emigrants, had led them to believe that ministerial responsibility did not sufficiently protect the nation from all the crimes of royalty. They therefore excepted the case of a monarch putting himself at the head of an enemy's army to attack the constitution of the state, or not opposing an enterprise of this nature by a formal act, and in his own name. In such a case, they declared the monarch to have fallen under the sentence of the common laws against felony, and dethroned. He was then considered as having abdicated royalty. Such is the technical language of the law on this subject. Their offer of the constitution to the acceptance of the king, and his acceptance of it, rendered the contract irrevocable; and the assembly entered into a solemn engagement, with this exception, to hold the persons of their monarchs sacred.

The convention found themselves confronted by this engagement, in deciding on the fate of Louis XVI. But the new legislators united under the name of a national convention, thought themselves no more bound by the engagements of their predecessors, than they themselves had been by the ancient institutions of feudalism. The public mind had been carried forward by the train of events so rapidly, that the laws of 1791 appeared as absurd to the present generation as those of the thirteenth century appeared to the generation of 1789. The convention, then, not believing themselves restricted by a law which they deemed absurd, declared themselves as much opposed to that, as the states general had against the separation of the three orders.

The moment therefore that the discussion opened on the 13th of November, these two opinions came into conflict. The one party maintained the inviolability of the royal person, as in itself expedient, and the other absolutely rejected it. The ideas of all had undergone so great a change, that no member of the convention ventured to defend the inviolability as good in itself; even those who took the part of the king, insisted that, as it had passed into a law, it was only just that Louis XVI. should derive the benefit of it; and that its validity could not be disputed without violating a national engagement. But the number of deputies who argued upon it in this light was very small, and the Girondists decidedly dissented from such a view of the question. Nevertheless they remained perfectly neutral, and left the discussion to the few partisans of inviolability and its numerous adversaries.

"In the first place," said the opponents of the doctrine of inviolability, "it is necessary, to make an engagement good, that he who engages himself should have the power of doing so. The national sovereignty is inalienable and cannot be fettered. The nation might wisely, by enacting the inviolability of the person of the king, protect the executive power from attacks of the legislature. The motive of this political precaution is plainly observable in the system of the constituent assembly; but if it has rendered the present king inviolable so far as concerns all constituted authorities whatever, the constituent assembly could not have rendered the person of the king inviolable so far as concerns herself, for she can never be to renounce for ever her own omnipotency: the nation, therefore, can have entered into no engagement with Louis XVI., nor can it be confronted with one it has never had the faculty of creating.

"Secondly, it is necessary, even supposing the constituent assembly had the power of engaging the nation to maintain any act of theirs, that this engagement should be reciprocal. But there has been none on the part of Louis XVI. This constitution, to which he appeals now for support, he has never willingly adopted, he has always protested against, and has never ceased to aim at its destruction, not only by internal conspiracies, but by the sword of the enemy. What right has he then to avail himself of it?

"But admitting even that the engagement was both valid and reciprocal, it is still necessary that it should not be in opposition to reason, if it is to have any weight whatever. Thus all the ostensible acts of the monarch, resting upon the responsibility of the ministers, who stand in the situation of the king, the nation in this case possesses some guarantee against the abuse of ministerial power, and inviolability, not being understood as impunity, ceases to be absurd. But for secret proceedings, concealed plots, intercourse with an enemy, and hidden treasons, how can a minister be accountable, how can he countersign these acts? But these last, although the most criminal of all, may be carried on with impunity. This is absurd; and we must therefore acknowledge that, though a king be unaccountable for the open acts of his administration, he is liable to answer for any secret and criminal proceedings, which may endanger the public welfare. Thus a deputy, though irresponsible for the exercise of his legislative functions, as well as an ambassador in his diplomatic negotiations, they are both accountable for acts they commit in their private capacities. Inviolability has then its limits. Will it be said, that dethronement is the penalty denounced against those acts of criminality for which a minister is not responsible? That is to say, that the simple privation of power shall be the only punishment inflicted on a monarch for having so dreadfully abused it? Shall the people whom he has so basely betrayed, delivered over to the sword of the enemy, and exposed to many calamities at once, content themselves with saying to him, 'Retire?' This would be a very illusory kind of justice, and a people cannot be so wanting to themselves as to permit a crime committed against their liberty and their very existence, to escape with such impunity.

"It is necessary," added the same orators, "we acknowledge, that a known penalty should be affixed to every crime by an anterior law. But are there not penalties already denounced against treason? Are not these penalties contained in every code? Was not the king sufficiently warned by the morality of all times and places, of the criminality of treason; and by the laws of all nations, that it was punishable with the most terrible chastisement? But, besides a penal law, we want a tribunal. Behold a nation invested with sovereignty, concentrating in itself all power, judicial as well as legislative: it is here in all its omnipotency, in all its universality, and is capable of exercising every function; the convention is this nation, whom it represents, having received authority to act in her name, to avenge her, to give her a constitution, and to save her. The convention therefore is competent to try Louis XVI.; it has sufficient power, it forms the most independent tribunal; it is the most elevated court to which the accused could appeal; and as he does not want partisans here, or the bribes of the enemy, the monarch could not desire other judges. It is true the same men will be both accusers and judges. But although, in ordinary tribunals, it is necessary to separate these functions, in the council general of the nation, placed far above personal motives and interests, such precautions are not requisite. The Nation cannot err, and the deputies who represent it partake of its infallibility and its power.

"Thus," said the adversaries of the king, "the engagement contracted in 1791, not binding the national sovereignty, not being reciprocal, and containing an absurd clause which gives impunity to treason, is altogether null; and Louis XVI. can certainly be brought to trial. As to the penalty affixed to the crime of which he is accused, it is common to all times; it is to be found in all laws. As to the tribunal, the convention, invested with all legislative, executive, and judicial power, is the only proper one." These orators echoed then the demand to the committee that Louis XVI. should be brought to trial; that he should be tried by the national convention; that an act announcing the crimes imputed to him should be prepared by deputies selected for that purpose; that he should appear in person to reply to it; that he should be allowed counsel in his defence; and that immediately after having heard it, the convention should pronounce sentence by an appeal to each deputy personally and by name.

The defenders of the inviolability of the king left none of these arguments unreplyed to, and refuted the whole system of their adversaries.

"It is maintained," said they, "that the nation cannot alienate its sovereignty, and divest itself of the power of punishing crimes committed against itself; and that the law of inviolability decreed in 1791, though binding on the legislative body, cannot fetter the nation. In the first place, if it be true that the national sovereignty cannot be alienated, nor deprived of the power of renewing the laws, it is also true that it has no retrospective power, that is, that it cannot prevent that which has already taken place, nor hinder laws already passed from taking their effect. The nation may declare that, in future, monarchs shall not be inviolable, but, for the past, she cannot prevent them being so, since she herself has declared them such; she cannot break a contract entered into with third persons, so far as concerns them she has become simply a party by treating with them. Thus the national sovereignty may be tied up for a time. The nation has determined in a positive manner, not only that the legislature, but that she herself is incompetent to prosecute the king by any judicial action; for the political object of the law of inviolability would be frustrated, if royalty had not been secured from every attack, both on the part of the constituted authorities, and on that of the nation itself.

"As to the want of reciprocity in the execution of the engagement, this also has been provided for," added the same orators. "Breach of faith in the contract has been provided for by the contract itself. Every mode of manifesting this dereliction of fidelity is comprised in one single instance, the most serious of all, war against the nation, which is punishable by dethronement, according to the terms of the engagement between the nation and the king. A want of reciprocity cannot therefore release the nation from its obligation to observe the law of inviolability.

"The engagement then is real and positive, equally binding on the nation and the legislature; the want of reciprocity has been provided for, and cannot render it null and void. We shall see presently that this engagement, in the monarchical system, was not unreasonable, and that it cannot fall to the ground on the score of absurdity. Ministerial responsibility equally applies to all regal acts, as a king can no more conspire than govern without agents, and thus public justice might always be satisfied. Finally, secret crimes, distinguished from administrative delinquencies, are foreseen and rendered punishable with dethronement by this act of legislation. It has been insisted on, that dethronement is not a punishment, that it is nothing but a simple deprivation of abused power; but, in that system which rendered the person of the king inviolable, severity of punishment is not so much regarded, as the political result of the act of dethronement, and this result is attained by a simple privation of power. But is not the loss of the first throne in the universe a punishment? Is it no punishment to be stripped of a crown which the possessor inherited at his birth, wore for years with honour, and by virtue of which he gained the adoration of millions for nearly a quarter of a century? Is not this infliction to those brought up in the extreme rank of society, equally severe as that of death? Allowing, however, that it is too lenient a chastisement, it is nevertheless that stipulated by the sovereign nation, and an inadequacy of punishment can never render a law invalid. In all criminal judicature, it is agreed that all legal flaws shall tend to the advantage of the accused. Thus having proved that this contract is valid and positive; that it contains nothing absurd, that it gives no impunity, but, on the contrary, affixes a penalty to treason, it is neither necessary to have recourse to the natural rights of man, nor to the sovereignty of the nation, as the dethronement has already been pronounced by an anterior law. To this penalty the king has submitted without the decision of a tribunal, and on the verdict of the only authority to which he could be amenable, that of a popular insurrection. Dethroned from that moment, and deprived of all power, France has no right to proceed further against him, and has only now to take precautions for his security. She may banish him out of her territory, or detain him till the war shall be terminated, or suffer him to live in her bosom as a private individual. But this is all that she ought, this is all she can do. It is not therefore necessary to constitute a tribunal, or to examine the competency of the convention; the 10th of August decided the fate of Louis XVI.; on the 10th of August he ceased to be a king; on the 10th of August he was brought to trial, condemned, and deposed, and all relation between him and the nation was then dissolved."

Such was the reply of the supporters of the law of inviolability; and the national sovereignty being understood as it then was, this reply was unanswerable, and the reasonings of the committee of legislation were nothing but laboured sophistication, destitute of candour and truth.

We are now about to furnish extracts of the various speeches of both parties of the assembly in the regular discussion of this question; but we must first take notice of the new ideas to which the extravagance of principles and passions had given birth. At the Jacobin club, in the ranks of the Mountain, the necessity of any discussion to rid the nation of a tyrant, taken with arms in his hands, and shedding in wantonness the blood of the people, was already questioned. This opinion found a terrible advocate in the young Saint-Just, an austere and cold-blooded fanatic, who at the age of twenty, meditated the formation of an ideal society founded on the basis of absolute equality, simple and severe in its principles, and protected by an indestructible force. Long before the 10th of August, he conceived, in the gloomy profundity of his mind, the notion of this supernatural system, and had reached, by the enthusiasm of fanaticism, that extreme point of theoretical extravagance, to which Robespierre had arrived by the mere impulse of personal resentment. Having but very lately taken any active part in the revolution, as yet uninitiated in contention and in crime, he took his station in the ranks of the Mountain, charmed the Jacobins by his audacity, astonished the convention by his talents, but had not hitherto obtained any popular celebrity. His ideas, always powerfully conceived, but not always well expressed, did not produce all their effect, till rendered more clear and familiar by the plagiarising declamations of Robespierre.

He spoke, on the present occasion, after Morrisson, the most zealous defender of the law of inviolability, and not using invectives against his adversaries, not having yet had time to contract personal animosities, he appeared at first merely indignant at the pettiness of the assembly, and the paltry astuteness of their discussions*. "What," said he, "you the committee, the adversaries of Louis XVI.

Do you rack your brains to discover proper forms to pass sentence on the ex-king? Do you attempt to elevate him to the rank of a citizen, that you may find laws applicable to his crimes? I, on the contrary, maintain that he is no citizen, that he should be considered as an enemy, that our duty is rather to crush him than to bring him to trial, that being altogether out of the contract which unites all Frenchmen, forms of procedure against him are to be sought for, not in the civil law, but in the right of nations?"

Thus Saint-Just regarded this question, not as one of justice, but of war. "To try a king as a citizen! This will indeed astonish posterity. Trial is a reference to the law, it is an institution of justice; but what relation of justice is there between kings and human nature?"

"The act of reigning is in itself a crime; it is an usurpation which nothing can excuse, which the people are culpable in allowing, and against which every man has a personal right to exercise vengeance. It is impossible to reign innocently, the wickedness of kings is too great to permit them to do that. We should treat such usurpation as kings themselves treat that against their pretended authority. Is not the memory of Cromwell execrated for having usurped the authority of Charles I. and certainly he was no more an usurper than the other; for when people are sufficiently base to suffer themselves to be domineered over by tyrants, this domination belongs to him who first seizes it, and is not more sacred or more legitimate in one man than in another."

Passing then to the question of the forms to be observed, Saint-Just regarded them all but as new and illogical errors. The forms of the process he considered but as a mere piece of grimace, and maintained that it is not the method of procedure which had justified every kind of vengeance known to the people to be exercised against kings; but the right of compelling force by force.

"Posterity will be astonished," cried he, "that the world is less advanced in the eighteenth century than it was in the time of Cæsar: then the tyrant was cut off in a full senate, without any other formality than twenty-three stabs of a dagger, and without the sentence of any other law than the liberty of Rome. But in the present times, we seek for forms of proceeding against a man, the assassin of his people, taken in the flagrant perpetration of his crimes."

Regarding the question in another point of view, quite distinct from the question of Louis XVI., Saint-Just raised his voice against the subtle and crafty reasonings of the assembly, which operated, as he said, with disadvantage to great considerations. The life of Louis XVI. he looked upon as of no consequence, one way or the other; but the spirit manifested by his judges struck him most forcibly. "The men," said he, "who are about to pass sentence on Louis XVI. have to lay the foundations of a republic; but those who attach any importance to the just chastisement of a king will never be the founders of a republic. Since the report of the committee has been given in, a certain timidity and hesitation has been evident in the conduct of many deputies. Every one considers the question of the process against the king through the medium of his own peculiar opinions. Some appear to fear future retribution, and others have not yet renounced their attachment to monarchy; these shrink from an example of virtue that will prove a bond of amity—

"We judge each other with severity, I may say with fury; we think only of repressing the energies of the people, and moderating the spirit of liberty, whilst our common enemy provokes only gentle censures, and the many, effeminated by weakness, or engaged in crime, regard each other with doubt, and hesitate to strike the first blow!

"Citizens! if the Roman people, after six hundred years of virtue and of hatred to kings, and if Great Britain, after the death of Cromwell, were obliged again to submit to the yoke of tyrants, ought not we, good citizens, and friends of liberty, to fear, when we feel the axe to tremble in our hands, and find that a people, just emancipated, can still respect the memory of their former servitude? What republic can you establish in the midst of our general dissensions and common weakness? We must ever bear in mind that our republic must be founded in the same spirit with which Louis XVI. is condemned. The measure of your philosophy in this sentence will also be the measure of your liberty in the constitution!"

Some members, less fanatic than Saint-Just, placed the question in a more equitable point of view. "Behold," said Rouzet*, "the real situation in which the king was placed by the constitution of 1791. He was so circumstanced as necessarily to become the rival of the national representation. Was it not natural that he should endeavour to recover as great a portion as possible of the power he had lost? Did not you open the lists of contention to him, and invite him to the struggle? He has been conquered; he is alone, unarmed and humbled, at the feet of twenty-five millions of men, and these twenty-five millions of men will be base enough to make a victim of the vanquished! Besides," added Rouzet, "does not the love of dominion rule in the hearts of all men, and has not Louis XVI. repressed its influence more than any other sovereign in the world? Did he not in 1789 make a voluntary sacrifice of part of his authority? Did he not renounce many of the rights which his predecessors had exercised? Did he not abolish servitude in his dominions? Did he not call into his councils philosophic ministers, even to those empirics whom the public opinion pointed out? Did he not convoke the states-general, and deliver up to the third class a portion of their rights?"

Faure, the deputy of the Lower Seine, displayed still greater boldness. Referring to the conduct of Louis XVI., "The people," said he, "might have raged against Titus as well as against Nero, and might have found crimes to lay to his charge, if they were only those which he committed before Jerusalem. But where are those which you impute to Louis XVI.? I have paid the greatest attention to the charges against him, and I find nothing criminal; but I perceive a weak man, who suffered himself to be deluded by every hope of recovering his ancient authority; and I maintain that all the monarchs who have died on their beds have been more guilty than him. The good Louis XII. himself, in sacrificing fifty thousand Frenchmen in Italy to avenge a private quarrel, was a thousand times more culpable! A civil list, a veto, the choice of ministers, women, relations, courtiers—behold the seducers of Capet! I invoke Aristides and Epictetus; let them answer whether their firmness could have withstood such temptations. Upon a knowledge of weak human nature, I base my principles or my errors. Elevate yourselves, then, to all the grandeur of the national sovereignty; conceive in your own minds that magnanimity which should be associated with so vast a power. Summon Louis XVI. before you, not as a criminal but as a Frenchman, and say to him, 'Those who have formerly elevated thee to the throne, and called thee their king, do this day depose thee. Thou didst promise to be our father, and this thou hast not been. Make reparation by the virtues of a citizen for the conduct thou hast pursued as a king.'

In the extraordinary excitement of mind which this question occasioned, every one was led to consider the question in different points of view. Faucher, that constitutional priest who had gained great celebrity in 1789 by introducing revolutionary topics into the pulpit, questioned the right of society to inflict the penalty of death. "His society," said he, "the right of taking away that life she has not bestowed! Doubtless she is bound to watch over her own preservation, but is it true that this can only be effected by the death of criminals? If it can be compassed by other means, certainly the infliction of capital punishments ought to be avoided. This truth is more applicable to the present question than to any other. Is it not to promote the public interest, and to strengthen the young republic, that you would now sacrifice Louis XVI.? But will his whole family be annihilated by the stroke which cuts him off? According to the hereditary system, one king is succeeded immediately by another. Will, therefore, the death of Louis XVI. free you from the claims which his whole family feel to be justly theirs from their possession of dominion for many centuries? The destruction of one alone will be useless. Let, then, the present head of that family live, if it is only to debar the remainder from all hope; let him drag on a wretched existence, despised and hated by all aristocrats for his concessions and timidity, contemptible by his weakness, and degraded by his defeat, and you will have less to fear from him than from any other. Let this dethroned king exist in the bosom of your republic, deprived of all grandeur and pomp; show the world how insignificant a king is when stripped of external decorations; manifest an utter contempt for his former state, and the recollection of it will be no longer dangerous. By this conduct, you will hold out a grand moral lesson for the instruction of mankind, and you will provide for the safety of the republic much more effectually than by shedding blood which is not yours to shed.' As to the son of Louis XVI., added Faucher, "if it is possible to make a man of him, we will make him a citizen, like the young Egalité. He will then fight for the republic; or should he be base enough to become a traitor to his country, certainly no soldier of liberty will second his treasonable designs. Let us show to all nations that we fear nothing; let us induce them to follow our example, that we may all, united in a bond of fraternity, form an European Congress. May they depose their sovereigns, and dismiss those contemptible beings to drag out an obscure and ignominious life in the heart of republics; may they even give them small pensions, for those creatures are so devoid of all capacity, that even want would not teach them how to gain their bread! Let us give this first example of the abolition of a barbarous penalty! Let us put a stop to the effusion of blood, and at once quell the blood-thirsty propensities of the people. Let us appease that turbulent spirit which evil-minded men endeavour to excite, that they may avail themselves of it to overthrow the republic. Recollect that these barbarians still cry out for the immolation of fifty thousand persons, and that, after having delivered over the ex-king to their fury, it will be impossible to refuse to them any other victim. Let us put a stop to those crimes which have so long destroyed the peace of the republic, dishonoured liberty, impeded the progress of the revolution, and checked the march of improvement, and the diffusion of happiness over the face of the world."

This discussion lasted from the 13th to the 30th of November, and caused a general excitement. Those who were not enthusiasts of the new order of things, and who still retained a pleasing recollection of 1789, of the goodness of the monarch, and the love of which he was then the object, could not conceive him to be all at once transformed into a tyrant, and devoted to the scaffold. Admitting that he had carried on secret intercourse with foreign powers, they attributed this error to his weakness, to the difficulties of his situation, and to his invincible love of that power which he had derived from his ancestors, and their hearts revolted at the idea of inflicting on him an ignominious punishment. Yet they dared not openly defend him. The danger to which the nation had been exposed by the invasion of the Prussians, and the general opinion that they had been invited to the frontiers by the court, had excited a general feeling of indignation, which fell upon the head of the unfortunate monarch, and against which he dared not stand up. His advocates, therefore, were obliged to content themselves with resisting, in a general manner, those who cried for vengeance against him; they described these men as the instigators of every disorder, and as Septemberizers*, who wished to cover the face of France with blood and ruins. Without defending Louis XVI. by name, they called for moderation towards all vanquished enemies. They warned all against trusting to a deceitful show of energy, which, whilst it appeared to maintain the cause of the republic by measures of vigour, in reality sought only to subject it to the dominion of terror, or else to compromise it with Europe.

The Girondists had not yet spoken. Their opinions were rather supposed than actually known, and the Mountain, in order to secure a pretext for accusing them, pretended that they were anxious to save Louis XVI. However, their opinions were not very decided on this question; one party repudiating the doctrine of inviolability, and regarding Louis XVI. as concerned in the invasion of the Prussians; the other party, softened by the contemplation of fallen grandeur, endeavoured on every occasion to oppose the violence of their adversaries; but, not knowing what part to take, preserved an equivocal and sullen silence.

Another question at this time agitated the public mind, that of provisioning, which had occasioned much disagreement at every period of the revolution.

We have already seen the anxiety and trouble this subject occasioned Bailly and Necker in 1789*. The same difficulties occurred again with increased magnitude in 1792, and were accompanied by popular tumults of a still more dangerous nature. The suspension of commerce, even in those articles which are only remotely necessary, is a great check upon industry, and must eventually affect the working classes; but when corn, which is requisite for the support of life, fails, trouble and disorder must immediately ensue. Thus the former police had placed the provision of public stores among the number of its most important duties, considering it as one in which the welfare and tranquillity of the nation was most vitally concerned.

Corn had not been wanting in 1792, but the harvest had been retarded by the badness of the season, and the wheat remained long unthreshed from a deficiency of labourers. This was not, however, the great cause of the scarcity which then prevailed. In 1792 as in 1789, fear of pillage on the roads, and the vexatious practices of the markets, kept the farmers backward in their supplies. A cry was raised against monopoly. The rich farmers were called aristocrats, and their extensive farms, it was said, ought to be divided. The higher the public indignation rose against these men, the less they were disposed to show themselves in the markets, and the scarcity proportionably augmented. The assignats had also contributed to produce this calamity. Many farmers who only brought their property to sale for the purpose of amassing money, preferred accumulating their corn to acquiring paper wealth of variable value. Moreover, as corn became every day more scarce, and the assignats more abundant, this disproportion between the sign of property and property itself increased daily. As it commonly happens, too, in such emergencies, the providence of all only increased the general dread of famine—every one was anxious to collect a store of provisions for the time of universal distress. Families, municipalities, and the government, made large purchases, and thus rendered the little that remained more dear and scanty in its distribution. At Paris particularly, the municipality committed a very old but not the less serious error; it bought corn from the neighbouring departments and sold it again at a reduced price, with the double intention of satisfying the wants of the people and increasing its own popularity. The result of this was, that the corn merchants, crushed by the competition, withdrew themselves from the markets, and that the population of the provinces, attracted by the low price of corn in the capital, absorbed a large portion of those provisions which had been amassed at so great an expense by the police. These unwise measures, originating in false ideas of economy, and an excessive love of popularity, destroyed commerce, which was more essential to the subsistence of Paris, where it was necessary to have in the smallest area a greater quantity of grain than at any other place. The causes of this scarcity were therefore various and multiplied; at first, terror drove the farmers from the market, high prices arising from the assignats, the rage for creating stores, and lastly, the intervention of the municipality of Paris, who impeded the corn-trade by their powerful interference.

In such difficulties, it is easy to imagine the part those two classes of men would take who divided between them the sovereignty of France. The violent party, who up to this time wished to remove all opposition by the very destruction of their opponents, and who, to prevent conspiracy, had cut off all whom they suspected to be their enemies, would, on the present occasion, to put an end to the dearth, have had recourse to one simple expedient, and that was always force. They desired that the farmers should be drawn from their indifference, and that they should be compelled to come into the markets, and to sell their provisions at prices fixed by the communes; that corn should not be taken elsewhere, and should not go to the accumulations of those whom they denominated monopolists. They likewise required the compulsory attendance of merchants in the markets; the tax on prices, called the maximum, and to interdict all circulation of grain from one province to another. Their object, in fact, was to compel commerce to obey all their commands, not from the ordinary motive of gain, but from the fear of penalties and of death.

The moderate party, on the contrary, thought the most effectual way of terminating the scarcity would be to leave commerce free, to give it time to flow again in its old channels, by dissipating the fears of farmers, in allowing them to fix their own prices, in attracting them into the markets by a fair, sure, and advantageous exchange, and permitting the circulation of corn from one department to another, as means of assisting those who did not grow corn. They condemned the tax proposed by their adversaries, as well as every kind of prohibition, and with the economists demanded an unrestricted liberty for agricultural commerce throughout France. At the suggestion of Barbaroux, who was well versed in these matters, they required that the exportation of grain into foreign countries should be subject to a duty, to be augmented as the price of wheat rose, so that it would become more difficult to export as the demands of the French market became more pressing. They limited the interference of the administration to the establishment of certain markets, to be opened only on extraordinary emergencies. They confined all measures of severity to those who robbed the farmers on the roads, or in the markets; they objected to subjecting commerce to penalties; for fear, said they, though it may be a means of repressing, yet can never give activity to trade; it paralyzes, rather than stimulates exertion.

When a party becomes dominant in a state, it becomes the government, and indulges in all the schemes and contracts all the ordinary prejudices of every government; it is ready to advance its designs at any rate, and to employ force as an universal means. It is thus that the fervent advocates of liberty have a tendency with governments in general to enforce prohibitory systems, and consequently they find themselves opposed by those men who, more temperately disposed, do not seek liberty as an end, but as a means, and only require security in respect of their enemies, absence of undue haste in judicial proceedings, and unrestricted freedom in commerce.

The Girondists opposed tyranny with all the theoretical speculations of philosophy; but these new economists, instead of resisting a system of government disgraceful in itself, and always condemned by public opinion, found the public mind intoxicated with the idea of the public safety, in imagining that force, employed for the promotion of this end, would be a laudable exertion of virtuous energy.

The discussion of this question gave rise to new and serious accusations. Roland daily accused the commune of increasing the price of provisions by selling their corn at a reduced rate, through a vain love of popularity. The Mountain, in reply, asserted, that Roland himself had applied considerable sums of the public money to the purchase of grain; that he was the chief of monopolists, and that he aimed at making himself dictator, by seizing on the very means of existence, to be disposed of according to his own will and pleasure.

Whilst these disputes were carrying on in the assembly, revolts took place in many departments, and particularly in that of the Eure and Loire. The inhabitants of the provinces, stimulated by want and the instigations of the clergy, reproached the convention as the authors of all the sufferings they endured, and whilst they complained that a tax was not imposed upon grain, they accused the assembly of a design to destroy religion. A motion of Cambon had occasioned this last reproach. A warm advocate for economy when military affairs were not concerned, he had proposed the suppression of the expenses attendant on religious worship, saying that those who "wished for the mass might pay for it." Thus the insurgents did not want a plea for their complaints; but, by a singular contradiction, they reproached the convention on one question, for their moderation in the matter of provisioning, and, on the other, for their violence in respect to religious service. Two members, despatched by the assembly into this department, found an assemblage of many thousand peasants, in the environs of Courville, armed with pitchforks and muskets, and were obliged to put their signatures to the tax on corn, in order to avoid instant death. They consented to this, and were reprimanded by the convention, who told them that they should rather have suffered death than assented to such a demand, and that the tax too which they had signed was abolished. An armed force was despatched to disperse these assemblages. Thus commenced the disturbances of the west, the joint effect of want, and attachment to the ceremonies of public worship.

On the motion of Danton, and to appease the inhabitants of the west the assembly declared that they had no intention of abolishing religion, but they still persisted in rejecting the maximum. Thus unmoved in the general shock, and preserving still some liberty of opinion, the majority of the convention maintained the freedom of commerce against all prohibitory systems. If we consider what was at this time passing in the armies, in the several administrations of the country, and in the proceedings against Louis XVI., we shall behold a terrible and singular spectacle. The violent party, in their extravagancy, aimed at remodelling entirely both the army and the civil administration of the empire, to get rid of the lukewarm and the suspected; they wished to force commerce into activity, and to inspire their enemies with dread, by the infliction of terrific vengeance. The moderate party, on the contrary, feared that to remodel would be to disorganize the armies, that commerce would be destroyed by constraint, and that terror would only urge people to revolt; but their adversaries, irritated by these apprehensions, only became the more determined to carry every thing before them by force. Such was the spectacle which the right and left side of the convention presented at this period.

The sitting of the 30th was much disturbed by the complaints against Roland, the improprieties of the municipality, and by the report of the Commissioners sent into the department of the Eure and Loire. Every thing is ripped up when once a detail of grievances is stated. On one side, the massacres of September and the inflammatory publications of the Jacobins, and on the other, the hesitation of the moderate party, the remains of royalism, and the delays by which they had impeded the national vengeance, were reciprocally retorted. Marat spoke on this occasion, and provoked, as usual, a general murmur of disgust. Robespierre then rose in the midst of tumult; "He was about," he said, "to propose the most effectual method of restoring the public tranquillity, of introducing peace and impartiality into the assembly, of confounding the enemies of the national convention, of imposing silence on all calumniators, and of frustrating the effect of their calumnies." "Propose it, propose it," cried many voices. Robespierre continued: "It is," said he, "to pass sentence of death to-morrow on the French tyrant, and destroy thus the rallying point of all conspirators. The day after to-morrow you may then settle the question of provisioning; and on the day following you may lay the foundations of a free constitution."

This crafty and emphatic manner of proposing means of ensuring the public safety, and of coupling it with a measure resisted by the right side, roused the Girondists, and obliged them to explain themselves on the great question of the process. "You speak of the king," said Buzot, "but the cause of all disturbances is to be found in those who wish that another should fill his place. When the proper time for debating what is to be done with him shall have arrived, I will not fail to explain myself on that subject with due severity; but the topic is foreign to the question now before us; we are engaged in considering the cause of the provincial disturbances; disturbances necessarily arise from anarchy, and anarchy from the non-execution of the laws, and this cause will continue to operate so long as the convention does nothing to ensure order. Legendre succeeded Buzot, and entreated his colleagues to throw aside all personalities, and to give their attention only to public concerns, and to seditions, which as they had no other object than that of saving the king, would cease when he should be no more. He proposed then that the opinions which had been delivered concerning the process should be laid upon the table, printed and distributed to all the deputies, and that it should be immediately decided whether Louis XVI. should be brought to trial, without losing any further time in protracted debates. Jean-Bon-Saint-André declared that there was no necessity for any preliminary questions, and that nothing remained to be done but to pronounce at once the condemnation of Louis XVI., and determine the manner of his punishment. The motion, however, of Legendre was finally adopted, and the discussion adjourned to the 3rd of December.

On this day, the order for the trial, the framing the act of accusation, and the forms to be observed on the trial were called for on every side. Robespierre claimed to be heard, and although it had been decided that the various opinions on this subject should be printed and not read, he obtained a hearing, "as he was about," he said, "to speak not upon the process, but against the process itself, and to demand condemnation without trial."

He maintained that to enter into a judicial process would be opening a deliberation, and that a deliberation supposed doubt, and the possibility of a result favourable to the accused. Now, by admitting the crime of Louis XVI. to be a matter to be resolved, was to accuse the Parisians, the federalists, and all the patriots, who had taken part in the revolution of the 10th of August. It was to absolve Louis XVI., the aristocrats, foreign powers, and their manifestoes from blame; thus, in a word, monarchy would be declared innocent, and the republic culpable.

"Observe, also," continued Robespierre, "the insolence of the enemies of liberty since you have proposed this doubt. In the month of August last, the partisans of the king hid themselves. Whosoever had undertaken his apology would have been punished as a traitor. But at present they come forward with effrontery; at present their insulting publications inundate Paris and the departments; armed men, invited within these walls without your knowledge, make the city resound with the cries of sedition, and demand impunity for Louis XVI. You have only to open the breach which these men long for the honour of defending! What do I say! Even now the opinions of the people are divided. Two months ago would any one have thought that the question of inviolability would have admitted of a moment's discussion? But," added Robespierre, "since the citizen Pétion has proposed it as a serious question, the doctrines of the constituent assembly have re-appeared in this place. Oh, guilt! Oh, shame! the tribune of the French nation has resounded with panegyrics on Louis XVI. We have heard the virtues and the acts of a tyrant applauded! Although we have found the greatest difficulty in saving our best citizens from the injustice of precipitate decisions, the cause of a tyrant is deemed so sacred, that it is considered impossible to give a too free or too lengthened discussion!

If we believe his apologists, these proceedings will last many months: they will be protracted to the next spring, when the despots of Europe intend to make a general attack on us. What a career will this open to the conspirators! What a field will it afford for intrigue and aristocracy to engage in!

"Just heavens! the ferocious hordes of despotism are already prepared to ravage our country in the name of Louis XVI. He still carries on war with the republic from the depths of his dungeon, and his guilt is yet doubted, and we hesitate to treat him as an enemy! It has been asked by what laws he is condemned. The constitution has been appealed to in his defence! The constitution condemns you for what you have already done. If dethronement is the only legal punishment you can inflict upon him, you were not empowered to pronounce it without a trial; you have no right to detain him in prison, he may justly demand his enlargement; the constitution condemns you; throw yourselves, therefore, at the feet of Louis, and implore his pardon."

These declamations, so full of gall, which amounted to no more than what Saint-Just had already said, made, nevertheless, a deep impression on the assembly, who were anxious to settle the question at the present sitting. Robespierre had required that Louis XVI. should be tried immediately; nevertheless, many members, and particularly Pétion, persisted in demanding that before the form of trial was fixed upon, Louis XVI. should be declared under a decree of accusation; for, said they, whatever celerity may be necessary in this proceeding, this is an indispensable preliminary. Robespierre attempted now again to address the assembly, and seemed, by his manner, to exact permission to do so, but his insolent demand gave offence, and the tribune was denied him. The assembly finally passed the following decree:—

"The national convention declares that Louis XVI. shall be tried by the same, (3rd December)."

On the 4th, the forms of proceedings to be observed were discussed. Buzot, who had been often heard speaking of royalism, now demanded permission to speak on the order of the day; to banish all suspicion, he commenced by proposing that the penalty of death should be pronounced against all those who should endeavour to establish monarchy in France. Such are the methods often resorted to by those who wish to prove themselves innocent of the charges of which they are suspected. This useless motion was hailed with universal applause; but the Mountain, who according to their own system could not prevent this measure, opposed it with ill temper, and Bazire requested liberty to reply to it. The cry of Question, question, was, however, loudly called for. Philipeaux then, seconding Bazire, proposed that the assembly should confine their attention exclusively to Louis XVI., and hold a permanent sitting until sentence should be finally pronounced upon him. It being asked what interest the Mountain could have in rejecting the proposition of Buzot, for there was no one who could regret that royalty was no more, Lejeune replied, that it was, in point of fact, renewing a question which had already been decided by the abolition of royalty. "But," said Rowbell, "it is necessary to add a penal denunciation to the decree of abolition; it is not, therefore, renewing a question already decided." Merlin, less cautious than his predecessors, suggested excepting the case of a proposition for the re-establishment of monarchy being made in primary assemblies. This amendment excited universal cries of indignation. "Behold the mystery discovered!" exclaimed many voices. "They wish for a king, but issuing from primary assemblies—from those assemblies which have produced a Marat, a Robespierre, and a Danton!" Merlin endeavoured to justify himself, by saying that he intended merely to pay homage to the sovereignty of the people. But he was silenced, as being considered a royalist, and it was proposed to call him to order. Guadet then rose, and with that bad faith which the most upright characters sometimes carry into violent debate, maintained that freedom of opinion should be respected; the more so, as thereby an important secret had been discovered. "The assembly," said he, "ought not to regret having heard this amendment, which demonstrates that a new species of despotism, to succeed to that just destroyed, is meditated; and Merlin, instead of being called to order, ought to receive the thanks of the convention." The voice of Guadet was now drowned in a general murmur. Bazire, Merlin, and Robespierre cried out that it was a falsehood; and it is true that the reproach of intending to substitute a plebeian king in the place of Louis XVI. was as absurd as that of the federalism objected to the Girondists. The assembly finally decreed the penalty of death against any one who should attempt to re-establish royalty in France, under whatsoever denomination it might exist.

The assembly then returned to the order of the day, and to the proposition of forming a permanent sitting. Robespierre demanded again that sentence should be passed immediately. Pétion, supported by the majority, was again victorious, and it was decided that neither the sitting of the convention should be permanent, or the sentence instantaneous, but that the assembly should attend every day solely to this subject, to the exclusion of every other, from eleven o'clock in the morning to six in the evening.

The following days were occupied in reading some papers found in the house of Laporte, and others discovered in a secret chest which the king had caused to be constructed in the body of the wall of the palace; the door was of iron, and it was afterwards called the iron chest. The workman employed in its fabrication had informed Roland of its existence, and he, anxious to ascertain the truth of this information, hastened to the Tuileries to examine it himself, without taking any witness with him, which gave occasion to his enemies to accuse him of having withheld some of the papers which were deposited there. Roland discovered in this closet all the documents relative to the communications which the court had held with the emigrants, and with several members of the former assemblies. The negotiation of the king with Mirabeau was also brought to light, and the memory of this great orator was about to be proscribed, when Manuel, his warm admirer, requested that these papers should be placed in the hands of the committee of public information, to be more minutely examined*. A committee was also appointed to frame from these documents a state of facts declarative of the acts imputed to Louis XVI. This state of facts, when prepared, was to be submitted to the assembly, for their approval. Louis XVI. was then to appear before the convention, there to be interrogated by the president upon every article contained in the state of facts. After his appearance, two subsequent days were to be allowed for his defence, and on the day following sentence was to be passed on Louis, singly and by each member of the convention. The executive power was ordered to take every measure to maintain the public tranquillity whilst the king was conveyed to the assembly. These arrangements were ordered on the 9th.

On the 10th the state of facts was presented to the assembly, and the appearance of Louis XVI. was ordered to take place on the next day, the 11th of December.

This unfortunate monarch was now about to enter into the presence of the national convention, and to be subjected to an interrogatory concerning every act of his reign. The news of these proceedings had come even to the knowledge of Cléry, by secret intelligence which he had obtained out of doors, who did not communicate them to the wretched family in the Temple without trembling for the result. Not daring, however, to give direct information on the subject to Louis, he had confided this intelligence to Madame Elizabeth, and told her besides, that the commune had determined to separate the king from his family during the proceedings against him. In concert with this princess, he devised an expedient, by which he might hold intercourse with the queen and herself during this separation. Cléry, being permitted to accompany the king, he agreed to send a handkerchief to the princesses if his master should be ill. This was all the communication the unhappy prisoners could then hold with each other. The king was informed by his sister of his approaching appearance before the assembly, and of the separation which would then take place. He received this news with perfect resignation, and prepared to support with firmness the distressing scene to which he was about to be summoned.

The commune ordered that, on the morning of the 11th, all the administrative bodies should be assembled, that all the sections should be armed, that the guards of all the public places, dépôts, &c. should be augmented two hundred men each, that numerous corps of reserve should be posted at several points, with a strong complement of artillery, and that a chosen escort should accompany the carriage in which the king was conveyed to the assembly.

On the morning of the 11th the beating of the générale announced the approach of this sad and novel scene. A numerous body of military surrounded the Temple; and the noise and bustle occasioned by the arrival of the soldiers, horses, and carriages, reached the prisoners, who pretended to be ignorant of the cause of these preparations. At nine o'clock, the family, as usual, met in the king's room for breakfast. The municipal officers, more vigilant than ever, repressed by their presence the slightest mutual communication. They were at last separated. The king requested in vain that his son might be left with him a few minutes longer. In spite of his entreaties the child was taken away, and he remained alone for about two hours. The mayor of Paris and the procureur of the commune then arrived, and communicated to him the order of the convention, which summoned him to their bar under the name of Louis Capet,—"Capet!" replied the prince, "that is the name of one of my ancestors, but it is not mine." He then rose, and took his seat in the carriage of the mayor, who attended him. Six hundred chosen men formed his escort. The advance and rear guard was composed of a strong body of cavalry. Numerous throngs of the population contemplated in silence this sad procession, and submitted with grief to this act of unjust rigour, as they had submitted to many of a similar nature under the old government. A few exclamations of indignation indeed broke forth, but they were very few. The king was not moved, and diverted his attention, with the greatest tranquillity, by observations called forth by different objects on his road. Being arrived at the Feuillans, he was conducted into an apartment, and there awaited the orders of the assembly.

Meanwhile many motions were made relative to the manner in which Louis should be received. It was proposed that no petition should be heard, that no one should be allowed to speak, that no sign of approbation or disapprobation should be permitted. "We must," said Legendre, "strike terror, by observing the silence of the tomb." A murmur of disapprobation condemned these cruel expressions. Defermont requested that a chair should be allowed the accused; this was consented to without discussion, and a chair was placed at the bar. From a ridiculous feeling of vanity, Manuel proposed that the question of the order of the day should be discussed, that the assembly might not appear to give importance to the king by paying exclusive attention to him; "Ought we not," added he, "to make him wait at the door?" A bill respecting the emigrants was then debated.

Santerre finally announced the arrival of Louis. Barrère, the president, then rose up. "Citizens," said he, "the eyes of Europe are fixed upon you; posterity will judge you with inflexible severity; preserve then the dignity and unruffled demeanour of judges; recollect the solemn silence with which Louis was received when he was brought back from Varennes."

Louis remained at the bar of the convention for about two hours and a half. The mayor, and the generals Santerre and Wittengoff, were stationed at each side of him. A profound silence prevailed in the assembly. The dignity of Louis, and the calm tranquillity of his countenance in so calamitous a situation, affected every one. The deputies of the centre were strongly moved. The Girondists experienced a powerful emotion. Saint-Just, Robespierre, and Marat, felt their fanaticism die within

* This discovery took place at the sitting of the 5th of December. A desire was expressed of breaking Mirabeau's bust to pieces, and to order that his remains should be removed from the Pantheon: but on that day the assembly contented themselves with covering his bust with a cloth.

"Be seated," said Barrère to Louis, "and answer the questions that are about to be put to you." Louis sat down and listened to the perusal of the act of accusation, article by article; in this all the faults of the court were made to bear personally on Louis XVI. The interruption of the sittings of the 20th of June, 1789; the Royal Session (lit de justice) held on the 23rd of the same month; the conspiracy of the aristocracy, frustrated by the insurrection of the 14th of July; the fêtes of the garde-du-corps; the outrages against the national cockade; the refusal to sanction the declaration of rights, and many other constitutional articles; nay, facts which manifested a new conspiracy in October, followed by the scenes of the 5th and 6th of the same month; the speech of reconciliation which succeeded these events, and promised repentance, which proved to be insincere; the violation of the oath taken at the confederation on the 14th of July; the negotiations entered into with Talon and Mirabeau, for the purpose of producing a counter-revolution; the money appropriated to the corruption of numerous deputies; the meeting of the chevaliers du poignard, on the 28th of February, 1791; the flight of Varennes; the firing on the people at the Champ de Mars; the silence observed with regard to the convention of Pilnitz; the delay of the promulgation of the decree which united Avignon to France; the insurrections of Nîmes, Montauban, Mende, and Jallés; the continuation of pay granted to emigrant bodyguards, and to the licensed constitutional guard; the secret correspondence with the emigrant princes; the insufficiency of the armies on the frontiers; the refusal to sanction the camp of twenty thousand men; the disarmament of all the strong places of France; the tardy announcement of the march of the Prussians; the organization of secret associations in the interior of Paris; the review of the Swiss and other troops, which formed the garrison of the palace on the morning of the 10th; the doubling of the guard on that day; the summoning of the mayor to the Tuileries; and, finally, the effusion of blood which had been occasioned by this military array, were all laid to the charge of Louis.

By denying the position, that the regret which the king experienced on the loss of his former authority was natural, his whole conduct was made to appear highly criminal, for his whole bearing had exhibited nothing but a continued regret, mingled with some timid efforts to regain what he had lost. At the end of the reading of each article the president turned to Louis, and said, What answer have you to make. The king with a firm voice denied some of the charges, referred others to his ministers, and appealed constantly to the constitution, from which he declared he had never swerved. His answers were delivered in moderate language. But to this charge, You have shed the blood of the people on the 10th of August, he exclaimed in an animated manner: "No, Sir, no, it was not I!"

He was then showed all the papers which had been found in the palace, some of which he refused to acknowledge, and he even denied the existence of the iron closet, which produced an unfavourable impression, and was very impolitic, as the fact was already proved. He then demanded a copy of the act of accusation and the other papers, and also counsel to assist him.

The president now signified to him that he might retire. He was offered some refreshments in an adjoining apartment, and then, re-entering the carriage, was conducted back to the Temple. He arrived at his prison at half-past six o'clock, and his first request was to see his family; but this was refused, as the commune had ordered a separation whilst the proceedings lasted. At half-past eight, when supper was announced, he requested again permission to embrace his children; but the suspicions of the commune made all his jailors barbarians, and he was again denied this consolation.

Meantime, the assembly was thrown into confusion by reason of the demand of Louis for counsel. Treillard and Pétion insisted warmly that this request should be granted; Tallien, Billaud-Varennes, Chabot, and Merlin opposed it with equal ardour, saying that sentence would be delayed by the quibbles of law. Finally, however, the assembly allowed counsel. A deputation was commissioned to carry this information to Louis, and to ask on whom his choice fell. He named Target, or Tronchet, or both, if possible. He asked besides for pens and ink, that he might draw up his defence, and begged permission to see his family. The convention decided immediately that his requests should be complied with, and that those whom he had chosen for his counsel should be informed of this selection and be permitted to communicate freely with him; they also allowed him access to his family.

Target declined the office with which Louis had charged him, saying that since 1785 he had given up pleading. Tronchet then wrote immediately to say he was ready to undertake the defence of Louis; and whilst the assembly were occupied in finding a new counsellor in place of the former, they received a letter from a citizen of sixty years of age; it was from the venerable Malesherbes, the friend and companion of Turgot, and the most respected magistrate in France. This noble-minded old man thus expressed himself: "I have been called twice into the councils of him who was formerly my master, at the time when this office was an object of ambition to all; I owe him the same service now, when it has become an office dangerous to many!"

He begged the president to inform Louis that he was ready to undertake his defence.

Many other citizens made the same offer, of which Louis was informed. He returned them all his thanks, but accepted only of the services of Tronchet and Malesherbes. The commune resolved that these two defenders should undergo a most rigorous examination before they were permitted to communicate with their client. The convention again gave permission for a free communication, renewed their orders to this effect, and informed Tronchet and Malesherbes that they were at liberty to enter the Temple. Louis, at first sight of the latter, ran to embrace him; the venerable old man fell at his feet, bursting into tears. The king raised him, and they remained long in a mutual embrace. They then commenced the defence without further delay. Messengers from the assembly brought fresh papers daily, which they had orders to communicate to the unfortunate monarch. Louis perused them with much attention and tranquillity, which on each occasion increased the astonishment of the messengers.

The only consolation he had requested, that of seeing his family, had not yet been granted him, notwithstanding the decree of the convention. The commune, throwing obstacles in the way, called for a copy of this decree. "It was in vain to order it," said Tallien, "if the commune does not allow it, it will never take place." These insolent expressions excited much tumult. Nevertheless, the assembly, modifying their decree, permitted the king only to see his two children, but on condition that they returned to their mother during the proceedings. Louis, feeling that they were more necessary to the queen than himself, determined not to deprive her of this solace, and submitted to this new affliction with a resignation which was perfectly unalterable throughout all his sufferings.

As the proceedings advanced, the importance of the question became more and more evident. The one party foresaw that to destroy, by regicide, the ancient monarchy, would be to embark upon an inexorable system of vengeance and cruelty, and to commence a war of extirpation against the old order of things; and although they were desirous of abolishing this system, they wished to enact it in a less violent manner. The other party, on the contrary, were eager to enter upon this war of extirpation, which would admit neither of hesitation or withdrawal, and would interpose a gulf between monarchy and the revolution. The person of the king was altogether lost in the consideration of this grand question; and the only question was, whether it were needful to discover the present from the past by an act at once terrible and decisive. The result was all that was looked at, and the victim upon whom the blow was to fall was entirely lost sight of.

The Girondists inveighed bitterly against the Jacobins, dwelt continually upon the crimes of September, and represented them as anarchists, who aimed at domineering over the convention by terror, and desired the death of the king only to substitute triumvirs in his place. Guadet succeeded in driving them nearly all from the convention, by causing the adoption of a decree by which electoral assemblies were to be convoked, to confirm or recall their deputies. This proposition, which was moved and carried in a few minutes, terribly dismayed the Jacobins. Other circumstances gave them still further alarm. The federalists continued to arrive from all quarters. The municipalities sent a multitude of addresses, approving of a republic, and congratulating the assembly on having established it, and condemned the crimes and excesses of anarchy. The corresponding societies reproached the mother institution with cherishing men of blood in its bosom, who perverted the public morals, and would even attempt the safety of the convention. Some of them even disclaimed their political mother, declared that they did not wish to belong to her, and intimated their intention to fly to Paris to protect the assembly. All demanded the expulsion of Marat, and some that of Robespierre himself.

The Jacobins, in despair, declared that the public mind of France was corrupted; recommended union to their club, and lost no time in writing to the provinces, to enlighten their deluded brethren; they also accused the traitor Roland of having intercepted their correspondence, and substituting hypocritical communications in their place, which perverted the public opinion. They proposed a voluntary donation for the circulation of good publications, especially the admirable speeches of Robespierre, and they tried every means of insuring their arrival at their several destinations, in spite of Roland, who violated the secrecy of the post. They, however, agreed in one point, that Marat compromised their popularity; and they deemed it needful that the mother institution should point out to France the difference between this man, whose exasperated mind urged him beyond all bounds, and the wise and virtuous Robespierre, who kept himself always within the limits of moderation, and who aimed only at what was at the same time just and practicable. A great controversy existed in respect of these two individuals. They acknowledged that Marat was a bold and hardy partisan, but too exaggerated in his views. He had been useful, they said, to the cause of the people, but he knew not where to stop. His defenders replied that he did not consider it necessary to bring all his speculations into practice, and that no one knew better at what point it was proper to check the people. They cited many of his expressions to confirm the truth of their assertions, such as the following: "More than one Marat is not needful in the republic."—"I demand the most that I may obtain the least—I would rather that my head should wither than write what I do write, if I believed the people would literally execute what I counsel.—I only overcharge the people, because I know they beat me down in price." The galleries ratified the justification of Marat by their applause. Nevertheless, the club resolved to publish an address, in which to describe the difference between the character of Robespierre and Marat; and distinguish the vehemence of the one from the wisdom of the other*. After this measure, they proposed to adopt many others, and resolved not to cease urging the departure of the federalists to the frontiers. If, for example, they learnt that the army of Dumouriez became weakened by desertion, they cried out for a reinforcement of federalists. Marat, in his journal, asserted that the volunteers who had joined the army first, had now been a year on active service, and that it was time they should be relieved by those who remained at Paris: the public had just received intelligence that Custine had been obliged to abandon Frankfurt, and that Beurnonville had failed in his attempt upon the Electorate of Trèves; and the Jacobins maintained, that if those two generals had been supported by the federalists who uselessly clogged the capital, they would not have experienced this check.

The fruitless attempt of Beurnonville, and the retreat of Custine, singularly agitated the public mind. Yet these events might have been anticipated; for Beurnonville, undertaking his enterprise in a bad season, with an insufficient force, and in a country difficult of access, could not but fail; and Custine, who would fall back upon the Rhine, to avoid confessing his temerity, was necessarily forced to retreat to Mayence. Public misfortunes always become an occasion of mutual reproach to parties. The Jacobins, hating the generals suspected of aristocratic principles, called them Feuillans and Girondists. Marat clamoured again against the rage of conquest which possessed the public mind, which he said he had always condemned, and which originated in a disguised ambition of the generals to obtain a formidable degree of power. Robespierre's reproaches, springing from his private animosities, lighted upon the infamous faction, as he called them, which domineered over the assembly, and upon the executive power, which he maintained were alone blameworthy, and not the generals of the armies. The perfidious Roland, the intriguing Brissot, and the wretches Louvet, Guadet, and Vergniaud, were the authors, he declared, of all the calamities of France. He hoped, he said, that he should be the first to be assassinated by them; but he wished, previously, to have the pleasure of imprecating them for their crimes. Dumouriez and Custine, he added, knew them well, and took care to join their party: but everybody else feared them, because they had wealth, places, and all the influence of the republic, at their disposal. Their intention, he asserted, was to enslave the nation, and they therefore endeavoured to cripple the exertions of all true patriots, and thus expose France to be conquered by her enemies. Their principal object, he said, was to destroy the Jacobin club, and to assassinate whosoever should have the courage to resist their iniquitous designs; and as for myself, exclaimed Robespierre, I ask only to fall by the dagger of Roland*!

This furious hatred communicating itself to the entire club, agitated it as a stormy sea; every one prepared for a deadly struggle; every idea of reconciliation was rejected, and as there had been a proposal of an arrangement, they resolved never to "kiss and make it up."

The same scenes took place in the assembly during the interval in which Louis XVI. was preparing his defence. It was repeated every where that the royalists menaced the patriots, and circulated pamphlets in favour of the king. Thuriot proposed a method of silencing these clamours; it was to proclaim the penalty of death against any one who should attempt to destroy the unity of the republic, or detach any portion of society from it. This decree was directed against the idle story of federalism, that is to say, against the Girondists. Buzot hastened to rebut it by another, demanding the exile of the family of Orleans. Both parties thus reciprocated falsehood and calumnies. Whilst the Jacobins accused the Girondists of federalism, the latter reproached the former with the intention of placing the Duke of Orleans on the throne, and of desiring the death of Louis XVI. only for the purpose of rendering his place vacant.

The Duke of Orleans still resided in Paris, endeavouring in vain to escape observation by mixing with the assembly. This situation, in the midst of furious demagogues, undoubtedly little suited him; but where could he fly? In all parts of Europe he would have fallen into the hands of the emigrants; and outrages, and perhaps death, awaited this seion of royalty, who had renounced his birth and his rank. In France he endeavoured to conceal both under the most humble title, and took the name of Equality (Egalité). But the memory of his former state in society was not to be effaced; his immense riches still recalled it incessantly to recollection. Unless he had clothed himself in rags, and made himself contemptible by assuming plebeian manners, how could he have escaped suspicion? In the ranks of the Girondists he would have been irretrievably ruined, and all the reproaches of attachment to royalty which were levelled against that party, would have received a colour of truth from his presence. Among the Jacobins he was supported by the violence of Paris; but he did not escape the accusations of the Girondists, and, in point of fact, it was that which did befall him. These latter, who could not pardon his joining the party of their adversaries, openly hinted that he could only render himself supportable, by lavishing his riches on the anarchists, and thus furnishing them with resources from his immense wealth.

The suspicious Louvet went further, and believed that the duke still cherished the hope of attaining to regal power. Without partaking of this opinion, but merely for the purpose of rebutting the motion of Thuriot, Buzot ascended the tribune: "If the decree," said he, "of Thuriot is calculated to restore confidence to the public, I am about to propose another not less so. Monarchy is overthrown, but it still lives in the recollections of its creatures; let us imitate the Romans; they expelled both Tarquin and all his family; let us, in like manner, drive out from among us all the family of the Bourbons. A part of this family is in chains, but there is another part still more dangerous, because more popular; I mean the Orleans branch. The bust of the Duke of Orleans has been paraded through the streets of Paris; his sons have distinguished themselves in our armies; and the very merits of this family make them dangerous to the cause of liberty. Let them, then, make a last sacrifice to their country; let them carry elsewhere the misfortune of having been allied to a throne, and the still heavier one of bearing a name which is odious to us, and which cannot fail to wound the ears of a free man." Louvet, following Buzot, addressed the duke personally, reminded him of the voluntary exile of Collatinus, and urged him to imitate so noble an example. Lanjuinais referred to the elections of Paris, of which Egalité was a deputy, and bade the assembly recollect that these elections had taken place under the daggers of a violent faction; he dwelt upon the effort which had been made to nominate a chancellor of the house of Orleans minister at war; he alluded to the influence the sons of this family had acquired in our armies, and from all these reasons, he finally demanded the banishment of all the Bourbons. Bazire, Saint-Just, and Chabot, resisted this motion, rather from a spirit of opposition to the Girondists, than from any feeling to the Duke of Orleans. They maintained that the present was not the time to treat as an enemy the only

Bourbon who had conducted himself loyally towards the nation; that the Bourbon in prison should be first punished, the constitution then established, and that it would afterwards be quite time enough for the assembly to turn their attention towards citizens then become dangerous; that to banish the Duke of Orleans from France, would be to sentence him to death, and that this cruel measure should be at least postponed. Nevertheless the decree of banishment was passed by acclamation. It only now remained to determine the time of its duration in drawing up the act: "Since you have recourse to ostracism against Egalité," said Merlin, "employ it equally against all dangerous men; and, first, against the executive power"—"Against Roland," exclaimed Albite—"Against Roland and Pache," added Barrère, "who have become authors of division among us. Exclude them both from the ministry, and tranquillity and union will be restored."—Kersaint, however, apprehended that England would take advantage of this disorganization of the ministry, to inflict upon us a disastrous war, as she had formerly done, on the disgrace of d'Argenson and Machan in 1757.

Rewbell questioned the right of the assembly to banish a representative of the people, and asked if

Philip Egalité, under this title, did not belong to the nation, by whom he had been made a deputy. These observations caused some hesitation in the convention. The discussion was interrupted, and resumed, and, without revoking the decree of banishment against the Bourbons, the question was adjourned for three days, in order to tranquillize themselves, and afford time for reflecting gravely on the question whether they could banish Egalité, and safely deprive themselves of the two ministers, of war and of the interior.

After this debate, it is easy to imagine the disorder that prevailed in the sections, the commune, and at the Jacobin club. A cry was raised against the ostracism of the assembly, and petitions were got up to be presented upon the resumption of the debate. After three days the debate re-commenced, and the mayor, at the head of the sections, demanded the annulment of the decree. This petition being read, the assembly passed to the order of the day; but Pétion observing the tumult it had occasioned, proposed adjourning the question till sentence should have been passed upon Louis XVI. This middle course was adopted, and the popular passions again raged with undivided fury against their victim in the Temple. This remarkable procedure was now immediately resumed.

CHAPTER V.

CONTINUATION OF THE PROCESS AGAINST LOUIS XVI.; HIS DEFENCE—STORMY DEBATES IN THE CONVENTION—THE GRANDIERS PROPOSE THE APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE; OPINION OF THE DEPUTY SALLES; SPEECH OF ROBESPIERRE; SPEECH OF VERGNAUD—THE PUTTING OF THE QUESTIONS. LOUIS XVI. IS DECLARED GUILTY, AND CONDEMNED TO DEATH WITHOUT APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE, AND WITHOUT DELAY OF EXECUTION—REMARKS UPON THE DEBATES AND THE VOTES AS GIVEN—ASSASSINATION OF THE DEPUTY LAPELLETIER-SAINT-YARGEAU—PUBLIC FERMENT AT PARIS—THE PARTING OF LOUIS XVI. WITH HIS FAMILY; HIS LAST MOMENTS IN PRISON AND UPON THE SCAFFOLD.

THE time granted to Louis to prepare his defence was scarcely sufficient to compare the documents on which it was to be established. His two defenders demanded a third, more young and active than themselves, who might draw up and deliver the defence, and leave to them only the task of preparing the materials. This young associate was the advocate Desèze, who had defended Bezenval after the 14th of July. The convention, who had allowed the king to make a defence, did not deny him the means of doing so, and Desèze was permitted, as well as Malesherbes and Tronchet, free access to the Temple. The papers by which the charges were supported were daily laid before him; he received them with an air of perfect indifference, "as if," said the report of the commune, "the proceedings had rather concerned any other than himself." He behaved towards the commissaries with the greatest politeness, and offered them refreshments when they were detained long in his apartment. Whilst these proceedings were going on, he found out a method of corresponding with his family. He wrote to them with the pens and paper which were given him for his defence, and the princesses scratched their answers on the same paper with the point of a pin. They sometimes folded up their notes in balls of thread, which the servant who attended the king at meals threw under the table; and they were often obliged to convey them to this servant by letting them drop down the stairs by means of a string. The unhappy prisoners thus informed themselves of each other's health, and derived great consolation from this secret intercourse.

Finally, M. Desèze, working day and night, brought the defence to a conclusion. The king made him suppress those parts which were too rhetorical, and wished to confine him to the simple details of his government. At half-past nine o'clock on the morning of the 26th, all the armed forces of Paris were prepared for the transfer of Louis from the Temple to the Feuillans, the same precautions and order being observed as on the former occasion. Having entered the carriage of the mayor, he conversed on the road with his usual tranquillity; the topics of his conversation were Seneca, Livy, and the hospitals, and he even made a jocular and finely pointed observation on one of the municipal officers keeping himself covered while inside the carriage. On his arrival at the Feuillans he manifested much anxiety for his defenders; he was seated by their side in the assembly; he regarded, with perfect tranquillity, the benches where sat his judges and accusers; seemed to be trying to discover in their countenances the effect which the pleading of M. Desèze would produce, and conversed sometimes, with a smiling aspect, with Tronchet and Malesherbes. The assembly listened to the defence in solemn silence, and testified no disapprobation.

M. Desèze began with examining the line of defence Louis had a right to follow, and then dwelt upon the facts laid to the charge of Louis XVI. Although the assembly had implicitly decreed that the law of inviolability could not be appealed to, M. Desèze proved very conclusively that nothing could limit the right of defence, and that the accused was at liberty to avail himself of every topic which could tend to his exculpation, in spite of the decisions of the convention; that consequently, if Louis deemed the law of inviolability defensible, he was free to maintain it. He was first obliged to acknowledge the sovereignty of the people, and with all the defenders of the constitution of 1791, he contended, that this sovereignty, as being absolute mistress, could bind herself by an engagement; that it had done so with respect to Louis XVI, in conceding inviolability, and that this was not unreasonable in the monarchical system; that consequently this compact was binding, and that whatever crimes the king might have committed, they were only punishable by dethronement. He declared, that if this were not true, the constitution of 1791 became a cruel snare laid for Louis XVI., as its maintenance was promised with the secret intention of its being violated. He added, that if Louis was denied the rights of a king, he should at least be left in possession of those of a citizen; and he asked, where were those forms preservative of justice which every citizen was at liberty to claim, such as a distinction between the grand jury and the petty jury, the power of the right of challenge, a majority of two-thirds, secrecy of votes, and the silence of the judges whilst they were forming their opinions. He asserted boldly that he looked on every side for judges, and found only accusers. He then passed to the discussion of the facts, which he divided into two classes, those which had followed and those which preceded the acceptance of the constitutional act. The first, he said, were rendered unimpeachable by this acceptance, and the latter by the law of inviolability. Yet he did not shrink from their examination, and this he entered into with great advantage to the accused, because, for want of positive proof of the communications of Louis with foreign powers, many insignificant facts had been accumulated, rather of presumptive than conclusive evidence. He successfully repelled the accusation which made the king the cause of the effusion of blood shed on the 10th of August. In fact, the aggressor on that day was not Louis XVI., but the people. It was lawful for him, being attacked, to defend himself, and he only took the precautions necessary for that purpose. The magistrates themselves had approved of these precautions, and had given the troops an express order to repel force by force. The king, however, said M. Desèze, was unwilling to exert this authority, which he had received both from nature and from the laws, and had retired to the legislative assembly to avoid all effusion of blood. In the conflict which followed he was not at all implicated, and rather deserved thanks than blame for the order he had given under his hand to the Swiss, which was the cause of their abandoning the defence of the palace. It was therefore, he maintained, a manifest injustice to accuse Louis XVI. of having shed the blood of the people, for on this point he was beyond reproach; in fact, he had displayed the utmost forbearance and propriety.

M. Desèze finished his speech in the following just and concise manner, in which he touched, for the first time, upon the private virtues of the king.

"Louis XVI. ascended the throne at the age of twenty, and at that early season of life afforded an example of blameless morals to monarchs. He brought with him to the supreme power, no criminal weaknesses, no corrupt passions; he was economical, just, and temperate in his habits, and showed himself the constant friend of the people. The people desired the abolition of a grievous tax; he abolished it: they demanded the abolition of servitude; he commenced by abolishing it in his own domains: they solicited the reform of judicial legislation; he made these reforms: they desired that the great mass of the French nation, whom the rigour of our ancient customs had till then deprived of their rights, should acquire or recover them; these he gave them the enjoyment of by his laws: they cried for liberty, and he granted it! He even anticipated their wants by his personal sacrifices, and yet it is in the name of this same people that his blood is this day demanded! Citizens, I cannot conclude—History will give her verdict: recollect she will pass judgment on your sentence, and her decision will stand for ages yet to come!"

Louis then briefly addressed the assembly immediately after his defender had concluded, from a written memorandum of his own dictation. "You have just heard," said he, "my defence; I shall not further insist upon the arguments there urged; but, as I am addressing you, perhaps, for the last time, I feel it incumbent on me to declare that my conscience is free from guilt, and that my defenders have spoken the truth.

"I have never feared the public examination of my conduct; but I am deeply grieved to find that the effusion of blood of the 10th of August is laid to my charge.

"The multiplied proofs which I have ever given of my love to the people, and my general conduct towards them, appear to me sufficient to prove that I did not fear to expose myself, to prevent the effusion of this blood, and should for ever relieve me from so foul an imputation."

The president then asked Louis XVI. if he had any thing further to say in his defence, and, having received an answer in the negative, informed him that he might retire. He was then conducted into an adjoining apartment, where he manifested the most amiable solicitude about the young Desèze, who appeared fatigued with his protracted address. Having again taken his place in the carriage, he conversed, with serenity, with those who escorted him, and arrived at the Temple about five o'clock.

Scarcely had Louis quitted the convention, when a violent tumult arose. Some wished to open a discussion on his conduct; others complained of the eternal delays which retarded the final sentence, and called for the instant vote; saying that every tribunal, having heard the accused, immediately gave their verdict. Lanjuinais, from the commencement of the proceedings, had manifested a warm feeling of indignation against the adversaries of the king, which his impetuous temper would not suffer him to conceal. He sprang to the tribune, whilst the most uproarious cries filled the assembly, and demanded, not a delay for the purposes of a debate, but the annulment of the judicial process altogether. "The times of ferocity," exclaimed he, "have gone by; the assembly will eternally dishonour itself by passing sentence on Louis XVI.; France has no right," said he, "to pass this sentence, and the convention are particularly incompetent to exercise such authority. As a political body," continued he, "we can only take measures of safety against the ex-king; but as a tribunal, we act in defiance of every principle of law, for the conquered is thus tried by his conquerors, nearly every member present having declared himself one of the conspirators of the 10th of August." At the word conspirators, a most awful tumult prevailed on all sides. "Order! order! To the Abbey;" and cries were heard of "Come down from the tribune!" Lanjuinais endeavoured in vain to justify his offensive expression, saying that he used it in the honourable sense, and that the insurrection of the 10th of August was a glorious conspiracy. He proceeded in his speech, notwithstanding the stunning clamour which surrounded him, and concluded by declaring that he would rather perish than condemn even the most odious tyrant, against every principle of law.

A host of speakers succeeded him, and the disorder increased every moment. There was no hearing one another; the deputies quitted their seats, grouped together, insulted and menaced each other, and the president was at last obliged to put on his hat. After the lapse of about an hour, the uproar subsided, and the assembly, adopting the notions of those who demanded a debate upon the question of the process against Louis XVI. declared the debate to have commenced, and that it should be continued without interruption, until a final sentence were passed.

This discussion was resumed on the 27th; many orators, who had already spoken, repaired to the tribune. Saint-Just again presented himself. The appearance of Louis XVI. humiliated, vanquished, and serene in the midst of his misfortunes, had given rise to unpleasant reflections in his mind. But these he satisfied, by calling Louis a supple and modest tyrant, who had oppressed the people with a modest demeanour, and defended himself with similar decorum; and he maintained, that the convention should be most especially on their guard against this insinuating softness of manner. He acknowledged that the king had called together the states-general, but contended that his object in this was only to humble the nobility, and strengthen his own power, by weakening theirs: thus, when he observed the rapid elevation of the states, he had endeavoured to disperse them. On the 14th of July, and on the 5th and 6th of October, he was observed to have in secret got together the means of overwhelming the people: whenever his conspiracies were thwarted by the national energy, he feigned acquiescence in the views of the people, and manifested an unnatural and hypocritical joy at their victories. "Afterwards, being no longer able to resort to force, he had corrupted," said Saint-Just, "the representatives of the nation, tampered with foreign powers, and driven the ministers to despair, so that one of them was obliged to declare to him, Your secret communications prevent the execution of the laws, and I must retire. Finally, added Saint-Just, having constantly engaged in the most perfidious designs against the nation, till the 10th of August, he now affects the semblance of inoffensive gentleness, to impose upon his judges and escape justice."

Thus were the natural and timid hesitations of Louis XVI. represented by the violent demagogues, who mistook weakness and simple regret for the past, for the premeditations of perfidy. Other orators succeeded Saint-Just, but the Girondists had not yet spoken, and their opinions were anxiously awaited, for it was high time that they avowed their real principles. We have already mentioned their indecision, their tendency to be affected, and their inclination to excuse in Louis XVI. a resistance which they were more capable of considering with propriety than their adversaries. Vergniaud admitted before some friends that he had been deeply moved by the late scene. Others, perhaps, though not so much affected as himself, likewise felt much interest in the illustrious victim; in this difficulty, they imagined a method, concealing their emotion, and at the same time of freeing themselves from their present embarrassment, this was by an appeal to the people. They thus sought to exonerate themselves from a dangerous responsibility, and to throw the ignominy of the king's condemnation, or the reproach of royalism, should he be acquitted, from their own shoulders on those of the nation. This was certainly an expedient of weakness. Being moved by the calamitous situation of Louis, they ought undoubtedly to have courageously undertaken his defence themselves, and not have provoked a civil war, by referring a question the most likely to awaken the furious passions of an agitated population, to the forty-four thousand sections which divided France. They should have manfully exerted that influence they possessed, and not have cast upon the people a duty which they were utterly incompetent to perform, and which was pregnant with such fearful consequences to the country. Here it was that the Girondists gave their adversaries a great advantage, by authorising them to foment a civil war, and by bringing their own courage and candour under suspicion. Thus the Jacobins were ready enough to acknowledge that those who contended for the acquittal of Louis XVI. were more frank and estimable than those who proposed an appeal to the people. But such is the usual conduct of moderate parties. On this occasion, as on the 2nd and 3rd of September, the Girondists were unwilling to endanger their power and popularity for the sake of a king whom they regarded as an enemy, and who had, as they thought, attempted to put them down by the sword of Prussia and Austria; yet, softened by the miseries of this vanquished foe, they were desirous of defending him, were indignant at the ungenerous treatment he received, and, in fact, did quite enough to ruin themselves, but not sufficient to rescue the object of their solicitude.

Salles, who adopted all the suspicious conceptions of Louvet, and who even surpassed him in his suppositions of plots and intrigues, was the first who proposed and defended the appeal to the people on the 27th. Acknowledging the criminality of Louis XVI. as imputed to him by the republicans, and avowing that he merited every severity that could be demonstrated, he observed, nevertheless, that the assembly was not about to inflict a penalty of vengeance, but to execute a great political act; and he maintained that it was in this point of view that the question should be considered. In the case either of acquittal or condemnation, he perceived the greatest inconveniences. If acquitted, the king would become the rallying point of all parties, and the cause of perpetual discord. The memory of his attempt against the liberties of the nation would constantly reproach the indulgence of the assembly; his impunity would scandalize the public, and perhaps give occasion to popular revolts, and afford a pretext for all sorts of agitators. Those who had already disorganized the state of society by their crimes, would consider this act of clemency as justifying the commission of new excesses, as they had fancied themselves authorized by the dilatoriness of justice to perpetrate the massacres of September. On every side the convention would be accused of deficiency of courage, in not having put a stop at once to the public disorders, and in not laying the foundations of a republic, by a terrible and energetic example.

On the other hand, if condemned, Louis would leave to his family all the pretensions of his race, and would also bequeath them to his brothers, more formidable than himself, because less disrespected by reason of incapacity. The people also, forgetting his crimes, and only recollecting his sufferings, might pity his unhappy lot, and the factions might thus find occasion to exasperate them against the national convention. The sovereigns of Europe now preserved a solemn silence, awaiting an event which they hoped would excite general indignation; but, the king once executed, they would seize upon this pretext, and fall in concert upon France, in order to tear the country in pieces. The nation then, perhaps, groaning under its calamities, might reproach the convention with having perpetrated an act which had provoked so cruel and disastrous a war.

"Such," said Salles, "is the fatal alternative which presents itself to the consideration of the national convention. In this situation, the nation itself must be appealed to, to decide its own fate by pronouncing that of Louis XVI. The danger of a civil war is perfectly chimerical; on the convention of the primary assemblies for the election of the national convention no civil war broke out. Why then should we fear one on an occasion equally important, especially when we intend to refer to these very assemblies to sanction the constitution?" In vain did the adversaries of this measure urge the difficulties and delays which a new discussion in forty-four thousand assemblies would occasion; they were answered, that these assemblies would not be called upon to deliberate, but to choose between two propositions presented by the convention. These propositions would be thus stated: shall Louis XVI. be punished with death, or detained in prison until the peace? The answer should be couched in these words: Detained, or, Put to death. Extraordinary couriers being employed, a definitive answer might arrive in fifteen days from the most distant part of France.

This opinion had been listened to under various impressions of feeling. Serres the deputy of the Upper Alps retracted his first opinion, which was for an immediate sentence, and demanded an appeal to the people. Barbaroux contended against the justification set up by Louis, without coming to any conclusion, for he dared not acquit him against the wishes of his constituents, or condemn him contrary to the opinions of his friends. Buzot advocated the appeal to the people, but modified the motion of Salles, requiring the convention to pronounce the sentence of death, and referring to the primary assemblies merely for their sanction to this sentence. Rabaut-Saint-Etienne, a protestant minister, who had already distinguished himself in the constituent assembly, was indignant at the cumulated powers exercised by the convention. "As for me," said he, "I am weary of my share of despotism; I am jaded, harassed, and oppressed with the tyranny in which I am obliged to take my individual share, and I sigh for the arrival of that moment when you will have created a tribunal in which I shall not see the form and aspect of a tyrant.—You seek reasons of policy; these are to be found in history.—The people of London, who so urgently demanded the death of their king, were the first to execrate his judges, and prostrate themselves before his successor. When Charles II. ascended the throne, that city invited him to a magnificent repast, manifested the most extravagant joy, and were eager to assist at the execution of those judges whom Charles sacrificed to the shade of his father. People of Paris, parliament of France, do you understand me?"

Faure demanded a statement of all those decrees which warranted the putting the accused upon his trial. Finally, the gloomy Robespierre reappeared, swelling with rage and rancour. "I also," said he, "have been moved; I felt my republican virtue shaken in the presence of a criminal humiliated before the sovereign power. But the greatest proof of devotion any man can give to his country is to stifle every emotion of sensibility." He repeated, then, all the arguments in favour of the competence of the convention; he reprobated the delay of national vengeance, and the superfluous consideration which was paid to a tyrant, whilst the warmest friends of liberty could meet with none; he pretended that this appeal to the people was nothing but a subterfuge similar to what Guadet had devised, in requiring the purifying scrutiny; that its object was to place every thing in an equivocal light—the present deputation, the 10th of August, and the republic itself. Recurring always to himself and his enemies, he compared the present situation of the country to that in July 1791, when there was a question of bringing Louis XVI. to trial for his flight to Varennes. Robespierre had played an important part on that occasion. He recapitulated all his dangers, and the successful efforts of his adversaries to replace the king on the throne; the massacre of the Champ de Mars which had followed, and the perils which Louis XVI. re-established on his throne had caused the commonwealth. He perfidiously ranked his present opponents with those of that period, declared that France and himself were exposed to the same danger from the intrigues of knaves, who called themselves, to the exclusion of all others, honest men. "At present," added Robespierre, "they are silent on questions involving the most important interests of the country; they shrink from pronouncing their opinion on the last king, but their silent and pernicious activity produces all the calamities which afflict the country; and, to mislead the reflecting, but often deluded, part of the population, they persecuted the most zealous patriots under the denomination of a factious minority. The minority," exclaimed he, "often becomes the majority, by enlightening deluded assemblies. Virtue is ever in the minority on this earth! How else could the world have been peopled with tyrants and slaves? Hampden* and Sydney were in the minority, for they expired on the scaffold. Such men as Critias, Anitus, the Cæsars and Clodius, have ever belonged to the majority; but Socrates was in the minority, for he swallowed poison; and Cato was in the minority, for he tore out his entrails." Robespierre then recommended tranquillity to the people, as his adversaries represented the applauses which they lavished on their faithful deputies as signs of rebellion. "People," cried he, "restrain your applause, fly the spectacle of our debates! We shall not cease to maintain your cause when out of your sight." He concluded by requiring that Louis XVI. should be declared guilty and condemned to death.

Many speakers succeeded him, during the 28th, 29th, till the 31st; Vergniaud finally came forward, and was listened to with extraordinary attention; the Girondists thus speaking through the medium of their greatest orator, terminated a silence, of which Robespierre was not the only one to accuse them.

Vergniaud first explained the principle on which the sovereignty of the people was founded, and pointed out those cases in which the representatives of the nation were bound to appeal to it. It would, he said, be difficult and impracticable to refer every legislative measure to the decision of the community, but that there were acts of the first importance in which this would be necessary. The constitution, for example, had been made previously subject to the popular sanction. But this was not the only act which merited the like distinction. The verdict to be passed on Louis was of so weighty an importance, whether the powers exercised by the assembly, or the inviolability which had, by the constitution, been granted to the monarch, or the political effects which might result from his condemnation, were considered, that the necessity of submitting it to the decision of the people appeared evident. Having thus stated the grounds of the motion of Salles, and refuted the sophisms of Robespierre, he came to the political inconveniences attending an appeal to the people, and touched upon all the great questions which divided the two parties.

He first endeavoured to prove that there was no reason to fear that an appeal to the people would give occasion to discord. He repented all the arguments already enforced by other Girondists, and maintained that if a civil war was not feared as a consequence of calling together the primary assemblies to sanction the constitution, he could not see why it should be from a similar convocation to ratify the sentence passed upon the king. This argument, so often reiterated, was of little weight, for the constitution was not the essential question of the revolution, as it could be nothing more than the stated regulation of a republican institution which had been already decreed and consented to. But the fate of the king was a question of immense importance; whether or not the revolution should pursue its career with inexorable energy, by aiming a death-blow at the throne, was the point to be decided. And if a consideration so pregnant with the most terrible consequences divided so equally the national convention, the danger to be feared from proposing it to forty-four thousand sections was formidable in the extreme. In all the theatres, and in popular societies, this question was discussed tumultuously, and the assembly should certainly have summoned up courage to decide it, and not have subjected France to have recourse for its decision, perhaps, to arms.

Vergniaud partaking, however, of the opinions of his friends, maintained that a civil war was not to be feared. "The disturbers of the public peace in the departments," he said, "had not acquired that preponderance which they had usurped at Paris." He then refuted the calumnies which had been heaped upon the majority, who had been described as intriguers, royalists, and aristocrats, and combated with indignation the assertion, that virtue was always in the minority. "Citizens," exclaimed he, "Catiline was in the minority in the Roman senate; and, if this minority had prevailed, Rome and liberty would have perished. In the constituent assembly, Maury and Cazales were in the minority; and, had they prevailed, what would they have done with you? Kings also form the minority of the earth. When they design to enslave a nation, they also declare that virtue is always in the minority. They too, when they wish to preserve empires from being overthrown, assert that the majority are intriguers, who must be silenced by terror."

Vergniaud wished to know whether, to form a majority conformable to the views of some, it was necessary, by banishment and death, to change France into a desert, and then turn it over to be dealt with according to the notions of a few ruffians.

Having defended the majority and France, he next took up the defence of himself and his friends, whom he represented as resisting always, and with equal courage, every species of despotism,—that of the court, and that of the brigands of September. He described them holding their legislative sittings undismayed, amidst the roar of cannon, on the 10th of August, and pronouncing the dethronement before the victory of the people; whilst these very Brutuses who were now so eager to slaughter fallen tyrants, concealed their fears in the bowels of the earth, awaiting the issue of a dubious conflict, in which liberty struggled against despotism.

He then retorted the reproach of provoking a civil war upon his adversaries. "Yes," said he, "those, indeed, really long for civil war, who, preaching assassination against the partisans of tyranny, apply that name to all the victims whom they desire to immolate to their fury; those who point their daggers at the representatives of the people, and demand the dissolution of the government and of the convention; those who wish the minority to domineer over the majority, because they can legitimize their decisions by insurrections, and would introduce Cablines to reign in the senate; those who preach such doctrines as these in all the public places, who call reason feuillantism, justice pusillanimity, and the sacred dictates of humanity conspiracy; those, indeed, are the real provokers of civil war.

"What! will civil war be the consequence of appealing to the sovereignty of the people? You were more modest in July, 1791. You did not, then, wish to paralyze the national sovereignty, that you might reign in its place. You then circulated a petition, calling upon the people to consult together about bringing Louis, who had just returned from Varennes, to trial. You then wished to appeal to the sovereignty of the nation, and did not seem to think that it would be the occasion of civil war. But then this appeal would have promoted your secret views, whereas now it thwarts them."

The orator now passed to other considerations. It had been asserted that the assembly ought to display all its grandeur and courage, in taking upon itself to execute its judgment, without looking for support to the people. "Courage," said Vergniaud, "was indeed necessary to attack Louis XVI. in all his power; but is it so needful to send him to the block, now that he is vanquished and disarmed? A soldier entered, formerly, into the prison of Marius to slay him, but, frightened at the aspect of his victim, he dared not strike. If this soldier had been the member of a senate, think you he would hesitate to vote for the death of a tyrant? What courage is there, then, in an act of which a coward is capable?"

He then spoke of another species of courage, namely, that to be exerted against foreign powers. "Since," said he, "this has been continually called a great political act, it will be to the purpose to examine the question in this point of view. It is beyond a doubt that foreign powers await only the perpetration of this deed to fall all together upon France. They will, undoubtedly, be conquered; the heroism of French soldiers warrants us in confidently expecting this result; but what heavy expenses, what an expenditure of resources, will not such a war bring upon the nation! If it should necessitate a new emission of assignats, and proportionably raise the price of provisions; if it should deal a deadly blow to commerce, and cause the effusion of torrents of blood, both by land and sea; what shall we have to boast of? What services shall we have rendered to the human species? What reparation could you make to your country, for having, in her name, and in contempt of her sovereignty, inflicted an act of vengeance, become the source and pretext of such calamitous events? I dismiss," cried the orator, "every idea of defeat; but what will you have to boast of, supposing yourselves successful? There will not be a family in France but will have to weep over a father or a son; the agriculturist will want labourers; the manufactures will be abandoned; your exhausted funds will call for new taxes; the energies of the nation, worn out by the assaults of a foreign enemy, and the disorders of faction at home, will sink into a mortal languor; and France, it is to be feared, though crowned with victory, will resemble those famous monuments of Egypt, which have triumphed over time—the traveller stands astonished at their grandeur, but should he enter them, what does he discover? inanimate ashes, and the silence of the tomb!"

Besides these, other fears presented themselves to the imagination of Vergniaud, which were suggested by the history of England, and by the conduct of Cromwell, the principal, though concealed author of the death of Charles I. This man, always instigating the people, first against the king, and afterwards against the parliament, broke the government to pieces, and finally arrived at the supreme power. "Have you not," added Vergniaud, "have you not here and elsewhere, heard some cry out: 'If bread is dear, the cause is in the Temple; if specie is scarce, if our armies are ill provided, the cause is in the Temple; if we suffer daily the spectacle of penury, the cause is in the Temple?'"

"Yet those who hold this language are not ignorant that the dearthness of bread, the scarcity of provisions, the evil administration of our armies, and the penury we complain of, spring altogether from other sources. What is it then that they seek? Who will assure me that these same men who continually seek to degrade the convention, and who might, perhaps, have succeeded, if the majesty of the people, which resides within it, could be imposed upon by their perfidy; who will assure me that these men, who proclaim that a new revolution is necessary, who declare such or such a section in a state of permanent insurrection; who assert that since the convention has succeeded to Louis, a change of tyrants has merely taken place; that another 10th of August is needful; who will assure me that these same men, who speak for ever of plots, death, traitors, and proscriptions; who maintain in the assemblies of the sections, and in their diurnal publications, that a defender of the republic should be appointed, and that there is but one man competent to save the state; who will assure me, I say, that these same men will not cry out, after the death of Louis, with still more violence: 'If bread is dear, the cause is in the convention; if specie is scarce, and our armies ill provided, the cause is in the convention; if the wheels of government are clogged, the cause is in the convention; if the calamities of war are increased by the hostile declarations of England and Spain, the cause is in the convention, who have provoked these declarations by the precipitate condemnation of Louis?'"

"Who will assure me that these seditious cries of anarchy will not rally round the banner of faction, the aristocracy thirsting for vengeance, the poor eager for a change, and even the pious and prejudiced indignant at the fate of Louis? 'Who will assure me that this tempest, which will call from their retreats the slayers of September, will not bring prominently forward one of those wretches dropping with blood, and present him as the liberator, the defender and chief which is so necessary for the republic. A chief! ah, if such was their audacious design, he would only appear to be pierced through with a thousand daggers! But to what horrors would not Paris become a prey! Paris, to be admired by posterity for its heroic contention with kings! And shall this glorious city be delivered over to the ignominious bondage of a gang of robbers, the refuse of the human species, to be torn by the convulsive throes of their bad ambition and delirious fury? Who could inhabit a city lorded over by terror and death? And you, ye industrious citizens, to whom industry is the source of riches, what would you do when deprived of the means of existence? you who have made such great sacrifices to the revolution, and whose very virtues and patriotism have rendered you liable to seduction, what would become of you? What would be your resources? What hand would wipe away your tears, and bring succour to your despairing families!

"Would you have recourse to those false friends, those perfidious flatterers who had precipitated you into an abyss of misery! Ah! fly them rather! dread their reply! thus would they address you: 'You demand bread: plunge into the fray, contend for the bloody rags of the victims you have slaughtered!' or, 'Will you have blood? Blood and carcasses are the only food we can offer you!'—You shudder, citizens! Oh, my country! I will exert all my efforts to save you from this deplorable crisis!"

This eloquent and extempore oration of Vergniaud produced a profound impression on his auditors, and excited universal admiration. Robespierre had been prostrated by this frank and persuasive eloquence. But although Vergniaud had shaken, he had not gained over the assembly, who still hesitated between the two parties. Many orators were successively heard for and against the appeal to the people. Brissot, Gensonné, and Pétion defended it in their turn. One orator at last gave a decisive turn to the question—this man was Barrère. His trimming principles, his shuffling and unimpassioned eloquence, had made him the oracle of the centre. He spoke with prolixity on the process, considered it in all its bearings of fact, law, or policy, and decided all those weak persons who were influenced by specious arguments to vote for the condemnation. His plausible reasonings were admirably adapted to prevail with the timid, and from this moment the unfortunate king was condemned. The discussion, however, was prolonged to the 7th; all were now tired of hearing the repetition of the same facts and the same arguments; the debate was, therefore, closed without opposition; but the proposition of a new adjournment excited much tumult; it was finally decided that the questions should be put, and the votes collected by the call of each individual's name on the 14th of January.

On that fatal day, an extraordinary concourse of spectators surrounded the assembly, and filled the galleries. Many orators presented themselves to propose different modes of stating the question; finally, after long debates, the convention embodied the question under the three points following:

"Is Louis Capet guilty of conspiring against the liberty of the nation, and the general safety of the state?"

"Shall the sentence, whatever it be, be referred to the sanction of the people?"

"What punishment shall be inflicted?"

The 14th was wholly occupied in the putting of these questions. The 15th was the day assigned for the call by name, to be made to each deputy. The assembly, in the first instance, decided that each member should pronounce his vote in the tribune; that he should give his reasons for voting as he intended, and that those should be written down and signed; that those who were absent without a cause, should be censured, but that if any entered after the call of the name had been made, they might deliver their vote. At last, this fatal call began on the first question. Eight members were absent from illness, and twenty on the business of the assembly. Thirty-seven, giving various reasons for their votes, acknowledged that Louis XVI. was guilty, but declared themselves incompetent to pronounce sentence upon him, and demanded measures of general safety against him. Six hundred and eighty-three members declared Louis XVI. guilty. The assembly was composed of seven hundred and forty-nine members.

The president, then, in the name of the national convention, proclaimed Louis Capet guilty of conspiring against the liberty of the nation, and of treasonable acts against the general safety of the state.

The call by name upon the second question then took place. Twenty-nine members were absent, of whom four, Lafon, Wandelaarincourt, Morison, and Lacroix, refused to vote. A member of the name of Noel excused himself. Eleven gave their opinion with different conditions. Two hundred and eighty-one voted for an appeal to the people; four hundred and twenty-three rejected it. The president then declared, in the name of the national convention, that the sentence against Louis Capet should not be referred to the sanction of the people.

The whole day of the 15th had now elapsed in the putting of these two questions. The third, therefore, was reserved for the morrow.

Paris became the more agitated as the decisive moment approached. At the theatres some signs of favour were shown to Louis on the occasion of the presentation of a piece, called "The Friend of the Laws" (L'Ami des Lois). The commune ordered the suspension of all plays; but the executive council revoked this order, as abridging the liberty of the press, which included that of the theatre. The utmost consternation prevailed in the prisons. It was reported that the terrific scenes of September were about to be renewed, and the prisoners and their relations beset the deputies with supplications to snatch them from death. The Jacobins, on the other hand, spread a report, that conspiracies were carrying on in all directions, to rescue the king and re-establish royalty. Their rage being excited by the delays and obstacles which had been interposed between Louis and his fate, they became more menacing than ever, and the two parties thus mutually alarmed each other, and supposed each other guilty of harbouring the most dangerous projects. The sitting of the 16th drew a concourse together more numerous than that on the preceding days. This was the sitting that was to decide everything, for the declaration of guilt was of little consequence, if Louis should be simply condemned to banishment, and the object of those who desired to save him would thus be accomplished, for all that could be expected at that juncture was to save him from the scaffold. The galleries were early in the morning seized by the Jacobins, from whence they sternly eyed each member as he appeared in the tribune to pronounce his vote. A great part of the day was devoted to taking measures to preserve the public peace, to summoning and giving audience to the ministers, and to demanding of the mayor why the barriers had been closed, which it was reported had been closed during the day. The convention decreed that they should remain open, and that the federalists, in concert with the Parisians, should occupy the military posts of the city. As the day was already much advanced, it was resolved that the sitting of the assembly should be permanent until the call of the names on the third question should be concluded. At the moment this was about to commence, some members asked what number of votes should be decisive of the guilt of the accused. Lehardy proposed a majority of two-thirds, which was required in other criminal tribunals. Danton, who had just arrived from Belgium, vigorously opposed this notion, and demanded only a simple majority. Lanjuinais again exposed himself to new attacks, by requiring that after so many violations of the forms of law, at least that form should be observed which absolutely required two-thirds of the votes. "We vote," exclaimed he, "under the dagger and cannon of the factious." These expressions excited new clamours, and the convention finally terminated the debate, by declaring that the form of its decrees was single, and that according to this form, they pass by the vote of the simple majority.

It was half-past seven o'clock in the evening, before the call, which lasted during the whole night, commenced. Some pronounced, simply, the sentence of death; others voted for detention, and for banishment when peace should have been obtained; many denounced death, with a restriction, to examine whether it would not be expedient to defer its execution. Mailhe was the author of this restriction, which might have saved Louis, for time in this case was every thing, and a delay would have been equivalent to an acquittal. A great number of deputies went over to this opinion. The call continued in a tumultuous manner; the interest which Louis inspired had at this moment reached its height, and many members determined to vote in his favour; but the exasperation of his enemies had also increased, and the people had come at last to identify the cause of the republic with the death of the last king, and to regard the republic as condemned, and royalty as re-established, if Louis XVI. should be saved. Terrified by the popular fury which this idea had roused, many members feared a civil war, and although much affected by the fate of Louis, they were alarmed at the consequences which might follow his acquittal. This fear was much heightened by the scene which was now passing. As each member ascended the steps of the tribune, all was silence to hear what he said; but the moment after his vote was given, clamours of approbation or censure resounded through the chamber, and followed him to his seat; the galleries received with murmurs of strong dissatisfaction every vote which was not for death: frequently, indeed, they endeavoured to terrify the assembly by menacing gestures. The deputies answered them from the centre of the hall, and a tumultuous reciprocation of threats and insults ensued. This gloomy and terrific scene had shaken the minds of many, and had changed the resolutions of many more. Lecointre of Versailles, whose courage was by no means questionable, and who had not ceased by his gestures to endeavour to impose silence on the galleries, was so much intimidated, that on his arrival in the tribune, he pronounced with hesitation and terror the word Death. Vergniaud, who had appeared so deeply moved by the fate of Louis, and who had declared to his friends that he could never condemn the unfortunate prince, was so possessed with the fear of civil war, that he pronounced the verdict of death, adding however the amendment of Mailhe. Being interrogated as to this change of his opinion, he replied, that he thought he perceived civil war on the point of breaking out, and that he did not dare to balance the life of an individual against the safety of the country.

Nearly all the Girondists adopted the amendment of Mailhe. The vote of the Duke of Orleans excited an extraordinary sensation. Obligated to support the Jacobins or to perish, he pronounced for the death of his relative, and returned to his place in the midst of the agitation caused by his vote. This dreadful sitting lasted through the whole night of the 16th, and the day of the 17th, till seven o'clock in the evening. The enumeration of the votes was now awaited with extraordinary impatience. All the avenues around the assembly were thronged to excess, and every one anxiously inquired of his neighbour the result of the scrutiny. In the convention, all were still in doubt; the words detention, and banishment, appeared to recur as frequently as that of death. According to some, one vote was wanting to pronounce the condemnation; according to others a majority existed, but it was that of one voice. From all sides it was acknowledged, that one suffrage more would decide the question, and every one anxiously looked out for the arrival of a new voter. At this moment a man appears at the tribune with tottering steps, whose wrapped-up head proclaimed his illness. This was Duchastel, the deputy of the Two Sèvres, who had been torn from his bed to give his vote. At sight of this member, tumultuous cries arose. They pretend the conspirators had been to fetch him in order to save Louis XVI. They wished to interrogate him, but the assembly would not permit this course, and allowed him the faculty of voting, by virtue of their decision which permitted them to receive suffrages after the appeal by name had been concluded. Duchastel boldly ascended the tribune, and, whilst regarded on all sides with intense anxiety, pronounced the sentence of banishment.

Fresh incidents occurred. The minister for foreign affairs demanded the liberty of addressing the assembly to communicate a note he had received from the Chevalier d'Ocariz, the Spanish ambassador. This ambassador promised the neutrality of Spain, and her mediation with all the other powers of Europe, if the life of Louis XVI. were spared. The Mountain party, who were quite impatient, pretended that this incident had been premeditated to create new obstacles, and called for the order of the day. Danton at once required that war should be declared with Spain. The assembly returned to the order of the day. A new demand was then announced. The defenders of Louis desired to appear before the assembly, to make a communication of importance. This excited fresh clamour from the Mountain. Robespierre maintained that, the defence being terminated, the counsel of the king could have nothing further to say to the assembly, that the verdict had been given, and that sentence should be immediately passed. It was decided that the defenders of Louis should be introduced after the final declaration of the verdict.

Vergniaud presided. "Citizens," said he, "I am about to proclaim the result of the scrutiny. You will observe, I hope, a profound silence. When justice has spoken, humanity should take its turn."

The assembly was composed of seven hundred and forty-nine members; fifteen were absent on business of the assembly, eight from indisposition, and five had refused to vote, which reduced the number present to seven hundred and twenty-one, and the absolute majority to three hundred and sixty-one voices. Two hundred and eighty had voted for imprisonment or banishment with different conditions. Two had voted for a rigorous imprisonment, and forty-five for capital punishment, to be delayed until the peace, or until the ratification of the constitution. The sentence of twenty-six had been death, who, adopting the idea of Mailhe, had required an examination into the expediency of suspending its execution. Their vote, however, was independent of this last clause. Three hundred and sixty-one had unconditionally voted for death.

The president therefore, with accents of grief, declared, in the name of the convention, that the punishment pronounced against Louis Capet was death.

The counsel of Louis were now introduced to the bar. M. Desèze first spoke; he was sent, he said, by his client to claim an appeal to the people against the sentence passed by the convention. He grounded the justice of this appeal upon the small number of votes which had decided the condemnation, and maintained, that as so many doubts had arisen on this question, it was only fair to refer it to the nation at large. Tronchet added, that the rigour of the penal code had been observed, but that its clemency in the forms of judgment resorted to had been totally neglected; and that that which required a majority of two-thirds to find the accused guilty should have been adhered to. The venerable Malesherbes then came forward, and with a voice broken with sobs, "Citizens," said he, "I am not in the habit of speaking—with grief I observe that I shall not have time allowed me to collect my ideas on the manner of counting the votes.—I have reflected much formerly on this subject; I have many observations to communicate to you.—But,— Citizens,—Pardon my confusion,—give me till to-morrow to collect my ideas."

The assembly was deeply moved by the tears and white locks of this venerable old man. "Citizens," said Vergniaud, "the convention have heard your protestations; you have fulfilled a sacred duty by making them. Shall we," added he, addressing the assembly, "decree the honours of the sitting to the defenders of Louis?" "Yes, yes," exclaimed all unanimously.

Robespierre then ascended the tribune, and opposed the demand of the counsel of Louis. Guadet, without admitting the propriety of an appeal to the people, insisted that Malesherbes should be allowed twenty-four hours, and referring to the decrees of the assembly which forbade an appeal to the people, argued against the request of the defenders. Merlin of Douay maintained that he could have nothing to observe on the manner of counting votes: for if, said he, the penal code exacts a majority of two-thirds to substantiate a fact, it demands only a simple majority in the pronouncement of the penalty. And, in the present case, the guilt of Louis has been declared almost unanimously; and it therefore signifies but little that the sentence awarded has been obtained by a simple majority.

After various observations on this subject, the convention passed to the order of the day, declared the claim of Louis to an appeal to the nation inadmissible, and adjourned the question of suspending the execution to the next day. On this day, the 18th, some pretended that the enumeration of the votes was not correct, and demanded a new scrutiny. The whole day was passed in bickerings on this point; finally, the enumeration was acknowledged to be exact, and the question of suspending the execution was again put off to the following morning.

Finally, on the 19th, this last question was agitated. Its object was nothing less than to render the whole proceedings uncertain in their effect, for a delay would have been to Louis XVI. the same as life itself. The Girondists, and those who wished to save Louis XVI. having exhausted all their arguments in the previous discussions, were now reduced to a nonplus; they still endeavoured to enforce reasons of policy, but they were answered, that if Louis XVI. were dead, foreign powers would arm themselves to avenge him; and if he was permitted to live and detained a prisoner, they would likewise have recourse to arms to deliver him; and that consequently the result, in both cases, would be the same. Barrère affected indignation at the idea of thus parading a head in foreign courts, and of stipulating for the life or death of a criminal, as an article of treaty. He declared that this delay also would be a cruelty to Louis XVI., as it would be condemning him to the tortures of a protracted death, which every movement of the enemy would make more imminent. The assembly then, closing the discussion, decided that each member should vote by yea and nay. On the 20th of January, at three o'clock in the morning, the call terminated, and the president announced, that the suspension of the execution of the sentence on Louis Capet was rejected by a majority of three hundred and eighty voices, against a minority of three hundred and ten.

At this moment, a letter was received from Kersaint, giving in his resignation. He could no longer, he said, endure the disgrace of sitting in the assembly in the company of men of blood, whose opinions, pre-occupied by terror, kept the upright members of the convention in subjection, and that he could not continue to take part in a representation in which Marat prevailed over Pétion. This letter caused an extraordinary tumult. Gensonné rose, and took this occasion to avenge himself on the Septembrizers for the decree of death they had just passed. "It is of little avail," said he, "to punish the crimes of tyranny, if others still more to be dreaded are allowed to escape with impunity. The convention will only have half fulfilled their duty, if the massacres of September are overlooked, and they do not order an inquiry to be made for the authors of those dreadful excesses." This proposition was seconded by the greatest part of the assembly with acclamation. Marat and Tallien, however, opposed it. "If you punish," cried they, "the authors of the scenes of September, punish likewise the conspirators who took refuge in the palace on the 10th of August." The assembly according to all these demands, ordered at the same time the minister of justice to prosecute the instigators of the massacres committed in the first part of September, and the persons found in arms in the palace during the night of the 9th, and the day of the 10th of August, together with those public functionaries who had quitted their posts in the provinces to return to Paris and conspire with the court.

Louis was now finally condemned; every attempt to delay the execution of his sentence had proved abortive, and every device suggested as a means of retarding the fatal moment had been exhausted. All the members of the right side, whether secret royalists or republicans, were struck with consternation at the severity of this verdict, and at the ascendancy which the Mountain had acquired. In Paris a stupefied astonishment prevailed; the bold measures of the new government had produced the usual effect that force produces upon the multitude, it had paralysed and reduced the majority to silence, inciting only the intrepid few to express their indignation at the act about to be perpetrated. A few old and attached servants of Louis XVI., some young lords, and a few of the body-guard it was said, intended to fly to his rescue, and snatch him from his intended punishment. But to concert measures for this enterprise, whilst surrounded by so vigilant a police, and in the midst of the terror which reigned throughout the city, was impossible, and all that they could attempt were a few isolated acts of despair. The Jacobins, exulting in their triumph, were nevertheless astonished at their success, and exhorted each other to remain strictly united for twenty-four hours, and to send commissaries to all the authorities, the commune, the staff of the national guard, to the department, and the executive council, to awaken their zeal, and assure the execution of the sentence. This execution would certainly take place, they said; it was quite inevitable; yet their constant repetition of this assurance betrayed the doubts they still harboured; it appeared indeed problematical to all, whether a king, whose fate had excited so general an interest, would be executed, in the heart of a country which three years before, had in its manners, customs, and laws, been an absolute monarchy; and the event was never deemed credible till after it had taken place.

The executive council was charged with the sad duty of executing the sentence. All the ministers, assembled in the chamber of their sittings, appeared struck with consternation. To Garat, as minister of justice, was assigned the most painful part of all—that of signifying to Louis XVI. the decrees of the convention. For this purpose, he betook himself to the Temple accompanied by Santerre, a deputation of the commune, and of the criminal tribunal, and by the secretary of the executive council. The king had waited with anxiety for the last twenty-four hours the arrival of his counsel, and demanded in vain permission to see them. On the 20th of January, at two o'clock in the afternoon, he still expected them, when suddenly the tread of many feet reached his ears; he advanced, and perceived the messengers of the executive council. He stopped with a dignified air at the door of his chamber, and did not appear agitated. Garat told him, with grief, that he was commissioned to communicate to him the decrees of the convention. Grouvelle, the secretary, then read them. The first declared Louis XVI. guilty of conspiring against the general safety of the state; the second condemned him to death; the third rejected the appeal to the people; and the fourth ordered his execution in twenty-four hours. The king, regarding these messengers of death with a serene countenance, took the decree from the hands of Grouvelle, put it in his pocket, and read Garat a letter, in which he demanded of the convention three days to prepare to die, a confessor to attend him in his last moments, permission to see his family, and liberty for them to quit France. Garat received the letter, and promised to deliver it immediately to the convention; the king gave him, at the same time, the address of the clergyman whose assistance he demanded.

Louis returned to his chamber with perfect tranquillity, called for dinner, and ate as usual. The knives had been taken away, and the domestics refused to bring them back. "Do they believe me coward enough," said he, with dignity, "to take away my own life? I am innocent, and I can die without fear." He was obliged to dispense with a knife, finished his meal, returned to his apartment, and awaited, calmly, the reply to his letter.

The convention still refused any delay, but all his other demands were complied with. Garat sent for M. Edgeworth of Firmont, the clergyman whom Louis had chosen, took him into his carriage, and conducted him to the Temple. He arrived at six o'clock, and presented himself at the Great Tower, accompanied by Santerre. He informed the king that the convention had granted him the minister of religion whom he had pointed out, and permitted him to see his family without witnesses, but that they had refused to accord him the delay he had required.

Garat added, that M. Edgeworth was arrived, that he was in the council hall, and about to be conducted to the king. He then retired, astonished and affected by the serene magnanimity of the illustrious prisoner.

The moment M. Edgeworth was introduced, he threw himself at the feet of the king, who immediately raised him, and they shed tears of mutual sympathy in each other's arms. The king then demanded, with anxious curiosity, news of the clergy of France, and of many bishops, especially the archbishop of Paris, and begged M. Edgeworth to assure the latter that he died faithfully attached to his communion. At eight o'clock he rose, begged M. Edgeworth to wait, and left the room with emotion, saying that he was going to see his family. The municipal officers, determining not to lose sight of their charge, even whilst he was with his family, had determined that he should visit them in the dining-room, which was closed by a glass door, through which they could perceive all his movements without hearing what passed. The king, having entered this apartment, had a glass of water placed upon the table for the princesses, should they need it. He paced the room with anxiety, awaiting with impatience the appearance of those who were so dear to him. At half-past eight o'clock the door opened, and the queen, holding the dauphin by the hand, and Madame Elizabeth, and Madame Royale, rushed into the arms of Louis XVI., sobbing with grief. The door was closed, and the municipal officers, together with Cléry and M. Edgeworth, placed themselves behind it to witness this heart-rending interview. At first it appeared nothing but a scene of confusion and despair. Nothing but sobs and lamentation could be distinguished. At last their tears dried up, and the conversation became more calm, and the princesses, constantly keeping the king locked in their arms, spoke for some time to him in a very low tone of voice. After a somewhat long interview, mingled with silence and despondency, the king rose to tear himself from this distressing scene, promising to see them again at eight o'clock the next morning. "Do you promise us?" asked the princesses with earnestness. "Yes, yes," replied the king, with an accent of grief. At this moment, the queen held him in her embrace by one arm, Madame Elizabeth by another, Madame Royale flung her arms round the middle of his body, and the young prince stood before him, giving one hand to his mother and the other to his aunt. As he left the chamber, Madame Royale fainted away; she was immediately carried out, and the king returned to M. Edgeworth, overwhelmed with this tender scene. In a few minutes his self-possession returned, and he entirely recovered his tranquillity.

M. Edgeworth then proposed to say mass, which the king had not for some time heard. After some difficulties, the commune consented to this ceremony, and the necessary ornaments, for the next morning, were procured from a neighbouring church. The king retired to rest at midnight, begging Cléry to wake him before five o'clock in the morning. M. Edgeworth threw himself on a bed; Cléry remained up by the side of his master, and saw him enjoying the most profound and peaceable sleep on the eve of his execution.

Whilst these circumstances were going on in the Temple, a terrific scene took place in Paris. Some few generous souls dared to express their indignation, but the multitude, either indifferent or terrified, remained passive. One of the body-guard, named Pâris, had resolved to avenge the death of the king on one of his judges. Lepelletier-Saint-Fargeau, like many others of his rank, had voted for the death of Louis, to avert the odium caused by his birth and fortune. He had excited great indignation among the royalists, on account of the class of society to which he belonged. On the evening of the 20th he was pointed out to Pâris at a tavern in the Palais-Royal, whilst he was seating himself at table. This young man, wrapped in a great coat, went to him, and said, "Is it you, scoundrel Lepelletier, who voted for the death of the king?" "Yes," replied he; "but I am not a scoundrel, for I voted according to my conscience." "Hold," resumed Pâris, "here is your recompense!" and he plunged his sabre in his side, and disappeared before any one had time to seize him.

The news of this event spread with rapidity through all parts of Paris. It was announced at the convention, the Jacobin club, and at the commune. This incident gave countenance to the report of the conspiracy of the royalists, who, it was said, meditated massacring the left side, and rescuing the king when at the foot of the scaffold. The Jacobins declared their sittings permanent, and sent new messengers to all their authorities, to rekindle their zeal, and to call the whole population to arms.

On the next day, the 21st of January, as the Temple clock struck five, the king awoke, called for Cléry, and dressed himself with the most perfect tranquillity. He congratulated himself on having recomposed his mind by sleep. Cléry lighted the fire, and moved a chest of drawers, which served for an altar. M. Edgeworth put on his sacerdotal vestments, and commenced solemnizing the mass; Cléry assisted at it, and the king, on his knees, gave deep attention to the ceremony. He then received the communion from the hands of M. Edgeworth, and the mass being finished, rose with increased strength, and awaited with serenity the moment in which he was to be transported to the scaffold. He demanded scissors to cut his hair himself, to avoid this humiliating operation from the hands of the executioner; but the commune, suspecting the possibility of suicide, refused his request.

The drum now beat through the streets of the capital. All those who belonged to the armed sections joined their companies with the most perfect submission. Those who were not obliged to make their appearance on this terrible day, concealed themselves in their houses. Their doors and windows were all shut, and they awaited at home the tidings of this heart-rending event. It was reported that four or five hundred men, devoted to the king, had designed to burst their way to the carriage and carry him off. The convention, commune, executive council, and Jacobins were all assembled in full session.

At eight o'clock in the morning, Santerre, with a deputation of the commune, of the department, and of the criminal tribunal, proceeded to the Temple. The king hearing the noise of their approach rose, and prepared to depart. He had determined not to renew the sad scene of the preceding evening by seeing his family again. He charged Cléry to give his adieu to his wife, sister, and children. He also begged him to carry them a seal, a lock of his hair, and some jewels, which he gave him for that purpose. He then squeezed his hand, and thanked him for his services. He afterwards addressed one of the municipal officers, begging him to transmit his will to the commune. This officer, named Jacques Roux, had formerly been a priest; he answered him in a brutal manner, that it was his business to conduct him to the scaffold, not to run on his errands. Another charged himself with this commission, and Louis, turning towards his conductors, gave, with firmness, the signal of departure.

Officers of the gendarmerie were placed in front of the carriage in which Louis was conveyed to the place of execution; he himself, and M. Edgeworth were seated behind. During this journey, which was rather long, the king read, from the breviary of M. Edgeworth, the prayers appropriate to his situation, and the two gendarmes were astonished at his piety and tranquil resignation. They had orders, it was said, to stab him if the carriage should be attacked. No hostile attempt, however, was made from the Temple to the Place de la Revolution. An armed multitude lined the passage, and the carriage advanced slowly, in the midst of an universal silence. At the Place de la Revolution, a large vacant space was left round the scaffold. This space was surrounded by artillery; the most outrageous federalists were placed round the scaffold, and the worthless rabble, always ready to insult genius, virtue, and misfortune, when they received the signal from higher authorities, pressed behind the ranks of the federalists, and they alone demonstrated any satisfaction, whilst everywhere else all manifestation of feeling was suppressed. At ten minutes after ten the coach stopped. Louis XVI. alighted firmly from the carriage at the place of execution. Three executioners came forward; he rejected their interference, and disrobed himself. But when he perceived that they desired to bind his hands, he exhibited a movement of indignation, and seemed involuntarily about to defend himself. M. Edgeworth, whose expressions were at this moment full of sublimity, addressed him for the last time, and said to him, "Suffer this indignity, as a last resemblance to that God who is about to become your recompense." The victim became resigned, and suffered himself to be bound, and led to the scaffold. Suddenly he advanced one step in front of the executioners, and addressed the people. "Frenchmen," said he, in a strong voice, "I die innocent of the crimes imputed to me; I pardon the authors of my death, and I pray that my blood may not rest upon France." He would have continued, but the drums were now ordered to beat; the voice of the king was drowned in their noise, the executioners seized upon him, and M. Edgeworth spoke to him these words: "Son of Saint Louis, ascend to Heaven!" The furious wretches who surrounded his scaffold then dipped their pikes and handkerchiefs in his blood, spread through Paris, shouting Long live the nation! long live the republic! and even went to the gates of the Temple, to manifest that brutal and insane joy which the multitude always display at the birth, the accession, and at the downfall of princes.

THE death of the unfortunate Louis XVI. spread a general terror throughout France, and excited in Europe a mixed feeling of astonishment and indignation. As the most enlightened and moderate revolutionists had foreseen, an inevitable conflict now ensued, from which there was no retreat. A contest was now to be entered into with a coalition of foreign powers, and to conquer or perish under their attack, was the only alternative left. Thus both the assembly and the Jacobins were agreed that they should give their undivided attention to devising means of exterior defence; and from this time, questions of war and finance were constantly in the order of the day.

We have already seen the mutual fear inspired by the two parties which divided the capital. The Jacobins thought they perceived, in the resistance that had been opposed to the king's condemnation, a dangerous remnant of royalism, and this apprehension stimulated several departments to the excesses committed since the 10th of August. They had deemed their victory doubtful to the last moment ! but the easy execution of the 21st of January had given them fresh confidence, and they now believed that the cause of the revolution might still prosper, and prepared addresses to enlighten the departments, and complete their conversion. The Girondists, on the contrary, already deeply affected by the unhappy fate of the royal victim, and alarmed at the victory of their adversaries, now began to perceive that the event of the 21st of January would be but the prelude to a long series of sanguinary outrages, and the first act of that unflinching system they had deprecated. It is true they had obtained the prosecution of the originators of the September murders; but it was a concession leading to no result. By abandoning Louis to his fate, they wished to show themselves guiltless of royalism; and the other party, by leaving the Septemberizers in the lurch, were equally anxious to make it appear that they afforded no protection to crime; but this double demonstration did not satisfy or assure a single individual. The first were always regarded as lukewarm republicans inclined to royalism, and the latter as men dyed in blood, and thirsting for carnage. Roland, completely discouraged, not by the dangers which threatened, but by his utter inability to render further service, gave in his resignation on the 23rd of January. The Jacobins congratulated themselves on this event, but still clamoured against the traitors Claviere and Lebrun, who yet remained in office; they declared that the intriguing Brissot had gained an absolute ascendancy over these ministers; that the evil was not entirely rooted out; and that, so far from slackening their exertions, they should, on the contrary, redouble their zeal, till all intriguers, Girondists, Rolandists and Brissotins, were finally expelled from the administration. The Girondists now demanded a new minister of war, Pache having thrown that department into the most deplorable state of disorder, by his weak concessions to the Jacobins. After many violent debates, he was finally dismissed as incapable of performing the functions of his office. Thus the two ministers whose names had become rallying words to their respective parties, were excluded from the government, and the majority of the convention flattered themselves that this exclusion would not tend a little to restore tranquillity; as if in suppressing the names which served as watchwords to contending passions, these passions themselves would not survive, were it only to fix upon new names, and continue the conflict. Beurnonville, the friend of Dumouriez, who was surnamed the French Ajax, was called to the administration of the war department. He was principally distinguished at this time, for his military intrepidity, but his love of discipline went nigh to provoke the opposition of the turbulent Jacobins. After this measure had been decided on, finance questions, which, as at this time the revolution was about to enter into a contest with all the powers of Europe, were most important, came on. The committee of the constitution were also ordered to give in a report of the progress of their labours within the space of fifteen days at latest, and the convention then determined to enter immediately upon the task of collecting information respecting the causes of the disorders which everywhere prevailed. Many believed that all the troubles of the nation took their origin in the non-execution and inadequate state of the laws, and, in many instances, in their total deficiency, and that, consequently, the constitution would quickly apply a remedy to these evils. Several Girondists, and all the members of the Plain, ceased not, therefore, to call urgently for this constitution, complained of the delays which were continually interposed, asserting that such was the object of their duty. In point of fact, they imagined that they had been called together solely for the accomplishment of this work, and that the task might be completed in a few months. They did not yet perceive that they were destined, not to constitute the state, but to contend in a sanguinary struggle; that it would be their terrible task to defend the revolution against Europe and La Vendée; that the administrative body to which they belonged would be quickly converted into an implacable dictatorship, proscribing its enemies at home, giving battle to Europe and the revolted provinces, and defending itself by every species of violence; that their laws, transitory as the crisis itself, would not be considered but as mere passionate acts; and that the only durable record they would leave behind them of their work would be the reputation of a defence, a terrible and unparalleled performance, to which fate had appointed them, and which they themselves should not consider as the sole object of their mission.

Yet, either from the exhaustion arising from the lengthened internal conflicts which had agitated the nation, or from a sincere unanimity of opinion on the question of war, all were agreed upon the necessity of assuming an attitude of defence, or even of hostility; and a short interval of tranquillity succeeded to the tumults and disorders which had been occasioned by the proceedings against Louis XVI., and Brissot gained credit for his diplomatic reports against foreign powers.

Such was the interior situation of France, and the state of parties at this period. Its position with regard to Europe was frightful. A rupture with all foreign powers was inevitable. Until now France had but three declared enemies to contend with, Piedmont, Austria, and Prussia. The revolution, favoured by the people of all nations in proportion to the degree of their mental advancement, and odious to all governments in proportion to the magnitude of their fears, had been regarded in a new light since the events of the 10th of August, the 2nd and 3rd of September, and the 21st of January. Less contemned, since its energetic defence of its principles, and also less esteemed since it had become stained by crimes, it had ceased to excite a lively interest with the communities of other countries, and had provoked an increased measure of hatred in foreign cabinets.

A war, then, was about to become general. We have already seen Austria, influenced by family considerations, engaging in a contest little favourable to her public interests; we have seen Prussia, though obviously interested in seeking an alliance with France against the head of the Germanic empire, prompted by the most frivolous motives, marching her armies beyond the Rhine, and endangering their safety at the Argonne; we have beheld Catharine, though celebrated for her wisdom and sagacity, abandoning, as all true courtiers do, a cause she had at first espoused from vanity, attacking the revolution, by habitude and from motives of policy, and finally inciting Gustavus, the emperor of Austria, and king of Prussia, to withdraw themselves from Poland, and address themselves towards the west; and we have observed Piedmont, instigated by enmity to the revolution, and in defiance of every prudential consideration, attacking France. The petty courts of Italy, though detesting the new republic, had not yet dared openly to avow their sentiments, and had even acknowledged the republican flag; Switzerland had preserved a perfect neutrality; Holland and the Germanic Diet had not yet explained themselves, but took no pains to conceal a deep-seated hostility; Spain had observed a prudent neutrality, under the discreet d'Aranda; finally, England, leaving France a prey to internal distractions, her colonies running to waste, and Europe exhausting its resources, thus permitted her revenge to be effected by those disorders which are inevitably attendant upon revolutions.

The new revolutionary impetus was about to put an end to all these probable neutralities. Hitherto Pitt had acted wisely. In England, a semi-revolution had only half regenerated the social compact, and had still left in existence many feudal institutions, which became objects of attachment to the aristocracy and court, and a subject of grievance for the opposition party to descant upon. The design of Pitt was twofold: first, to moderate the animosity which prevailed against the aristocracy, and to contain the spirit of reform within bounds, and thus to preserve his own place in the ministry, by governing the two parties; and, secondly, to overwhelm France by the indignation which she had roused in Europe, and by her own internal disorders. It was his aim, in a word, to render his country mistress of the world, and himself master of his country. This was the double object of his policy, and he followed it up with all the egotism and ability of a great statesman. Neutrality suited his purposes exactly. By opposing the war, he concealed the hatred of the English court against liberty; and whilst he allowed the French revolution to proceed to its worst excesses without any attempt at prevention, he daily contradicted the apologists of this revolution,—a resistance which demonstrated nothing, but which produced the desired effect. He replied to the apology of Fox, the most eloquent member of the opposition party, by citing the crimes of reformed France. Burke, a vehement declaimer, took upon himself to enumerate these crimes, which he did with the most absurd violence; and on one occasion he went so far as to throw a dagger on the floor of the house, saying it had been manufactured by the Jacobin propagandists. Whilst Pitt was accused at Paris of fomenting the disorders of the nation, by distributing money for that purpose among the factious, he complained that the revolutionists made use of the same means to excite disturbances in England, and the emigrants accredited these reports by echoing them. By this Machiavellian logic, he brought French liberty into disgrace with the English, and roused Europe, by his envoys, to arms against the revolution. In Switzerland, he had not yet succeeded; but, at the Hague, the docile Stadtholder, alarmed at the revolution which had taken place in his own country, placing no confidence in his own subjects, and having no other support than the English navy, gave him every satisfaction, and had, by many hostile demonstrations, testified his ill will to France. Spain, however, was the principal field of Pitt's intrigues, and he succeeded in persuading her to enter into an alliance with England against France, her sole maritime ally, which was the greatest error she ever committed. The Spaniards had felt themselves very little interested in the revolution, and motives of policy or safety had less influence than those of kindred, or even the repugnance naturally displayed by all governments in these matters, in disposing the cabinet of Madrid to take up arms against France. The discreet Count d'Aranda, by resisting all the intrigues of the emigrants, at the persuasions of the Spanish aristocracy, and the suggestions of Pitt, had succeeded in a measure in humouring the irascibility of the conventional government. Being finally, however, dismissed, and replaced by Manuel Godoy*, since known as Prince of the Peace, he left his unhappy country a prey to the worst of counsels. Hitherto, the cabinet of Madrid had refused all explanation with regard to its views towards France; it had even offered to acknowledge the republic, and its mediation with the other powers of Europe, if the life of the dethroned monarch were but spared. In reply to this offer, Danton had proposed an immediate declaration of war, and the assembly had passed to the order of the day. Since that time, the direction the war would take had not been doubtful. Troops arrived daily in Catalonia. Naval armaments were prepared in all the ports, and a speedy attack was resolved upon. Pitt so far triumphed; but, still delaying definitively to declare his intentions, lest he should too hastily compromise himself, he took time to raise a formidable navy; he satisfied the aristocracy of his own nation by his preparations; he endeavoured to make the revolution as unpopular as possible, by paying his creatures to declaim against its excesses; and, whilst he thus prepared his resources in silence, he leagued together the powers of Europe for the destruction of France, conjecturing, that by giving employment to all her forces, the colonies would be left without succour, and the success of England in India meet no impediment.

Never did Europe appear to be struck with so general a blindness to its own interests as at this period. In the west, Spain, Holland, and all the maritime powers, urged on by aristocratic passions, leagued with their enemy England, against France their only ally. Prussia, by an inconceivable vanity, was again observed to ally herself with the head of the Germanic empire against France, whose alliance the great Frederick had always deemed so necessary. The petty king of Sardinia committed the same error, but from motives certainly more natural, those of relationship. In the east, and north, Catharine was suffered to oppress Poland and endanger the safety of Germany, for the trifling advantage of acquiring possession of a few provinces, and for the power of causing further distraction to France, without interruption. All the states of Europe renounced their former and most advantageous alliances, and yielded to the perfidious suggestions of the two most formidable powers of the civilized world, in order to arm themselves against France, the former protectress and ally of those who now proposed to attack her. All the cabinets united in this enterprise, freely lending themselves to the designs of Pitt and Catharine; while infatuated Frenchmen contributed, by their co-operation, to this fatal renunciation of policy and prudence, and endeavoured to bring down on their native land the most frightful calamities. But what were the motives which prompted these designs? Poland was to be given up to Catharine, and France to Pitt, because she had wished to acquire that liberty which she had never possessed! Undoubtedly France had committed some excesses, but these excesses would naturally increase as the struggle became more violent; and thus, without extinguishing the spirit of this liberty they so much abhorred, foreign potentates were about to enter upon a murderous war of thirty years' duration, to provoke extensive invasions, and to give rise to the most calamitous disorders, terminating in the establishment of those two colossal powers which at present stride Europe upon the two elements, England and Russia.

In the midst of this general conspiracy, Denmark, governed by a skilful minister, and Sweden, delivered from the ambitious schemes of Gustavus, alone observed a prudent reserve, which Holland and Spain should have imitated by persevering in the system of an armed neutrality. The French government formed a correct judgment of the general inclinations of Europe, and the ardent impetuosity which at this time characterized its counsels could brook no delay, and prompted the nation rather to provoke, than to wait for, a declaration of war. Since the 10th of August, the assembly had never ceased to demand the recognition of foreign states, and had still endeavoured to keep terms with England, whose neutrality was important, on account of the many enemies France had already to contend with. But after the 21st of January, all prudential considerations were disregarded, and the convention prepared for a general war. Considering concealed hostilities no less dangerous than those which were openly avowed, they were impatient to make their enemies declare themselves; and on the 22nd, the assembly, passing in review all the cabinets of Europe, determined to declare war immediately with those who hesitated to explain categorically and satisfactorily their intentions with regard to France.

Since the 10th of August, England had withdrawn her ambassador from Paris, and had not received M. de Chauvelin in any other light than as the envoy of dethroned royalty. All these diplomatic subtleties had no other object than to preserve an appearance of respect to the king imprisoned in the Temple, at the same time to defer those hostilities which it did not suit the minister to commence at that very moment. Nevertheless, Pitt demanded a secret envoy from Paris, to whom he might explain the nature of his complaints against the French government. The citizen Maret was sent on this mission in the month of December, and had a private interview with the English minister. They separated, mutually promising to give out that this interview was of a private, not of an official nature; that nothing but what was amicable had passed between them; and that they had no other object than to bring the two nations to a satisfactory adjustment of their mutual causes of disagreement. Pitt complained that France menaced the allies of England, and in proof of this cited Holland. The principal alleged grievance was the opening of the Scheldt, perhaps an imprudent but yet a liberal measure, which the French had taken on entering the Low Countries. It was, in fact, absurd to interdict the general use of that river, for the purpose of preserving to Holland a monopoly of navigation. Austria had not dared to deliver the country from this servile restriction, but Dumouriez had so done by the order of his government, and the inhabitants of Antwerp beheld with joy vessels again sailing up to their city. The answer of France to this complaint was obvious; for France, in respecting the rights of neutral neighbours, had not pledged herself to consider any iniquitous policy sacred, merely because the neutrality might be interested therein. Besides, the government of Holland had displayed too much ill-will to the revolution to expect any very great consideration from the French nation. The second grievance complained of, was the decrees of the 15th of November, in which the national convention promised their aid to all those who should strive to shake off the yoke of tyranny. This imprudent decree, passed in a moment of enthusiasm, could not, however, bear the construction which Pitt put upon it, who pretended that it was an invitation to all people to revolt against the governments under which they lived, for it applied only to those nations which were in an open state of hostility with France. Finally, Pitt complained of the continual menaces and declamations of the Jacobins against all governments; but in this respect both governments were not behindhand with the Jacobins; and upon the score of bitter words the balance was equal.

This conversation led to no result; it was evident that England sought only to defer a war, which she desired should take place, but which it was not convenient for her to declare at that moment. However, the remarkable process of the month of January hurried on events; the English parliament were suddenly assembled, and before the usual time. An inquisitorial act was passed against all Frenchmen travelling in England. The Tower of London was put in a state of defence; a levy of soldiers was ordered, and active preparations every where announced the approach of war. The prejudices of the populace of London were excited, and that blind passion, which in England has always considered a war with France as a national benefit, was completely roused; finally, two vessels laden with corn were prohibited from entering French ports; and when news of the event of the 21st of January arrived, the French ambassador, whom till then they had in some degree refused to recognise, was ordered to quit the kingdom in eight days. The national convention immediately ordered a report to be made of the conduct of England towards France, and of her relations with the Stadtholder of the United Provinces; and on the 1st of February, Brissot, having addressed the assembly on these subjects, and received for once the applause of both parties, war was forthwith declared against England and Holland. War with the Spanish government was also impending, and although not yet announced, was considered as certain. France had thus all Europe to contend with, and the condemnation of the 20th of January was the act which caused a decisive rupture with all the throned heads of Europe, and bound her irrevocably to pursue the revolution in its full career, and thus she was borne down the current of the revolution with resistless impetuosity.

She had now to sustain the terrible assault of all the combined powers of Europe, and however populous or rich in resources, to resist so general an attack directed against one nation, was an arduous and difficult task. The revolutionary leaders, however, were not the less bold and confident; the unexpected successes of the republic at the Aronne and in Belgium, had persuaded them that any man, especially a Frenchman, could become a complete soldier in six months; the general agitation which pervaded the nation led them also to believe that the whole population might be brought to the field of battle, and that they had thus at their disposal four or five millions of men capable of bearing arms; beyond comparison superior in zeal and courage to any the sovereigns of Europe could bring into action. A small body of men, recruited with difficulty, said they, and having interests entirely distinct from the community at large, compose the armies of foreign kingdoms, and one constantly observes that a small handful of regimentalized individuals decide the fate of the greatest empires. But suppose on the other hand the case of an entire nation, abandoning all the private pursuits of life, and taking arms in its own defence, does not this displace every ordinary calculation? What cannot twenty-five millions of men do? As to the charges of the war, the French government were just as little disquieted on this subject. The national capital augmented daily by the emigration, and greatly exceeded the public debt. At the present moment, this capital, it is true, was of little value, as the territory by which it was represented, remained unpurchased, but the assignats supplied this defect, and their fictitious value corresponded with the future value of the property they represented. It is true that the real value of these assignats was one-third less than the nominal appreciation which was set upon them; but it was only necessary to augment their circulation by a third, and the capital thus afforded would be so enormous as to be sufficient, and would even exceed what it might be expedient to issue. After all, these men who were about to be transferred to a battle field, possessed a competence at home, and indeed, some lived in luxury: why should they not live quite as well during a campaign? could land and provisions ever be wanting wherever men happen to be? Besides, as society in its present state possessed more than enough to supply the wants of all, a more equal distribution should be made, and therefore it was proposed that wealth should be taxed and compelled to defray the charges of the war. Moreover, the states into which the armies were about to penetrate, had also a long settled state of things to be overturned, abuses to be destroyed, and immense profits were thus to be derived from the clergy, nobility and royalty, it was therefore but just that they should compensate France for the assistance she promised them.

Thus reasoned the fiery spirit of Chambon, and his ideas were soon adopted by all. The former policy of cabinets was to calculate on two hundred thousand soldiers, paid by some taxes and domestic revenues. But now this was a more mass of men that raised itself and said, I shall form an army; which looked at the gross amount of wealth, and then further said, This sum is sufficient, and divided among all will provide for the wants of all. Undoubtedly this was not the language of the whole nation, but of the most extravagant party, who resorted to every means of propagating their opinions among the mass of the nation. Before we illustrate the imaginary resources of the revolutionists, we must carry ourselves back to our frontiers, and there observe how the last campaign had been concluded. Its opening had been brilliant, but an opening success badly followed up, had only served to extend our line of operations, and to provoke on the part of the enemy a greater and more decisive effort. Thus our defence became more difficult in proportion to the extent of our operations; and the beaten enemy would naturally rally his forces with energy, and by redoubling his exertions, go far to bring about the general disorganization of our armies. Added to this, the hostile league had also been greatly augmented in numbers, for the English on the coasts, the Spaniards on the Pyrenees, and Holland on the side of the Low Countries, threatened France with new attacks.

Dumouriez had halted on the banks of the Meuse, and been prevented, by causes which have not been sufficiently accounted for, from pushing on to the Rhine; for it is impossible to reconcile the tardiness of his subsequent motions with the rapidity of his former operations. On arriving at Liege, he found his army in a complete state of disorder. His soldiers were nearly naked; for want of shoes they wrapped straw round their feet; they were destitute of everything but meat and bread, which were sufficiently abundant, owing to the contract which the general had insisted on carrying into execution; but money was absolutely wanting for the soldiers' pay, and the peasants were pillaged by the troops, or forced, by violence, to receive their assignats. The horses perished daily for want of forage, especially those of the artillery, who nearly all died. These privations, and the relaxation of the war, disgusted the troops; the volunteers deserted in bands, defending their conduct by the decree of the assembly, which declared the country no longer in danger. The convention passed another decree to put a stop to this desertion; and though it was somewhat severe, the gendarmerie posted on the roads but partially succeeded in arresting the fugitives. The strength of the army was reduced one-third. These combined causes had prevented Dumouriez from pursuing the Austrians with the necessary vigour; Clerfait had time to intrench himself on the banks of the Erft, and Beaulieu on the borders of Luxembourg; while the French general found it impossible, with an army of thirty or forty thousand men, to drive before him an enemy intrenched in mountains and woods, and supported by Luxembourg, one of the strongest places in the world. If Custine, instead of making incursions into Germany, had marched upon Coblenz, joined Beurnonville, and afforded him his co-operation in his attempt against Trèves, and these two generals had then descended the Rhine in concert, Dumouriez could then have marched thither by the way of Cologne; and all three combining their forces, Luxembourg might have been invested, and, cut off from all communication with the enemy, would certainly have fallen. But nothing of this sort took place; Custine being desirous of making the neighbourhood of his own army the principal theatre of the war, had only provoked an hostile declaration from the Imperial Diet, irritated the vanity of the King of Prussia, and engaged him more warmly in the schemes of the coalition; Beurnonville, alone and unaided, had failed in his enterprise against Trèves; and the enemy had been enabled to maintain their position at the same time in the Electorate of Trèves and the Duchy of Luxembourg. Such being the respective situations of the French and allied armies, Dumouriez, by advancing towards the Rhine, would have left his right flank and rear unprotected, and, in the present disorganized state of his forces, could not, with any prospect but that of failure, have undertaken the invasion of that extensive country, which stretches from the Meuse to the Rhine, as far as the frontiers of Holland, a country difficult of access, and affording no facilities for the transport of baggage, intersected by mountains and woods, and occupied by an enemy by no means to be despised. Certainly Dumouriez, if he had had the means, would have preferred pursuing his conquests on the Rhine, to coming and making solicitations for Louis XVI. The zeal for royalty which he attributed to himself when in London, in order to advance his own merit, and which the Jacobins laid to his charge in France as a means of destroying him, was surely not sufficiently ardent to induce him to renounce his victories and rush into dangers in the midst of the factions of the capital. In fact, he never quitted the field of battle till he found his presence there perfectly unserviceable; and his object in taking this step was to terminate, by a personal conference with the ministers, the difficulties which the military administration had thrown in his way in Belgium.

We have already seen the embarrassments in which the general was involved after his first success. The conquered country was anxious for a revolution; but not for one so radically subversive as that of France. Dumouriez, from his natural disposition, his political opinions, and love of military subordination, felt strongly inclined to adopt the moderate views of the country which he occupied. We have already seen the efforts he made to protect the Belgians from the grievances of the war, to give them the advantage of provisioning his army, and finally to persuade rather than compel them to receive the assignats. The investives of the Jacobins were the only recompense he received for these anxieties. Chambon had proposed the decree of the 15th of December, for the purpose of frustrating his views. "We must," said he, "declare ourselves a revolutionary power in every nation we enter. It is useless to conceal our intentions; the despots know well what it is we want. We must therefore loudly proclaim it, while they are guessing at our object; and besides this, let the justice of our designs be avowed. Our generals must proclaim in every city they enter, the sovereignty of the people, the abolition of feudalism, of tithes, and all other abuses; they must declare the dissolution of all the old authorities; and new local administrations should be provisionally established under their direction, empowered to govern the country, and convocate national conventions, for the purpose of deciding ultimately on the fate of the nation; the property of our enemies, that is, of the nobility, the priests, of lay and religious communities, and of churches, &c., should be forthwith sequestered, and committed to the keeping of the French nation, to be accounted for to the local administrations, and to serve as a pledge for the liquidation of the expenses of the war, to which all emancipated nations are bound to contribute their share, the object of this war being to deliver them from their chains. If it should be found after the campaign that the republic has received more than enough to defray its military expenses, the surplus should be restored; but, if the contrary should be the case, it will then be obligatory on the liberated nations to make up the deficiency. Our assignats, also, arising out of the new distribution of property, must be received in the conquered country, and the principles to which they owe their origin, together with the assignats themselves, should both be adopted by every people among whom the revolution is introduced; and, finally, the executive council should despatch messengers to confer with these provisional administrations, to enter into a bond of fraternity with them, and to execute the sequestrations decreed. Let us have no half revolution," added Chambon: "those people who are not willing to accede to the terms which we here propose, should be considered as our enemies, and treated as such: peace and fraternity to all the friends of liberty; war to all cowards and partisans of despotism; war with palaces, amity with cottages!"

These principles were sanctioned by an act passed immediately after the delivery of this harangue, and were put in practice throughout the conquered provinces. A cloud of agents chosen by the executive council from among the Jacobins instantly spread through Belgium. Provisional administrations had been established there under their auspices, and on principles the most violently republican. The populace, rising against the middle classes, committed the greatest excesses. This was the anarchy of 1793, to which four years of disorder had progressively brought us, and which had suddenly demonstrated itself without any transition from an old to a new order of things. These proconsuls, invested with power nearly absolute, imprisoned men, and sequestered estates at their pleasure; they seized upon all the silver found in the churches, which greatly alienated the unhappy Belgians, who were much attached to their forms of worship, and gave occasion to many scandalous accusations. They likewise formed a species of convention for the purpose of deciding on the fate of each country; and under their despotic influence, the union of France to Liege, Brussels, and Mons, &c., had been effected. These inevitable calamities were much increased by the military ferocity which in this country was added to revolutionary violence. Another cause of discord shortly arose. The agents of the executive power attempted to subject the generals to their orders in all commissariat questions; and if these generals were not Jacobins, as it frequently happened, quarrels and bickerings ensued which augmented the general disorder. Dumouriez, indignant at seeing his military success so much compromised by the distressed state of his army, and by the ill-will of the Belgians, had already treated some of these proconsuls very roughly, and set out for Paris to give vent to his displeasure, with all the natural impetuosity of his character, and all the haughtiness of a victorious general, who considered himself as an indispensable adjunct to the republic.

Such was the situation of affairs on the principal theatre of the war. Custine, obliged to retreat to Mayence, complained of the manner in which Bourmonville had executed his attempt on Trèves; Kellermann maintained his position in the Alps, Chambery and Nice; Servan endeavoured in vain to get together an army in the Pyrenees; and Monge, equally as incapable as Pache, had suffered the administration of the marine to fall into the greatest disorder. The defence of the frontiers was at this moment the great object of public attention. Dumouriez had passed the end of December and the whole month of January at Paris, where he increased his unpopularity by some expressions in favour of Louis XVI. and by absenting himself from the Jacobin club, where his presence was continually promised, but where he never made his appearance, and finally, by his intimacy with his old friend Gensonné. He presented to the assembly four memorials, the first on the subject of the decree of the 15th of December, the second on the organization of the army, the third on the method of providing for the army, and a fourth proposing a plan of military operations for the ensuing year. At the foot of each of these documents he offered in his resignation in case their demands were not complied with.

The assembly, besides its diplomatic and military committee, had established a third, denominated the committee of general defence. This committee was very numerous, and all the members of the assembly were at liberty to associate themselves with it. Its chief object was to conciliate the members of conflicting parties, and thus inspire them with mutual confidence by their co-operation in a work in which all were equally interested. Robespierre, however, annoyed at seeing the Girondists there, seldom made his appearance; but the latter, on the contrary, were remarkably assiduous in their attendance. It was there that Dumouriez appeared with his plans, which were not always perfectly understood; his haughtiness, likewise, frequently gave offence; and he abandoned his memorials to their fate. He then retired to some distance from Paris, little disposed to resign his command, although he had threatened the assembly so to do, and was awaiting the opening of the campaign.

He was thus entirely out of favour with the Jacobins, and with daily calumniated in Marat's

journal, for having maintained a mere half-revolution in Belgium, and for having demonstrated so much severity against the demagogues. He was accused of having voluntarily suffered the Austrians to escape, and some, going still further back, publicly asserted that he had opened the passages of the Argonne to Frederick William, when he had it in his power utterly to destroy him. Nevertheless, the members of the council and of the committees, being less blinded by the passions of the demagogues, appreciated his services, and still endeavoured to keep on terms with him. Even Robespierre defended him, by attributing all his errors to his false Girondist friends. Every one was ready enough to give him every possible credit, consistent with the decrees already passed, and with the rigorous principles of the revolution. His two commissaries, Malus and Petit-Jean, were restored to him; numerous reinforcements were granted, sufficient provisioning was promised, and all his ideas with regard to the general plan of the opening campaign were adopted; but he obtained no concession as to the decree of the 15th of December, or the new administration of the army. The nomination of his friend Bourmonville to the ministry of the war department was further advantageous to him, as he might confidently expect from his zeal every necessary provision for the army.

At one time he was induced to believe that England would make use of him as a mediator between herself and France, and he set out for Antwerp with this flattering idea. But the convention, wearied out by the double-dealing of Pitt, had declared war with Holland and England. The news of this declaration reached him at Antwerp. And now observe what had been resolved upon, partly from his plans, for the defence of this territory. It was settled that the army was to be augmented to five hundred thousand men, and this, in comparison with the idea that had been formed of the power of France, and with respect to the force which was afterwards raised, was not deemed a very considerable levy. In the east and south, a defensive plan was to be strictly adhered to, the movements of the enemy were to be closely watched along the Pyrenees and by the sea coasts, and all the boldness of the offensive was to be displayed in the north, where, according to Dumouriez, "it was impossible to maintain a defence without gaining battles." To execute this design, a hundred and fifty thousand men were to occupy Belgium, and to cover the frontier from Dunkirk to the Meuse; fifty thousand were to keep possession of the territory between the Meuse and the Sarre; a hundred and fifty thousand to extend along the Rhine and the Vosges, from Mayence to Besançon and to Gex; and finally, a reserve was to be stationed at Châlons, with necessary requisites, so as to be able to march wherever they might be required. Savoy and Nice were to be protected by two armies of sixty thousand men each; the Pyrenees by a force forty thousand strong; and a post of observation occupied by forty thousand men was to be established on the sea coast, and the coasts of Brittany, and a part to be ready for embarkation if necessary. Such was the strength of the army as originally intended; but the actual force was considerably less, not amounting to more than two hundred and sixty thousand men, of whom a hundred thousand were scattered through Belgium, twenty-five thousand stationed on the Moselle, forty-five thousand at Mayence, under the orders of Custine, thirty thousand on the upper Rhine, forty thousand in Savoy and at Nice, and thirty thousand at most in the interior. But to make up the full complement, the assembly decreed that a levy should be made from the national guards, that every member of this guard, unmarried or without children, should be at the disposal of the executive council, from the age of eighteen to that of forty-five. They added, that three hundred thousand men were still necessary to resist the coalition, and that the recruiting should be continued till this number was made up*. At the same time, an issue of eight hundred million of assignats was ordered, and it was resolved that trees should be felled from the woods of Corsica for the construction of ships of war.

While these plans were in the course of completion, the campaign was opened with two hundred and sixty thousand men. Dumouriez had under his command thirty thousand on the Scheldt, and about seventy thousand on the Meuse. The rapid invasion of Holland was the bold enterprise which now created a popular ferment, and into which Dumouriez had been forcibly drawn by the general opinion. Many plans had been proposed. One, suggested by the Batavian refugees, who had quitted their country after the revolution of 1787, consisted in invading Zealand, and thus seizing on the Dutch government, which was about to retire thither. Dumouriez pretended to lend himself to this scheme; but he considered it profitless, inasmuch as it limited his operations to the occupation of a small and very unimportant part of Holland. The second plan was peculiarly his own; it was to descend the Meuse by Venloo as far as Grave, from Grave to break suddenly in upon Nimeguen, and from thence to fall unexpectedly upon Amsterdam. This design would have been more safe than the former, could the future have been foreseen. But, stationed at Antwerp, Dumouriez conceived a third plan, more hazardous and prompt, better suited to the revolutionary views of France, and more fertile in decisive results, had it succeeded. Whilst his lieutenants, Miranda, Valence, Dampierre, and others, should descend the Meuse, and occupy Maestricht, which he had not thought it necessary to take possession of in the preceding year, and Venloo, which could not long hold out, Dumouriez meditated marching himself, with all secrecy and despatch, upon Bergen-op-Zoom and Breda with twenty-five thousand men, from whence he might proceed, without impediment, to Moerdijk, cross the little sea of Bielbos, and advance rapidly by the mouths of the rivers as far as Leyden and Amsterdam. This hazardous project did not appear very feasible, but many others equally dubious in appearance have succeeded, and although full of difficulties, it also possessed advantages greatly superior to that of opening an attack directly upon Venloo and Nimeguen. By adopting the latter plan, Dumouriez would have assailed the Dutch army in front, who had already made all their preparations between Grave and Gorkum, and have given them time to be reinforced by the English and the Prussians. Whereas, by adhering to the former, he might have penetrated into the interior of Holland, which was entirely destitute of defence, and all obstacles being thus surmounted, have gained entire possession of the country. On his return from Amsterdam, he would have taken the defended posts in the rear, and the enemy have become surrounded by himself and his lieutenants, who were to join him by Nimeguen and Utrecht.

It was natural that he should take the command of the army destined for this expedition, as it required promptitude, boldness, and generalship in an eminent degree. This enterprise, however, was exposed to the danger to which all offensive plans are subject, that of exposure to an invasion in leaving oneself unprotected. Thus the Meuse would have been left open to the Austrians; but where the warfare is offensive on both sides, the advantage remains with that party who most courageously opposes himself to the danger, and is less disposed to yield to the fear of an invasion.

Dumouriez despatched Thouvenot, in whom he placed the greatest confidence, to the Meuse; he informed Miranda and Valence of his plans, which he had hitherto kept secret; he urged them to hurry on the sieges of Maestricht and Venloo, and, in case of delay, to move gradually off from before those places, so as to be continually advancing towards Nimeguen. He ordered them also to fix rallying posts round Liège and Aix-la-Chapelle, as points of union to all dispersed detachments, and for the purpose of resisting the enemy, who might attempt to impede the sieges about to be opened on the Meuse.

Dumouriez then immediately left Antwerp with eighteen thousand men, got together in great haste. He divided his little army into several corps, for the purpose of summoning the fortresses in his route to surrender, but they were not to stop and actually lay siege to them. His advanced guard was to be employed in seizing boats and every practicable means of transportation; and he himself, with the main body of his troops, held himself in readiness to relieve any of his lieutenants who might need his assistance. On the 17th of February, 1793, he entered the territory of Holland, publishing a proclamation, in which he promised friendship to the Batavians, and war only against the Stadtholder, and the English influence. He advanced, leaving general Liclave before Bergen-op-Zoom, despatching General Berneron to Klundert and Williamstadt, and ordering d'Arcon, who was an excellent engineer, to feign an attack on Breda, which was a very important place. Dumouriez remained with his rearguard at Sevenbergh. On the 25th, General Berneron carried the fort of Klundert, and came before Williamstadt. D'Arcon threw a few shells into Breda. This place was reputed very strong; its garrison was sufficiently numerous, but badly commanded, and after a few hours, it surrendered to an army of besiegers scarcely exceeding its own garrison. The French entered Breda on the 27th, and seized upon a considerable store of arms and ammunition, which consisted of two hundred and fifty mortars, three hundred thousand cartridges of powder, and five thousand muskets. Leaving a garrison in Breda, General d'Arcon came, on the 1st of March, before Gertruydenberg, and carried it the same day from all the advanced works. Dumouriez arrived at Moedyk, and made amends for all the delays of his advanced guard. This succession of fortunate surprises upon places capable of a long resistance, was a brilliant opening to the campaign; but unforeseen delays retarded the passage of the sea, the most difficult part of the plan. Dumouriez had hoped that his advanced guard would have acted more promptly, crossed the Bielbos by means of some boats, occupied the isle of Dort, defended at most by a few hundred men, and capturing a numerous flotilla of small vessels, would have brought them back on the other side, and thus afforded the means of transportation to his army. But inevitable delays prevented the execution of this part of his plan. He endeavoured, however, to overcome the difficulty by taking possession of all the boats he could find, and employing his carpenters in the construction of others. But celerity was above all things necessary; for the Dutch army were assembling at Gorkum, at Stry, and at the isle of Dort; some enemies' sloops and an English frigate hovered over his embarkation, and cannonaded his camp, which was called the Beavers' camp by the French soldiers. They had constructed huts of straw, and, encouraged by the presence of their general, braved cold, privations, and dangers, and the event of an enterprise so exceedingly hazardous, and awaited with impatience the moment of crossing to the opposite bank of the river. On the 3rd of March, General Dellers arrived with a new division; on the 4th, Gertruydenberg opened its gates; and every preparation for the passage of the Bielbos was completed.

During this period, the struggle between the two parties in the interior continued with unabated violence. The death of Lepelletier had afforded a pretext to the Mountain to declare themselves menaced, and the assembly did not know how to refuse them the re-establishment of the committee of surveillance. This committee was entirely composed from the Mountain; its first act was the arrest of Gorsas, a deputy and journalist attached to the interests of the Girondists. The Jacobins had obtained another advantage—the suspension of the prosecutions against the originators of the September murders. Hardly had these prosecutions commenced, when the most overwhelming evidence was brought to light against the chief revolutionists, and against Danton himself. The Jacobins, then, roused by the danger which threatened them, pretended that all were equally guilty of the events of those days, because every body had believed that they were not without their use, and had suffered their continuance; they even dared to maintain that they were only to blame for leaving their work incomplete; and they therefore demanded the suspension of proceedings, which afforded, they said, a handle of attack against the purest revolutionists. Their demands were complied with; the proceedings were suspended, that is to say, annulled; and a deputation of Jacobins immediately presented themselves before the minister of justice, praying that extraordinary couriers might be despatched into the country to stop the prosecutions which had already commenced against their brethren of Meaux.

We have already mentioned that Pache had been obliged to quit the ministry, and that Roland had voluntarily given in his resignation. This reciprocal concession had not appeased the animosity of parties. The Jacobins, by no means satisfied, demanded the impeachment of Roland. They asserted that he had peculated enormous sums, and had remitted to London more than twelve millions of francs; that his riches were employed in perverting the public opinion by his publications, and in exciting seditions, by monopolizing grain; they called likewise for similar proceedings against Clavières, Lebrun, and Beurnonville, whom they called traitors, and accomplices in the intrigues of the Girondists. At the same time they procured quite a different sort of compensation for their truckling friend out of place. Chambon, the successor of Pétion in the mayoralty of Paris, had resigned his functions as beyond his powers of performance. The Jacobins immediately thought of Pache to succeed him, in whom they perceived the wise and impartial character of a magistrate. They congratulated themselves on this idea, which they communicated to the commune, the sections, and all the clubs; and the Parisians, overpowered by their wide-spread influence, avenged Pache of his disgrace by nominating him mayor. Provided he had been found as tractable in the mayoralty as he had been in his ministry of war, the dominion of the Jacobins in the capital had been established; and in this appointment, therefore, they consulted as much their interests as their passions.

The difficulty of obtaining provision for the population, and commercial embarrassment, still continued to be sources of disorder and complaints; and, from December to February, these evils had considerably increased. The fear of disturbances and pillage, the repugnance of the farmers to receive paper-money which diminished in value every day, and the high prices of all articles of trade, were, as we have already said, the causes which hindered the free sale of corn, and brought about the scarcity which prevailed. Nevertheless, the exertions of the commune gave, to a certain extent, some activity to commerce, and provisions were not wanting in the markets; but their prices were exorbitant, and the continual issues of paper-money constantly increased their dearthness. The value of the assignats diminishing daily, in proportion to their abundance, the payment of a larger sum became necessary to acquire the same articles, and thus the rates of the markets rose to an excessive height. The people receiving no increase of remuneration for their work, could no longer obtain the necessaries of life, and gave vent to their sufferings in complaints and threats. Bread was not the only article which had considerably augmented in price; sugar, coffee, candles, and soap, had risen to double their former value. The laundrywomen complained to the convention, that they were obliged to pay thirty sous for the same quantity of soap for which they had formerly paid no more than fourteen. It was in vain that the people were told to demand a higher remuneration for their labour, and thus to create a relative proportion between their means and their wants: they could not enter into a concerted agreement among themselves to carry this into execution, therefore they clamoured against the rich, the monopolists, and the mercantile aristocracy, and demanded the imposition of the forced tax and the maximum. The Jacobins, and the members of the commune, although themselves the people in relation to the convention, but who might be called enlightened assemblies when compared with the still lower classes, perceived the inconveniences of this tax. Though more inclined than the convention to adopt such an imposition, they nevertheless resisted it; and at the Jacobin club, Dubois de Crancé, the two Robespierres, Thuriot, and other members of the Mountain, daily raised their voices against the establishment of the maximum. Chaumette and Hebert did the same at the commune; but the galleries murmured, and sometimes even hooted down these orators. The deputations of the sections frequently reproached the commune with their moderation and their connivance with the monopolists. In the assemblies of these sections the lowest class of agitators were accustomed to meet, and a revolutionary fanaticism, more ignorant and violent than that which prevailed among the Jacobins or in the commune, drove them blindly into the greatest extravagances. Allied with the club of the Cordeliers, which was frequented by the most desperate characters in Paris, they became the source and centre of all the disorders of the capital. Their ignorance and obscurity, whilst it rendered them liable to be led into excesses on every occasion, exposed them likewise to dangers of another description. It was in these assemblies that the remnant of the aristocracy ventured to show their faces, and make some feeble attempts at resistance. The creatures of the former nobility, the domestics of the emigrants, and all those turbulent idlers, who, between the two causes, had chosen that of the aristocracy, sheltered themselves here behind the opposition of some honest citizens, who endeavoured to keep the Girondists in favour, and made every effort to bring disgrace upon the Mountain, and to promote, in an underhand manner, the interests of foreign powers and of the old system of government. In the struggles which frequently took place in these associations, the respectable citizens generally retired early, and left this region of discord to the contests of the two extreme parties, who contended together with fearful violence. Dreadful scenes daily took place on the questions of petitions to be presented to the commune, the Jacobins, or the assembly; and, as victory declared itself in favour of the one side or the other, addresses were issued against the outrages of September, and the maximum, or against aristocrats and monopolists.

The commune generally rejected the incendiary petitions of these sections, and put them on their guard against those who wished to urge them into excesses, thus acting the same part towards these furious fanatics as the assembly acted towards themselves. The Jacobins, not having, like the commune, any administrative functions to perform, occupied themselves, by way of retaliation, in discussing all subjects, set up for great philosophers, and pretended to understand the science of social economy, better than the Cordeliers and the sections. They affected, on many questions, not to be influenced by the vulgar passions of these subaltern assemblies, and condemned the maximum as a tax dangerous to liberty and commerce. But for the purpose of substituting some other means of relief for that which they rejected, they proposed to force the circulation of the assignats at their nominal value, and to punish with death any one who should refuse to receive them on these terms, as if this measure would not have been liable to the same objections as the former, as militating against the liberty of commerce. They also entered into a mutual engagement among themselves, to use neither coffee nor sugar, so as forcibly to reduce their prices; and, finally, they suggested that no further issue of assignats should take place, but that forced loans should be required from the rich, in proportion to the number of their servants, horses, &c., to supply their place. All these propositions, however, did not prevent the evils complained of from increasing daily, and it appeared evident that they must soon arrive at a crisis. Meanwhile, and until this crisis burst forth, the public calamities were made subjects of mutual reproach. The Girondists were accused of favouring the rich and the monopolists, for the purpose of instigating the people, by famine, to insurrection, and thus have a pretext for passing new martial laws; some even hesitated not to assert that their object was to invite foreign powers into the country, by provoking disorders,—an absurd reproach, but which afterwards became fatal. The Girondists retorted similar accusations on their adversaries; they declared them the authors of the scarcity, and all the troubles which prevailed, by laying commerce under the restriction of terror, and maintained that their aim was, by tumultuous proceedings, to bring about an anarchy, and by means of an anarchy, to attain supreme power, and perhaps to establish a foreign domination.

The end of February was at hand, and the difficulty of procuring provisions had driven the people to the last extremity of distress. The women, apparently more affected by this species of suffering than the men, complained bitterly. They presented themselves at the Jacobin club on the 22nd, and begged the use of their chamber, that they might deliberate on the dearth of food, and prepare a petition for the national convention. It was known that the object of this petition would be to propose the maximum, and the demand was refused. The galleries then treated the Jacobins as they had formerly treated the assembly; "Down with the monopolists, down with the rich," was the general cry. The president was obliged to put on his hat to appease the tumult, and this failure of respect was explained by supposing there were disguised aristocrats in the chamber. Robespierre and Dubois de Crancé again inveighed against this tax, and recommended the people to remain tranquil, and not to give a pretext to their adversaries to calumniate them, and furnish them with an occasion for passing murderous enactments.

Marat, who always pretended that he was capable of devising the most prompt and simple means of relief, declared in his journal, on the morning of the 25th, that monopolies would never cease till more effective measures were resorted to than those which had been hitherto suggested. Inveighing against monopolizers, venders of articles of luxury, pettifoggers, lawyers, and ex-nobles, whom the faithless representatives of the nation, he said, encouraged in crime, by allowing them to pursue their iniquities with impunity, he added, "In every country where the rights of the people are any thing more than empty titles pompously inscribed on paper, the pillage of a few magazines, and the hanging up of a few monopolizers at their gates, would soon put an end to those calamities which reduce five millions of men to despair, and cause thousands to perish with hunger! The deputies of the people do nothing but babble about these evils,—they propose no remedy*.”

It was on the morning of the 25th that this insensate madman wrote these words; and whether it was that they really wrought upon the irritated minds of the people, or that their sufferings had driven them to a pitch of frenzy, which it was no longer possible to contain within bounds, a multitude of women assembled before the shops of some grocers. They first complained of the prices of provisions, and demanded tumultuously their reduction; the commune was not informed of this assemblage; the commandant Santerre was at Versailles, on military business, and no order was given to call in the aid of the soldiers. Thus the rioters met with no obstacles, and from menaces proceeded to acts of violence and pillage. The first mobs collected in the streets of La Vieille-Monnaie, Cinque Diamans, and the Lombards; they required the reduction of all articles to half price, soap to sixteen sous, refined sugar to twenty-five, moist sugar to fifteen, and candles to thirteen. A great quantity of provisions were forcibly carried off on these terms, and the prices paid down to the grocers. But the rabble soon got tired of paying, and seized upon whatever they felt inclined to take, without giving in exchange any part of their value. The military who had gathered hastily together to one point were checked, and the cry of “Down with the bayonets” arose from all sides. The assembly, the commune, and the Jacobins were sitting. The convention received a report on the subject of the prevailing distresses; the minister of the interior proved that provisions were abundant in Paris, and that the grievances complained of proceeded from the disproportion between the value of the assignments, and that of all articles of exchange. The assembly, to parry off the difficulty of the moment, again granted funds to the commune, to enable them to supply the people with provisions at a reduced rate. The commune, displaying equal zeal, took care to propagate the news of these resolutions, and to arrange measures for preserving the public peace. On the report of every new measure of relief already taken, the galleries cried out, So much the better; but as new propositions were made which appeared not immediately remedial, Down with it, rose from all quarters. Chaumette and Hébert, having proposed beating the drums to summon the military to arms, were hooted down. Nevertheless, it was decreed that strong patrols, preceded by two municipal officers, should be despatched to establish order, and that twenty-seven of the latter should be commissioned to make the proclamations in the sections.

The disorder spread further and further; open pillage was carried on in several streets, and the mob proposed quitting the grocers to plunder other shopkeepers. Meantime, all parties mutually reproached each other with these disorders. “When you had a king,” exclaimed, in the streets, the partisans of the abolished regime, “you were not obliged to pay so dear for provisions, neither were you exposed to be pillaged.” “See,” said the partisans of the Girondists, “the consequence of the system of violence, and of the impunity of revolutionary excesses.”

The Mountain party were at their wit's end, and maintained that disguised aristocrats, Lafayetteists, Rolandists, and Brissotines, stimulated the people to commit these outrages. They declared that they had observed among the mob women of high rank, persons wearing hair-powder, servants of people of high rank who distributed assignats among the people to draw them into the shops. Finally, after the lapse of many hours, a sufficient military force was collected; Santerre returned from Versailles, and the necessary orders were given. The battalion of Brest, who were quartered at Paris, displayed much zeal and courage, and succeeded in dispersing the mob.

In the evening, an animated discussion took place at the Jacobin club. The disorders of the morning were loudly deplored, in spite of the cries of the galleries, and in spite of their contradiction. Collot d'Herbois, Thuriot, and Robespierre, were unanimous in recommending tranquillity to the people, and throwing the blame of their excesses upon the aristocrats and the Girondists. Robespierre made a long harangue on this subject, and maintained that the people could do no wrong, that they could never be to blame, and that unless they were misled, they would never commit any errors. He declared that, in the groups of the plunderers, some complained of the death of the king, that the right side of the assembly was applauded in his own hearing, and that, consequently, no doubt could exist as to who were authors of the outrages of the day. Marat himself advised the preservation of good order, condemned the pillage which he had recommended that very morning in his journal, and charged it all upon the Girondists and royalists.

On the next day, the usual and useless complaints were taken up in the assembly. Barrère inveighed vehemently against the crimes of the preceding day. He remarked on the dilatoriness exhibited by the several authorities in repressing these disorders. In point of fact, the pillage commenced at ten in the morning, and at five in the evening the military had not been called out. Barrère demanded that the mayor and the commandant should be summoned to explain the cause of this delay. A deputation of the section of Bon-Conseil supported this demand. Salles then moved for a decree of accusation against the instigator to these excesses, in fact against Marat, and read the article which had been inserted in his journal of the preceding evening. Accusations of this description had been frequently called for, and more particularly against Marat; the present occasion was very suitable for a prosecution, for it was impossible that riot could follow the exciting cause quicker than these did. Marat, in the coolest manner possible, maintained in the tribune, “that it was only natural for the people to do themselves justice against the monopolists, and that those who moved for an accusation against him ought to be sent to the house of correction.” Buzot called for the order of the day on the proposition of instituting a judicial process against Monsieur Marat. "The law," said he, "is explicit, but Monsieur Marat may explain away his expressions; a jury will not know what verdict to return, and we must not prepare a triumph for Monsieur Marat in the presence of justice itself." One member demanded that the convention should proclaim to the republic, that yesterday morning Marat recommended pillage to the people, and that yesterday evening the pillage took place. Many motions succeeded; and it was finally determined that all the authors of public disorders should be given up to the ordinary tribunals. "Well, then," exclaimed Marat, "pass an act of accusation against me alone, that you may prove that the convention is lost to all sense of shame." These expressions occasioned much tumult, and the assembly immediately handed over Marat, and all the other authors of the excesses committed during the day of the 25th, to the constituted tribunals. The proposition of Barrère was adopted; Santerre and Pache were summoned to the bar of the assembly; new depositions were taken against the supposed agents of foreign powers, and the emigration. At this juncture the belief of the existence of foreign influence was universal; domiciliary visits were again established in all parts of France, to arrest all emigrants and suspected travellers. Passports were renewed; and all tavern-keepers and those who let lodgings were obliged to declare what foreigners lodged at their houses; finally, a new census of the population was ordered.

Marat being now about to be subject to a legal accusation, inserted the following paragraph in his journal.

"Indignant at beholding the enemies of the commonwealth eternally intriguing against the people; disgusted by observing monopolists of every description leaguering together to drive the people to despair by privation and hunger; distressed by perceiving that the measures taken by the convention to put a stop to these conspiracies do not attain their objects; and pained by the complaints of those unfortunate sufferers who come to beg bread of me every morning, I took up my pen to explain the most effectual means of putting an end to the machinations of the enemies of the public, and to the sufferings of the people. The most simple ideas always present themselves most readily to a well-constituted mind, which aims at the promotion of the general welfare without any selfish interests; why then, I asked myself, do we not turn against the public robbers the same means which they have recourse to to ruin the people and destroy liberty? In reply, I remarked, that in a country where the rights of the people are any thing more than empty titles, pompously inscribed on paper, the pillage of a few magazines, and the hanging up of all monopolists at their gates, would soon put an end to their delinquencies! What was the consequence? The leaders of the state faction seized greedily upon this expression; they sent emissaries among the women assembled before the shops of the grocers, to stimulate them to carry off soap, candles, and sugar at their prime cost, whilst these emissaries themselves pillaged the goods of the poor patriot grocers; these wretches kept a profound silence during the whole day, and met together at night at the house of that counter-revolutionary catiff Valazé, to concert falsehoods; and the next day appeared in the tribune to denounce me as the instigator of those excesses which entirely originated with themselves."

The exasperation of party spirit daily increased; menaces were openly exchanged; many deputies never stirred out without being armed; and it was declared, with as much boldness as in the months of July and August of the preceding year, that an insurrection was necessary to save the country, and to cut off the gangrened part of the national representation. The Girondists were accustomed to meet in great numbers at the house of Valazé every evening; but were very undecided as to the part they should take. Some apprehended, but others did not, the approaching perils. A few, and among others, Salles and Louvet, supposed the existence of mere imaginary conspiracies, and by calling the attention of their colleagues to these chimeras, diverted them from the consideration of the real dangers with which they were threatened. Wandering from scheme to scheme, and stationed in the heart of Paris, without any military force at their command, and relying only upon the favourable, it is true, but inert opinion of the provinces, they were exposed daily to the risk of being struck down by a sudden blow from their adversaries. They had not succeeded in organizing a departmental force; the troops of the federalists, who had voluntarily arrived at Paris since the meeting of the convention, were only partially gained over; some had joined the armies; and they could only reckon, at most, on the support of about four hundred soldiers of Brest, whose firmness had put down the riots of the 25th. In lieu of the departmental guard, they had essayed in vain to transfer the command of the public force from the commune to the minister of the interior. The Mountain party, rendered furious by this idea, had intimidated the majority, and prevented the convention from voting such a measure. At this very time they could not rely upon more than eighty members who were inaccessible to fear, and undaunted in their deliberations. In this state of things, only one resource remained to the Girondists, which was as impracticable as all the others which they had resorted to; it was to dissolve the convention: but here again the fury of the Mountain party had prevented them from obtaining a majority. In these uncertainties, which proceeded, not so much from weakness, as from want of effect, the Girondists trusted in the constitution. In their exigency they flew to hope, and flattered themselves that the restraint of the laws would keep down the passions of the multitude, and put an end to all these stormy contests. Theorists, in particular, always cherish this idea. Condorcet had read his report in the name of the committee, which excited much indignation. Both himself, Pétion, and Sieyès, were loaded with the imprecations of the Jacobins; and their republic was termed a complete aristocracy, only calculated to advance to power a few talented, proud, and despotic men. The Mountain party were desirous of desisting from their labours, and many members of the convention perceiving already that their task would be, rather to defend the revolution than form a constitution, openly maintained that the constitution should be deferred till the following year, and that, at the present nation was everywhere welcomed. But on this occasion, as it had before happened on the 2nd and 3rd of September, the people demanded the punishment of all traitors before they quitted the capital. Ever since that time, a set phrase had been adopted. "They would not," they said, "leave behind them conspirators ready to slaughter the families of the absent." It was necessary, then, to avoid new popular massacres, to organise legal and terrible executions, which without formal delays, and without appeal, should reach all those counter-revolutionists and concealed conspirators, who now threatened the revolution from within, in the same manner as it was menaced from without. It was necessary to suspend the sword over the head of those generals, ministers, and faithless deputies, who compromised the public safety. Further, it was not deemed just that those rich egotists who were averse to the system of equality, who were indifferent whether they served the convention or Brunswick, and who consequently did not present themselves to assist in filling the battalions of the army, it was not right that they should remain aliens to the public cause, and do nothing in its behalf. Consequently it was proposed that all who possessed a revenue of more than fifteen hundred francs, should be obliged to pay a tax proportioned to their income, to recompense those who generously devoted themselves to their country, and to defray their expenses during the campaign. These two propositions, for a new tribunal to try the enemies of the republic, and for a contribution from the rich in favour of the poor, were almost universally insisted on in all the sections. Many repeated these demands to the commune; the Jacobins echoed the same request, and, on the following day, the convention were confronted with the irresistible force of these combined associations.

In fact, upon the following day, 9th of March, all the deputies of the Mountain were present. The galleries were filled by Jacobins. They had driven away all the women, because, said they, they were going upon a warlike expedition. Many carried pistols with them. The deputy, Gamon, attempted to complain of this, but he was not listened to. The Mountain party and the galleries, determined to carry their point, intimidated the majority. The mayor, arriving with the council of the commune, confirmed the report of the commissaries of the convention as to the attachment of the sections, but yet repeated their hankering for an extraordinary tribunal, and a tax upon wealth. Many sections followed the commune, and required the tribunal and the tax; some required that a law should be passed against monopolists, and called for the establishment of the maximum of the price of provisions, and the abrogation of the decree which placed merchandize upon the same footing in exchange with metallic currency, and allowed it to circulate at a different rate than a paper currency. After it was insisted that these proposed measures should be put to the question, an immediate decision by vote was required as to the principle involved in the establishment of an extraordinary tribunal. A few deputies opposed it. Lanjuinais rose, and requested that, at least, if they sanctioned the iniquity of a tribunal without appeal, such a calamitous institution ought not to extend its dominion further than the department of Paris.

Guadet and Valazé made several vain efforts to support Lanjuinais, but were savagely interrupted by the vociferations of the Mountain. Some deputies even required that the tribunal should assume the style of Revolutionary. But the convention, without permitting further discussion, "decreed the establishment of an extraordinary criminal tribunal; to try without appeal, and without recourse to the court of cassation, all conspirators and counter-revolutionists; and commissioned the committee of legislation to present to them, on the next day, a plan of organization."

Immediately after this decree, a second was passed, striking a blow at wealth by way of an extraordinary war tax; a third followed, appointing forty-one commissions, each consisting of two deputies, to be despatched immediately into the departments, to accelerate the recruiting service, to disarm those who refused to join the armies, to arrest all suspected persons, to seize all horses used for purposes of pleasure, and, in fine, to exercise the most absolute dictatorship. To these measures others were added. Exhibitions of colleges were to be given in future only to the sons of those who engaged in the war; all bachelors occupied in offices were to be replaced by fathers of families; and corporal restraint abolished. The right of making a will had been done away with some days before. All these measures were adopted on the notion of Danton, who knew perfectly well how to attach the personal interests of the community to the cause of the revolution.

The Jacobins, satisfied with their day's work, congratulated themselves on the zeal they had displayed, on the manner in which they had filled the galleries, and on the impressive spectacle which the sacred ranks of the Mountain presented. They recommended to each other to continue their attendance, and to be all present at the sitting of the next day, when the plan of the extraordinary tribunal was to be organized. Robespierre, said they, has strongly recommended it to us. Yet they were not perfectly content with what they had obtained, and one of them proposed drawing up a petition to demand the renewal of the committees and the ministry, the arrest of all public functionaries at the moment of their dismissal, and of all counter-revolutionary journalists. This petition was about to be prepared instantly; but the president observed that the society were not competent to perform a collective act, and therefore they should seek some other place where they might meet in the character of individual petitioners. They then dispersed themselves through Paris. The city was in tumult. Two hundred of the ordinary promoters of all disorders, headed by Lasouski, rushed to the house of the journalist Gorsas, armed with pistols and sabres, and broke his presses to pieces. Gorsas fled, and succeeded in getting off safe, defending himself with much courage and presence of mind. A similar scene took place at the house of the editor of the Chronicle, whose presses were also destroyed.

The next day, the 10th, threatened to be still more tumultuous. This was Sunday; an entertainment had been prepared at the section of the corn-market, (Halle-aux-Blés), to treat the recruits who were about to set out for the army. The idleness of the people, joined to the bustle and proparations for the festival, might easily be made subservient for the worst purposes. The chamber of the convention was as full as it had been the day before. The galleries were as crowded, and the benches of the Mountain were as menacing as ever. The discussion opened on topics of ordinary interest. A letter from Dumouriez was then read. Robespierre supported the demands of the general, and required that Lanoue and Stengel, both generals of the advanced guard at the time of the last defeat, should be brought to trial. This was assented to. It was necessary that the deputies who had been nominated commissaries should set out for the provinces without delay. But their votes being essential to ensure the establishment of the extraordinary tribunal, it was resolved that this question should be decided immediately, and the commissaries sent off the next day. Cambacérés then demanded the formation of the extraordinary tribunal, and of a new ministry. Buzot sprang to the tribune, but he was interrupted by violent marks of disapprobation which drowned his voice. "These clamours," said he, "teach me what I knew before, that courage is necessary to oppose the despotism that is being prepared for us." He was again interrupted: "I will resign my life," continued he, "willingly, but I will save my memory from disgrace, by opposing the despotism of the national convention. It is proposed that you should unite in your own persons every possible authority"—"We must act, and not babble," cried a voice.—"You are right," resumed Buzot, "the supporters of monarchy also say, that we must act, and that, consequently, the government of a single despot is far better—" Now clamours arose; the greatest confusion prevailed in the assembly; and it was finally agreed to adjourn the organization of the new ministry, and attend only, during the present sitting, to that of the extraordinary tribunal. The report of the committee was called for. It was not yet drawn up; their settled plan however was produced. Robert Lindet, at the same time deploring its severity, read it to the assembly. See what is here proposed, said he, in a tone of anguish: The tribunal is to be composed of nine judges, nominated by the convention, independent of all forms, obtaining a conviction by all practicable means, and divided into two sections, always permanent, to prosecute, on the demand of the convention, or at their own will, all those who, by their conduct or opinions, shall attempt to mislead the people, or those who, by the stations they formerly occupied under the abolished system, recall the recollection of the prerogatives usurped by despots.

On the perusal of this fearful bill, applauses resounded from the left, and a violent agitation was manifested on the right. "I would rather die," exclaimed Vergniaud, "than consent to the establishment of this Venetian inquisition!"—"It is necessary for the people," replied Amar; "we must either adopt this measure of safety, or be exposed to an insurrection."—"My taste for revolutionary power," said Cambon, "is sufficiently well known; but if the people have been deceived in their elections, we also may deceive ourselves in the choice of these nine judges, who would then be insupportable tyrants imposed upon us by ourselves!" "This tribunal," cried Duhem, "is too good for the counter-revolutionary wretches!" A long tumult ensued, and the time was consumed in menaces, outrages, and all manner of insults. "We will have it," cry the one side; "We will not have it," reply the other. Barrère demanded the institution of juries, and insisted upon their necessity with great force of argument. Turreau required that these juries should be chosen from Paris, and Boyer Foulfrede, from the whole republic, "as," said he, "the new tribunal will be called upon to judge crimes committed in the departments, in the armies, and everywhere." The day wore on—the night was fast approaching. The president, Gensonné, recapitulated the several propositions, and prepared to put them to the vote. The assembly, overcome by fatigue, appeared disposed to yield to violence. The members of the Plain began to retire; and the Mountain to intimidate them called loudly for the vote. "Ay," exclaimed Feraud, indignantly, "vote loudly, that all the world may know who are the men who wish to assassinate innocence under the colour of law!" This vehement appeal re-animating the right side and the centre, and, contrary to all probabilities, the majority declared—1st, that there should be juries; 2nd, that these juries should be chosen, in equal number, from all the departments; and 3d, that they should be nominated by the convention.

After the admission of these three propositions, Gensonné thought fit that an hour's rest should be granted the assembly, who were overcome with fatigue. The deputies rose to retire. "I call upon," cried Danton, "all good citizens to remain in their places." Every one resumed his seat. "What!" continued Danton, "is it at this moment, when Miranda, perhaps, is beaten, and Dumouriez, attacked in the rear, is, probably, obliged to lay down his arms, that you think of deserting your post?" "We must complete the establishment of these extraordinary laws, which are destined to strike terror into our domestic foes. They must be arbitrary, because it is impossible to make them applicable to every emergency; and because, however terrible they may be, they will be preferable to popular massacres, which now, as they were in September, will be the consequence of judicial delays. Besides this tribunal, we must organize an energetic executive power, in immediate contact with yourselves, capable of bringing into activity all your resources both in men and money. To-day then we must settle the question of the extraordinary tribunal, to-morrow that of the executive power, and the day after we may despatch our commissaries into the departments. Let any one calumniate me who will; let my memory perish, but let the republic be saved."

In spite of this violent address, the respite of an hour was granted. It was about seven o'clock in the evening. The idleness of Sunday, the entertainments given during the day, and the question which had been discussed in the assembly, all contributed to augment the general agitation. Without any premeditated plot, as the Girondists supposed, the mere association of circumstances disposed the populace to sudden riot. The Jacobins were assembled at their club; Bantable had hurried thither to make his report of the sitting of the convention, and to complain that the patriots had not been so energetic as the day before. The council-general of the commune was likewise in session. The sections, abandoned by the peaceable citizens, were occupied only by a few furious persons who passed incendiary resolutions. In that of the Four Nations, eighteen of these madmen had determined that the department of the Seine ought at that moment to assume the supreme command, and that the electoral body of Paris should be immediately assembled to cut off from the national convention those faithless deputies who connived at the conspiracies of the enemies of the revolution. The same resolution was passed in the club of the Cordeliers, and a deputation from the section and the club immediately set out to communicate these resolutions to the commune. At the same moment, the rioters, according to their custom in all popular movements, ran to close the barriers.

At this very time the yells of an infuriated populace resounded through the streets; the recruits who had dined at the corn market, intoxicated with wine and madness, and armed with pistols and sabres, advanced towards the chamber of the Jacobins, shouting songs of terrific import. They arrived at the moment when Bentabol finished his report of the sitting of the convention. Having reached the door, they demanded permission to pass through the chamber; and they traversed it in the midst of applause. One of them, addressing the club, said; "Citizens, at this moment of danger, the conquerors of the 10th of August, rise up to exterminate both foreign enemies and domestic foes."—"Yes," replied the president, Collot d'Herbois, "in spite of all intriguers, we with you will protect liberty." Desheux then rising up, declared that Miranda was the creature of Pétion, and that he had committed treason, that Brissot had caused war to be declared with England, for the purpose of ruining France. "There is only one means of salvation left," added he, "and that is to cut off all traitors, to place all the appealers in arrest at their own dwellings, and to call upon the people to nominate other deputies." A man dressed in military uniform now came forward out of the crowd that was filing through the chamber, and declared that an arrest would not be enough, and that the people could not be satisfied without vengeance. "What is this inviolability," said he, "so much boasted of? I will trample it under my feet." While these words were being spoken, Dubois de Crancé spoke against these propositions; his opposition created a fearful tumult. It was proposed that they should divide themselves into two columns, the one to join their brothers the Cordeliers, and the other to present themselves to the convention by desfilng before them, to state what it is they require at their hands. The club hesitated to depart, but the galleries occupied the chamber and extinguished the lights, and the whole divided into two bodies, and hastened away, the one to the convention, and the other to the Cordeliers.

At this fearful crisis, the wife of Louvet, who inhabited a house in the Rue St. Honoré, on hearing the vociferations issuing from this hall, went thither to inform herself of what was passing.

She was present at the scene we have just detailed, and hastened to warn her husband and many other members of the right side who had quitted the convention, where, it was said, they were about to be assassinated. Louvet, armed as he usually was, taking advantage of the darkness of the night, ran from house to house, to give his friends intelligence of the outrages which were preparing, pointing out, at the same time, a place of meeting where they might remain concealed, and escape the daggers of the assassins. He found them assembled at the house of Pétion, quietly deliberating on some decrees which were shortly to be passed. He informed them of his alarms, but could not succeed in disturbing the stoical mind of Pétion, who looking up, and seeing the rain fall, said coldly—There will be nothing to-night. Nevertheless, a place of meeting was fixed upon, and one of the deputies hastened to the barracks of the battalion of Brest to get them immediately under arms. Meantime the ministers assembled at the house of Lebrun, having no force at their disposal, were at a loss in what manner to defend the convention and themselves, for they also were menaced. The assembly, struck with consternation, awaited the fearful explosion; and at every noise and every yell which reached their ears, believed the assassins were upon them. Forty members alone of the right side remained in their places, and, expecting every moment an attack to be made upon their lives, they had swords and pistols with them ready to defend themselves. They had agreed to rush upon the Mountain on the first symptom of hostility, and to slaughter as many of them as possible. The galleries and the Mountain had assumed the same attitude, and both sides awaited with stern determination a sanguinary conflict.

But the people had not yet acquired sufficient audacity to re-enact the scene of the 10th of August against the convention; this was but a preliminary movement, it was no more than a mere 20th of June. The commune dared not favour an insurrection, for which popular opinion was not ripe, and sincerely expressed their indignation against it. The mayor, at the very moment the two deputations of the Cordeliers and the section of the Four Nations, showed themselves, turned them away without even granting them an audience. Being attached to the Jacobins, he undoubtedly felt little regard towards the Girondists, and perhaps even desired their fall, but he might think an insurrection dangerous; besides, like Pétion on the 20th of June and the 10th of August, stayed by the illegality of the act, he wished rather to yield by constraint than willingly. He therefore refused to receive the two deputations, and in this Hébert and Chaumette, procurators of the commune, supported him. Orders were sent to have the barriers opened, and an address was prepared, directed to the sections and the Jacobins to reduce them to order. Santerre, in the commune, energetically inveighed against those who demanded a new insurrection; he said, that the tyrant being overthrown, this second insurrection could only be directed against the people who at present were the sole sovereign; that, if they happened to have bad deputies, they should be patiently endured, as Maury and Cazelles had been before; that Paris was not the kingdom of France, and was, therefore, bound to accept of the representatives of the departments; that as to the minister of war, if he had dismissed some of his agents, he had a right so to do, since he was responsible for their conduct; that at Paris a few deluded and incapable men, fancying they possessed ability to govern the nation, threw every thing into disorder; and that, in short, he should call out the military and reduce the rioters to order.

For his part, Beurnonville, whose mansion was inclosed, climbed over the walls of his garden, collected together as large a force as he could, put himself at the head of the battalion of Brest, and made some impression on the rioters by this warlike attitude. The section of the Four Nations, the Cordeliers, and Jacobins, returned to their respective clubs. Thus the resistance of the commune, the decided conduct of Santerre, the courage of Beurnonville and the battalion of Brest, and perhaps also the rain which fell in torrents, marred the progress of this insurrection. Moreover, the passions of the mob had not yet acquired sufficient strength against all that was noble and generous in the infant republic. Pétion, Condorcet, and Vergniaud, were still to display for some time longer their courage, genius, and seductive eloquence in the convention. All became quiet again. The mayor, being summoned to the bar of the assembly, assured them of the tranquillity of the city, and on this very night, the decree which constituted the extraordinary tribunal had peaceably been carried into execution. This tribunal was composed of a jury and five judges, of a public accuser, and two associates, all to be nominated by the convention. The juries were to be chosen before the month of May, and provisionally they might be taken alone from the department of Paris, and the four neighbouring departments. The juries were to deliver their verdict aloud.

The consequence of the event of the 10th was to awaken the indignation of the members of the right side, and to cause some embarrassment among those of the left, who were greatly compromised by these premature demonstrations. On all sides the attempted insurrection was disavowed as illegal, and considered as treasonable against the national representation; those even who did not disapprove of the idea of a new insurrection, disapproved of this as badly conducted, and recommended caution against those disturbers of the public peace, paid by the emigration and England to promote disorders. Both sides of the assembly seemed to heartily concur in this opinion; both supposed the existence of some secret influence, and reciprocally accused each other of being concerned in it as accomplices. A singular scene confirmed this prevalent opinion. The section of the fish-market (Poissonnière), on presenting volunteers, demanded a decree of accusation against Dumouriez, the general on whom all the hopes of France now reposed. The reading of this petition by the president of the section, called forth a general exclamation of indignation. "He is an aristocrat," cried some, "paid by the English." At the same moment the banner carried by the section attracted notice, and all were astonished on observing that its decoration was white, and that it was surmounted by a fleur-de-lis. This excited an universal burst of fury; the decoration and lily were torn to pieces, and a tri-coloured ribbon, which was thrown by a woman from the galleries, substituted in their place. Isauril then demanded a decree of accusation against the president of this section. More than a hundred voices supported this motion, and among the number, that which attracted most attention was that of Marat. "This petition," said he, "is part of a plot; it is necessary to read it throughout; the heads of Vergniaud, Gudet, Gensonné,—and others, are required; and you must perceive," added he, "what a triumph such a massacre would afford our enemies! It would be the entire destruction of the convention!" Universal applause interrupted him. He resumed, and accused one of the principal agitators, named Fournier, and demanded his arrest. This was immediately ordered; the whole affair was put into the hands of the committee of general safety; and the assembly resolved that a copy of the proceedings should be sent to Dumouriez, to convince him that they did not identify themselves with the falsehoods uttered by mere libellers.

Young Varlet, the friend and companion of Fournier, hastened to the Jacobins, to ascertain the reason of his arrest, and to propose that he should be permitted to go at large. "Fournier," said he, "is not the only one menaced; Lasowski, Desfieux, and finally myself are the same. The revolutionary tribunal, which is about to be established, will be directed against the patriots, as that of the 10th of August, and the brothers who hear me are no longer Jacobins if they do not follow me." He next became desirous of accusing Dumouriez, but at this point an extraordinary confusion took place; the president put on his hat, and said that there was a desire to destroy the Jacobins. Billaud-Varenes himself ascended the tribune, complained of these incendiary propositions, and justified Dumouriez, for whom, as he said, he had no regard, further than as at the present moment he did his duty, and had proved himself willing to defend his country vigorously; he complained of the design to dissolve the national convention by insurrectionary attempts, declared Varlet, Fournier, and Desfieux suspicious characters, and maintained the necessity of a purifying scrutiny, to deliver society from those secret enemies who sought to betray it. The opinion of Billaud-Varenes was adopted; and satisfactory news from the army, and intelligence of the acknowledgment of the republic by the Porte, restored tranquillity. Thus Marat, Billaud-Varenes, and Robespierre, who spoke also in the same spirit, were agreed in their condemnation of the rioters, and seemed all of them to concur in the notion that they were in the pay of the enemy. This is of itself an incontestable proof that no secret plot, as supposed by the Girondists, had existence. If such a conspiracy had been formed, assuredly Billaud-Varenes, Marat, and Robespierre, would have been more or less implicated in it, and would have been obliged, at least, to remain neuter, as the left side of the legislative assembly had been, after the 20th of June, and would certainly not have demanded the arrest of one of their accomplices. But in the present instance the insurrection was the effect of a popular fermentation, and being premature or badly managed, was disclaimed by the Jacobins. Besides, Marat, Robespierre, and Billaud-Varenes, although desiring the overthrow of the Girondists, yet were actually possessed with the apprehension of foreign intrigues, were in dread of the disorganization of the state in the face of a victorious enemy, were kept in awe by the sentiments expressed by the departments, were embarrassed by the accusations which the popular tumults daily brought upon them, and probably meditated at this time no more than possessing themselves of the ministries, domineering over all the committees, and driving the Girondists from every place in the government, without violently excluding them from the legislature. One man alone was open to suspicion, although he was the least excited of all the personal enemies of the Girondists,—this was Danton; his influence was all-powerful with the Cordeliers, the prime movers of the disturbance; he was not hostile to the members of the right side, but rather to their system of moderation, which, in his opinion, relaxed the vigour of the government; he was, above all things, urgent for the establishment of an extraordinary tribunal, and of a supreme committee, invested with an all-powerful dictatorship, because he was, above all considerations, anxious for the success of the revolution; and it is possible that he secretly instigated the rioters to the excesses of the 10th of March, to intimidate the Girondists, and overcome their resistance. It is certain, at least, that he was in no haste to disavow any connexion with the authors of the disturbance; but, on the contrary, he was observed to renew his exhortations for the organization of government in a prompt and terrible manner.

Be this as it may, it was agreed on all hands, that the aristocrats were the secret promoters of the disturbances; every one, indeed, either believed, or affected to believe this. Vergniaud, in a speech of overpowering eloquence, in which he forcibly condemned the whole conspiracy, supposed this to be the case; he was blamed by Louvet, who would rather that he had attacked the Jacobins in a more straightforward manner; but he succeeded in passing a resolution, that the first charge of the tribunal should be the prosecution of the promoters of the disturbances of the 10th of March. The minister of justice, in making his report of the events of that day, declared that he had made no discovery of any act of participation on the part of the revolutionary committee, to whom they were imputed; that he had observed nothing but the violence of the clubs, and some propositions made in a moment of enthusiasm; and that the only fact which had any appearance of premeditation was the assemblage of a few members of the club of the Cordeliers at the Corraza coffee-house. These members of the Cordeliers were Lasouski, Fournier, Gusman, Desfieux, and Varlet, the ordinary agitators of the sections. They were accustomed to meet together after their sittings, to discuss political subjects. No one attached any importance to this discovery; and indeed the assembling of a few subordinate individuals at the Corraza coffee-house being all that was brought to light, it cast a ridicule upon the supposition of deep-laid plots.

We have already noticed, in the preceding chapter, the state of mutual exasperation which influenced both parties at home, and the extraordinary measures that the revolutionary government had adopted to resist the coalition of foreign powers, and to suppress the factions that threatened the nation from abroad. Such was the state of things, daily becoming more and more emergent, when Dumouriez, returning from Holland, rejoined his army at Louvaine. We have already seen him exerting his authority against the emissaries of the executive council, and repressing, by every means in his power, the jacobinism which they sought to introduce into Belgium. To all these measures he added another still more hazardous, which had a direct tendency to lead to the same results as similar conduct had done in the case of Lafayette: he wrote, on the 12th of March, a letter to the convention, in which, referring to the disorganization of the armies brought about by Pache and the Jacobins, to the decree of the 15th of December, and to the vexations exercised against the Belgians; he imputed all the evils which then prevailed, to the spirit of subversion and disorder which had spread through Paris, over France, and beyond France, into those countries which had been emancipated by our armies. This letter, full of the boldest remonstrances, which it was not the province of a general to make, reached the committee of safety at the moment when numerous accusations appeared against him, and when his friends were making continual efforts to preserve to him some measure of popularity, and to attach the defence of the republic to his services. It was kept for awhile secret, and Danton was despatched immediately to persuade him to retract it.

Dumouriez rallied his army before Louvaine, re-assembled his dispersed divisions, and threw out a corps to his right hand, to protect Campine, and to co-operate with the rear-guard of the troops which had been destined for the expedition into Holland. Immediately afterwards he resolved to resume the offensive, to restore confidence to his soldiers. The Prince of Cobourg, having occupied the banks of the Meuse from Liege to Maestricht, and having pushed on as far as Saint Tron, had stationed an advanced corps at Tirlemont. Dumouriez retook this city; and perceiving that the enemy had neglected guarding the important position of Goldenhoven, which commands the whole space between the two streams called the Gettes, marched thither with a few battalions, and got possession of it without difficulty. On the 16th of March, the next day, the enemy attempted to recover this lost position, and commenced a vigorous attack. Dumouriez, who had expected this, maintained the post, and endeavoured to reanimate his troops by the combat. The imperialists, being repelled, after having lost seven or eight hundred men, repassed the smaller Gette, and took up their station among the villages of Neerlanden, Landen, Neerwinden, Overwinden, and Racour. The French, encouraged by this advantage, posted themselves on their flank before Tirlemont, and in many villages in front of the Little Gette, which had now become the line of separation between the two armies.

Dumouriez, from that very moment, made up his mind to engage the enemy, an idea as prudent as it was bold. A campaign carried on by the rules of military tactics was little adapted to troops who were as yet very undisciplined. To impart glory to the French arms, to satisfy the convention, to attach the Belgians more firmly to France, to drive the enemy beyond the Meuse, and keep them there for a time, then to return to Holland, enter the capital of the coalition, and introduce the revolution there, were the objects of Dumouriez. To these plans he also, it was said, added another: the re-establishment of the constitution of 1791, and the overthrow of the demagogues, with the aid of the Dutch, and of his own army. But this addition is not accordant with the fact, not only with regard to the present occasion, but even when he was at Moerdijk: he aimed only at what was prudent, practicable, and proper; and this was to recover his own influence, to re-establish our military reputation, and to be enabled to return to the prosecution of his plans by gaining a battle. The reviving ardour of the troops, and his military position, both gave him a well-founded hope of success; besides, his situation made it necessary to run every hazard, and he could not therefore hesitate for a moment.

Our army extended two leagues in front of the Little Gette, at Neer-Heylissem, reaching to Leaw. Dumouriez determined, by a manœuvre, to drive the enemy between Leaw and Saint Tron. His left being supported by Leaw, as it were upon a centre, it was requisite to wheel his right by Neer-Heylissem, Recour, and Landen, and thus compel the Austrians to retreat before him to Saint Tron. For this purpose, it was necessary to cross the Little Gette, to climb the opposite steep banks, take Leaw, Orsmäel, Neerwinden, Overwinden, and Racour. These three last villages, presenting a front to our right, which was to pass through them by wheeling round, formed the principal point of attack. Dumouriez, dividing his right wing into three columns, under the command of Valence, ordered them to pass the Gette by the bridge of Neer-Heylissem: one was to outflank the enemy; the other to occupy the rising ground of Middelwinden, and from this height to cannonade and capture the village of Overwinden; and the third to attack the village of Neerwinden on its right. The centre, committed to the Duke de Chartres, and forming two columns, were ordered to cross at the bridge of d'Esemäel, pass through Laer, and attack Neerwinden in front, already threatened on its first flank by the third column. Finally, the left, commanded by Miranda, was to divide itself into two or three columns, and occupy Leaw and Orsmäel, and maintain themselves there, whilst the centre and the right marching in advance, after having gained a victory, would effect our movement of wheeling round to meet the enemy's flank, which was the main object of the battle.

These arrangements were resolved upon on the evening of the 17th of March; on the 18th, at nine o'clock in the morning, the whole army were drawn up, and were in high spirits. The Gette was crossed at all the points. Miranda occupied Leaw by Champmorin; he himself seized upon Orsmäel, and opened a cannonade upon the enemy, who retired to the heights of Halle, and there strongly entrenched himself. The object of the manœuvre was so far attained. At the centre and at the right the manœuvre was effected at the same instant; the two divisions of the army passed through Elissem, d'Esemäel, and Neer-Heylissem; and, notwithstanding a destructive fire was kept up by the enemy, courageously scaled the steep heights that bordered the Gette. The column of the extreme right passed through Racour, issued out on the plain, and instead of forming a line there, according to their orders, committed the error of falling back upon Overwinden, to seek the enemy. The second column of the right, after having met with a check in its march, sprang forward with heroic impetuosity upon the high ground of Middelwinden, and drove the imperialists from it; but instead of establishing itself there, it merely passed over it, and took possession of Overwinden. The third column entered Neerwinden, but, misunderstanding their orders, committed the error of forming a line extending beyond the village, and thus exposing themselves to be driven back by the Imperialists. Nevertheless the French army had all but attained its object; but the Prince of Cobourg, having in the first instance neglected to outflank the French at the moment of their crossing the Gette, and ascending its steep banks, now endeavoured to repair this error by giving a general order for resuming his abandoned posts. A superior force marched upon the left against Miranda. Clerfait, profiting by the mistake of the first column in not attacking him, and by that error of the second column, which had not established itself on the high ground of Middelwinden, and of the third and two other columns composing the centre being confusedly huddled together in Neerwinden, passed over the plain of Landen, retook Racour, Middelwinden, Overwinden, and Neerwinden. At this moment, the French were in a perilous situation. Driven from all the points they had occupied, thrown back upon the very edge of precipitous steep, outflanked on the right, cannonaded in front by a superior artillery, threatened by two corps of cavalry, and having a river at their backs, they were exposed to utter destruction, and, in point of fact, they would have been totally destroyed, if the enemy, not directing the greatest part of his force against the left, had vigorously attacked the centre and right. Dumouriez, hastening to this critical post, rallied his columns, retook the high ground of Middelwinden, and himself marched upon Neerwinden, which had been already taken twice by the French, and as often also retaken by the imperialists. Dumouriez for a third time entered it, after a terrible carnage. This unfortunate village was crammed full of men and horses, and, in the confusion of the attack, our troops were there crowded together, and completely disorganized. Dumouriez, perceiving the danger, abandoned this spot, choked with human carcasses, and drew up his columns at a small distance from the village. He surrounded this position with artillery, and prepared to defend it. At this moment two corps of cavalry broke upon him, the one from Neerwinden, and the other from Overwinden. Valence met the first at the head of the French cavalry, charged impetuously, repelled the enemy, and, covered with honourable wounds, was obliged to yield his command to the Duke of Chartres. General Thouvenot received the second corps of cavalry with calm intrepidity, and allowed them to engage the infantry, whose ranks were opened, then suddenly ordered a double discharge of grape shot and musketry, which being accompanied by a charge of bayonets, overwhelmed the imperial cavalry, and nearly annihilated them altogether. Dumouriez thus remained master of the field of battle, and established himself there, to complete, on the next day, his manœuvre of wheeling round upon the enemy's position.

This had been a bloody day, but the most difficult part of the undertaking appeared to be got over. The left wing stationed in the morning at Leuw and Orsmarl, had accomplished their object, and all firing having ceased since two o'clock in the afternoon, Dumouriez concluded they had kept their ground. He considered that he had gained a victory, inasmuch as he had kept the field of battle. As night drew on, the right and centre lighted their fires, but no officer had yet arrived to inform Dumouriez, on the part of Miranda, of what had passed on his left flank. He then began to have his doubts, and soon became extremely anxious. He set out on horseback with two officers and two attendants to satisfy his mind on this point, and found the village of Laer abandoned by Dampierre, who commanded, under the Duke of Chartres, one of the two centre columns. He there learnt, that the left being completely routed, had crossed the Gette and had fled to Tirlemont; and that Dampierre, being thus left exposed to the enemy, had fallen backward upon the post he had occupied the morning before the battle. The general then, accompanied by his two officers and his two attendants, hastened, with every precaution of secrecy, towards Tirlemont, and narrowly escaped being taken by the Austrian hulans, arrived there about midnight, and found Miranda, who had retreated two leagues from the field of battle, and that Valence, who had been taken thither on account of his wounds, had vainly endeavoured to persuade him to re-occupy his advanced post. Miranda, who entered Orsmarl in the morning, had been attacked the moment when the imperialists resumed their posts. The greatest part of the enemy's forces having assaulted his wing partly composed of the national volunteers, they were soon thrown into confusion, and fled to Tirlemont. Miranda drawn along with them, had neither time or ability to rally his troops, although Miaczinsky had come to his aid with a fresh corps; he had not even thought of giving the commander-in-chief intelligence of this event. As to Champmorn, who was posted at Leuw with the last column, he maintained his position till the evening, and had not considered it necessary to re-enter Bingen till late in the day.

The French army thus found itself separated, one part behind the Gette, and the other part in front; and if the enemy, less intimidated than he really was by so obstinate an action, had followed up his advantages, he might have cut off our line, annihilated our right wing encamped at Neerwinden, and put the left, already forced to retire, to the rout. Dumouriez, preserving his presence of mind, resolved upon a retreat, which he prepared to execute the next morning. For this purpose, he endeavoured to revive the courage of the wing under the command of Miranda, and determined to lead them forward to act as a check upon the enemy on the left of the line, whilst the centre and the right in the line of their retreat should endeavour to repass the Gette. But this part of the army, dispirited by the defeat of the preceding evening, advanced slowly and unwillingly. Luckily, Dampierre, who had crossed the Gette with one column of the centre, supported Dumouriez powerfully, and displayed much skill and courage in this dangerous emergency. Dumouriez himself, always in the midst of his battalions, encouraged them, and was now about to lead them on to the rising ground of Wommersem, which they had occupied the evening before the battle. The Austrians, having since erected batteries there, opened a murderous fire. Dumouriez placed himself at the head of these disheartened soldiers, and made them understand how much better it were to open an attack, than to be under a continual fire; that after one charge it would be much less destructive than receiving passively the continued discharge of a thundering artillery. Twice he led them on, and twice, discouraged by the recollection of their late defeat, they halted; and, whilst they manifested the most heroic constancy under the fire of the Austrians from the heights of Wommersem, they could not summon up courage to charge the enemy at the point of the bayonet. At this moment the horse of Dumouriez was shot under him; he was dismounted and thrown to the ground. The soldiers at sight of this were in dismay, and ready to fly; but he rose immediately, mounted another horse, and succeeded in retaining them on the field of battle.

Meantime, the Duke of Chartres managed to retreat with the right wing and one half of the centre. Commanding his four columns with as much bravery as skill, he retired at the head of his four columns with great coolness and intrepidity, in the face of a formidable enemy, and crossed the three bridges of the Gette without being disordered. Dumouriez then drew back his left wing as well as Dampierre's column, and regained the post he had occupied the evening before in the face of the enemy, who were wrapt in admiration in witnessing such a masterly retreat. On the 19th, the army were again stationed as on the 17th, between Haacken-hoven and Goldsenhoven, having lost in the late engagement four thousand men killed, and about ten thousand by desertion, who fled to the interior, spreading the disastrous tidings of the defeat.

Dumouriez, vexed and agitated by contending emotions, thought sometimes of fighting with the Austrians to the last extremity, and sometimes of destroying the Jacobin faction, to whom he attributed the disorganization of his army and all his reverses. In the transports of his rage, he inveighed aloud against the tyranny of Paris, and his expressions, repeated by his staff, circulated through the army. Nevertheless, although much disturbed by the violence of his passions, he did not lose that presence of mind which was necessary to conduct a retreat, and he made the finest arrangements for enabling himself to keep possession of Belgium, by the occupation of its fortified towns, if he should be incapable of maintaining himself in the field. He ordered d'Haville to throw a strong garrison into the citadel of Namur, and to keep his ground there with one division. He sent General Ruault to Antwerp, to collect the twenty thousand men who had been destined for the expedition into Holland, to guard the Scheldt, whilst effective garrisons occupied Breda and Gertruydenberg. His object was thus to form a semicircle of fortresses, taking in Namur, Mous, Tournay, Courtray, Antwerp, Breda, and Gertruydenberg; to place himself in the centre of this semicircle, and there wait for the necessary reinforcements, to enable him to resume the campaign with fresh vigour and activity. On the 22nd, he again contested a post before Louvain with the imperialists, which was as severe as that of Goldsenhoven, and cost quite as many men. In the evening, he had an interview with Colonel Mack, an officer who exercised great influence over the operations of the allied army, from the reputation he enjoyed in Germany. They agreed to come to no more decisive engagements, but to follow one another in good order, to spare the lives of their soldiers, as well as the country which might be the theatre of the war. This species of armistice, which was very favourable to the French, who would have been altogether dispersed, had they been vigorously attacked, also perfectly suited the timid system of the allied powers, who having recovered the Meuse, were not anxious to attempt any thing decisive till the capture of Mayence should have been accomplished. Such was the first negotiation of Dumouriez with the enemy. The politeness of Colonel Mack, and his engaging manners, might naturally dispose him, whilst under perturbation of mind, to have recourse to foreign assistance. He began to consider that the career he was now pursuing presented no prospect of future advantage; whether he had a few months since anticipated success, glory, and influence by commanding the French armies, or whether this expect-tation had made him look with an indulgent eye on the violence of the revolutionists; certain it was that as things then were, beaten, stripped of his popularity, and imputing the disorganization of his army to the Jacobin faction, he now regarded with horror those disorders which he had before contemplated with indifference. Educated in courts, and knowing by experience with what strength that machine of government should be organized, which is intended to ensure the durability of a state, he could not conceive how a rebellious set of citizens could possess the faculty so complicated as that of the art of government. Situated as he was, it was natural that this general, statesman as well as warrior, having the means in his own power, should conceive the design of employing them, to terminate those disorders which terrified his imagination and threatened his person. Dumouriez was bold enough to entertain such an idea; and having no longer any object in promoting the objects of the revolution by obtaining victories over its enemies, he meditated re-establishing the constitution of 1791, and reconciling France with Europe on these terms. According to this scheme it would be necessary to have a king, and as one man was to Dumouriez quite as good as another, therefore he gave himself little uneasiness on that subject. It was at that time imputed to him that he designed to place the house of Orleans on the throne. His affection for the Duke of Chartres, to whom he had assigned the most honourable post in his army, gave rise to this suspicion; but this affords very slight grounds of inference, for the duke merited all that he obtained, and nothing in his conduct proved him to be in concert with Dumouriez. Another consideration also weighed much in the public opinion, which was that no other choice than this would have been consistent with the idea of establishing a new dynasty. The king's son was too young, and besides, the regicide city could not become so quickly reconciled to the dethroned family. His uncles were in a state of hostility with France, and there remained, therefore, only the Orleans branch, who were as much implicated in the revolution as the Jacobins themselves, and who appeared alone capable of quieting all the fears of the revolutionists. If Dumouriez had fixed upon a choice, he could have made no other than this; and these considerations caused him to be accused of designing the elevation of the house of Orleans to the throne. He denied it to the emigration, but this interested denial proves nothing, and is no more worthy of credit than his assertion that his projects were of a very early date. He would in fact have declared, that he had long meditated the overthrow of the Jacobins, but this is false. It was not till now, that is to say, till one career of success was closed to him, that he thought of opening another. He was stimulated to this enterprise by personal resentment, and his military reverses; and finally by a sincere, though tardy indignation against those disorders, which he no longer regarded through a deceptive medium.

On the 22nd, he met Danton and Lacroix at Louvaine; they came to demand explanations of his letter of the 11th to the convention, which had hitherto been kept secret by the committee of general safety. Danton, with whom he was on terms of intimacy, hoped to appease his anger, and attach him to the common cause. But Dumouriez treated the two emissaries, and Danton himself, with much ill temper, and allowed them to discover his alienated sentiments. He reiterated his complaints against the convention and the Jacobins, and would not retract his letter. He merely consented to write a line, saying that he would shortly explain it. Danton and Lacroix departed without being able to obtain any further concession, and left him in the most violent agitation.

On the 23rd, after an animated resistance, which lasted during the whole day, many corps abandoned their posts, and he was obliged to quit Louvaine in disorder. Fortunately the enemy perceived nothing of this movement, and therefore did not so far profit by it as to complete the confusion of our army by pursuing our retreat. Dumouriez then separated the troops of the line from the volunteers, mingled the artillery among them, composed a body of picked men, fifteen thousand strong, to form the rear-guard, and placed himself at their head. There, by shewing himself in the midst of his soldiers, and familiarizing himself with them, he contrived to conduct his retreat in an orderly manner, and to retain no despicable appearance. He caused Brussels to be evacuated, passed through that city on the 25th, and encamped on the 27th at Ath. Here he held new conferences with Colonel Mack, who behaved towards him with the greatest delicacy and respect; and this interview, which had no other object than that of regulating the details of the armistice, was soon converted into a more important negotiation. Dumouriez communicated the state of his feelings to the foreign colonel, and disclosed to him his plans for overturning the national convention. Thus, the saviour of France at the Argonne, carried away by his passions, and highly excited at the self-generated idea of a general disorganization, tarnished his glory by treating with an enemy, whose ambition should have rendered his intentions suspected, and whose power was to us extremely formidable. There is but one alternative, as we have already said, for a great man when placed in a difficult situation, such as that of Dumouriez: either to retire, and resign all influence, in order to avoid being a participator in a system he disapproves; or else to separate himself from that evil which he cannot prevent, by undertaking an employment (distinct from all political considerations) which is always honourable and glorious—the defence of his country.

Dumouriez agreed with Colonel Mack that a suspension of hostilities should take place between the two armies; that the imperialists should not advance upon Paris, whilst he marched there himself; that the evacuation of Belgium should be the condition of this concession; that Condé should be temporarily given up as a guarantee; that if Dumouriez should need the assistance of the Austrians, they should be at his disposal; that the fortified towns of France should be garrisoned by an equal number of Imperialists and French, but under the command of French generals, and that at the peace all these places should be restored. Such were the culpable conditions entered into by Dumouriez with the Prince of Cobourg, through the intervention of Colonel Mack.

Nothing more was at this time known at Paris, than the defeat of Neerwinden, and the consequent evacuation of Belgium. The intelligence of the loss of a great battle, together with a precipitate retreat, arriving with the news which had been lately received from the west, greatly agitated the capital. A plot had also been discovered at Rennes, which appeared to have been laid by the English, the Breton nobility, and the non-juring priests. Insurrections had before broken out in the west, occasioned by the dearth of provisions, and by the threat which had been thrown out of no longer supporting the expenses of religious worship; but now the avowed object of these commotions was the restoration of an absolute monarchy. The peasants, assembling in large bodies, demanding the re-establishment of the clergy and the Bourbons, had assumed a very hostile attitude in the neighbourhood of Rennes and Nantes; Orleans was in a state of complete insurrection, and its representative, Bourdon, had hardly escaped being assassinated. The insurgents already amounted to many thousands; and nothing less than armies and generals were able to put them down. Many large towns sent off their national guards for this purpose; General Labourdonnaie advanced with his division, and every thing announced the approach of a most bloody civil war. Thus, on one side, our armies had to retire before the allies, and on the other, La Vendée rose in insurrection, while a general perturbation, and that never without greater cause, pervaded the nation from one extremity to the other.

After the 10th of March, the idea of uniting the two parties which divided the capital, for the purpose of coming to some mutual understanding, had been started. Danton was the author of this proposition. Having no personal resentments to gratify, and fearing an inquiry into his own conduct, which the bitterness of party quarrels tended to provoke, he was anxious to appease those animosities which retarded the progress of the revolution. He displayed the utmost frankness in the interviews which took place at his suggestion, and if he himself accused the Girondists, it was only to avoid those reproaches of which he might otherwise have been the object. The Girondists, that is, Buzot, Guadet, Vergniaud, and Gensonné, with their accustomed delicacy, justified themselves from his accusations as if they had been serious, but in arguing it with Danton they argued with one already persuaded of their innocence. It was not the same, however, with Robespierre; in their endeavours to convince him, the dispute became animated, and they pointed out to him all his errors, as if that had been likely to appease his hatred. As for Marat, although it was deemed necessary that he should take part in these conferences, no one deigned to give him any explanation, and even his friends, who felt themselves disgraced by such a colleague, studiously abstained from addressing him. These interviews, far from reconciling, only served to exasperate the two parties, and no other effect, indeed, could be expected from a reciprocal enumeration of the faults of both sides. Such was the situation of things when the events of Belgium became known at Paris.

Mutual recriminations immediately ensued. The Jacobins were reproached as occasioning all the calamities which happened, by throwing every thing into a state of disorder, and the reproach of relaxing the vigour of the government was retorted upon the Girondists. Explanations of the conduct of Dumouriez were loudly called for. His letter of the 12th of March was read: he was accused of treason; his conduct was compared with that of Lafayette, whose treason had been preceded by insolent letters addressed to the assembly. A second epistle, dated the 27th of March, which was even stronger than that of the 12th, rendered him still more suspected; and from all quarters, Danton was urged to explain the nature of his interviews with the general. It was generally known that these two characters entertained a mutual regard for each other; that Danton had insisted on keeping the letter of the 12th secret, and that he had set out for the army to obtain its retraction on the part of Dumouriez. It was even said that they had shared in the plunder of Belgium. Danton was called upon by the Jacobin club and the committee of general safety to explain himself. Embarrassed by the suspicions of the Girondists, and the doubts of the Mountain party, he experienced, for the first time, some difficulty in replying to these interrogatories; the great talents of Dumouriez, he said, merited much consideration; that it had been deemed necessary to see him personally before he was denounced as one disaffected to the republic, to point out his errors to him, and attach him by gentle means, if possible, to the interests of the commonwealth; that the emissaries of the assembly had hitherto seen nothing in his conduct but what was the natural effect of evil suggestions, and of the vexation occasioned by his late reverses; but that they thought, and still continued to think, that his talents might still be made serviceable to the revolution.

Robespierre replied that if this was the case, it was useless any longer to hold any terms with the general. He then renewed the motion which Louvet had before made against the Bourbons who remained in France, that is, against the members of the Orleans family; and it appeared strange that Robespierre, who had so stoutly defended them in January against the Girondists, should now attack them with so much fury; but his suspicions had suddenly suggested the existence of sinister conspiracies. "A former prince of the blood," said he, "cannot be truly resigned to his new situation; and although he may call himself Egalité (equality — antisacerdacy), he cannot be sincere in his professions. All our generals belong to him. Biron, who holds the command in the Alps, is his intimate friend. Valence, general of the army of Ardennes, is the son in-law of his confidant, Sillery; his two sons occupy the highest ranks in the army of Belgium; and Dumouriez is warmly attached to them, and takes a lively interest in their promotion. It is true the Girondists attacked the family of Orleans last January, but this attack was a mere feint, to banish suspicion from themselves. Brissot, the friend of Sillery, is the chief mediator in this conspiracy. The throne will be re-established, and France ruined, if the conspirators are not immediately proscribed." Such were the conjectures of Robespierre; and what was the most frightful of all in this line of reasoning was, that Robespierre gave credit to these calumnious ideas, which sprung from the innate hatred engendered in his own heart. The Mountain, utterly astounded, repelled his proposition. "Produce your proofs," said they. "I have no proofs," replied he, "but I have a moral conviction of the truth of what I assert." It was immediately settled, as indeed was always done in time of danger, that a new impetus should be given to the action of the executive power and of the criminal tribunals, in order to guard both against domestic and foreign foes.

The commissaries nominated to hasten the recruiting service were now despatched without further delay; and the question, whether the convention ought not to take a more active part in the creation of the laws, was discussed. The mode in which the executive power was organized appeared insufficient; there were the ministers, who had no seat in the assembly, acting under the superintendence of their leaders: a committee had been established to devise means of ensuring the general safety; but all these authorities mutually controlling each other, eternally deliberating, and acting inefficiently and partially, appeared very inadequate to the accomplishment of the immense task they had to fulfil; besides, this ministry and these committees were suspected on account of their moderation; and, at the present juncture, when promptitude and vigour were indispensably necessary to attain success, dilatoriness and a middle course of action were liable to the reproach of conspiracy. A committee, therefore, uniting the functions of the diplomatic and military committees, and of the committee of general safety, which might, according to circumstances, either command or act under its superior, and either retard or supply the action of the ministerial government, was sought to be established. Many projects for the organization of this committee were presented, and handed over to a commission authorized to examine them. The means of apprehending the interior foe, that is the aristocrats and the traitors, were then discussed. France, said everyone, is full of the nobility and the non-juring priesthood, of their old dependants and servants, and this class of retainers, as yet very numerous, entirely surrounds and betrays us, and threatens us with as much danger as the bayonets of the enemy. We must drag them forth into the light, and thus prevent them from doing us any harm. The Jacobins then proposed, and the convention decreed, that, in accordance with a custom originating in China, the names of all persons inhabiting the same house should be written on the door*. All suspected citizens were ordered to be disarmed, in which number were included all non-juring priests, all the nobility, the late lords of manors and seignories, dismissed public functionaries, &c. The disarming was to be executed by means of domiciliary visits, and the only alleviation to this measure was that these visits were not to take place at night. After having thus obtained the means of pursuing and apprehending, at a moment's notice, those who gave the least umbrage, the revolutionary tribunal was established, to strike them more effectually with terror, and to paralyze all their designs. This terrible instrument of suspicion was first adopted on the motion of Danton. This dreadful man, although he had anticipated its abuse, yet sacrificed everything to the attainment of his object. He was well aware that hasty condemnations always pre-suppose superficial examinations; that these, especially when party spirit runs high, are eminently liable to involve innocence and guilt in the same condemnation, and that atrocious injustice must be continually committed by mere mistake. But in his eyes, the revolution was an emblem of society in its height of noon, accelerating its action in justice, government, and war. "In times of tranquillity," said he, "society would prefer that the guilty should escape rather than that the innocent be punished, because the guilty are then not so dangerous; but as the danger increases, society also becomes more implacable; and when danger becomes so imminent as to threaten destruction, suspicion is considered as proof, and all are regarded as criminal whose conduct is in any degree equivocal. Such is the character of a dictatorship; it is rapid, arbitrary, indiscriminating, but irresistible."

Thus the concentration of supreme authority in the convention, the establishment of a revolutionary tribunal, the commencement of an inquisition against the suspected, and an increased malevolence against those deputies who opposed these measures, were the results of the battle of Neerwinden, of the retreat from Belgium, of the threatening acts of Dumouriez, and of the insurrections of La Vendée.

The ill-humour of the general increased with his reverses. He had just learnt that the army of Holland had retired in disorder, and had abandoned Antwerp and the Scheldt, leaving the two French garrisons in Breda and Gertruydenberg; that d'Harville had not been able to keep the citadel of Namur, and had been obliged to fall back on Givet and Maubeuge; and finally, that Neilly, far from being able to maintain himself at Mons, had been forced to retire towards Condé and Valenciennes, because his division, instead of taking their position on the heights of Nimy, had pillaged the stores and taken to flight. Thus by the disorders of that army, he found that his plan of forming in Belgium a semicircle of strong places from Namur to Flanders and Holland, became perfectly impracticable. In a short time he had nothing to offer as an exchange of concessions to the Imperialists, and as his resources became weaker, he daily became more dependant on the enemy. His irritation increased as he approached France, where he beheld the general disorganization of society more nearly, and heard the expressions of indignation which were vented against him. He no longer concealed his designs, and his words spoken in the presence of his staff, and repeated throughout the army, made what was passing in his mind clear to all. The sister of the Duke of Orleans, and Madame Sillery, flying from the proscriptions which menaced them, had come into Belgium, to seek protection near their brothers. They were now at Ath; and this circumstance afforded fresh cause for suspicion.

Three Jacobin envoys, Dubuisson, a Brussels refugee; Froly, a natural son of Kaunitz; and Percyra, a Portuguese Jew, proceeded to Ath, under the pretext, were it false or true, of being entrusted with the execution of a commission from Lebrun. They visited the general in the assumed character of government spies, and had no difficulty in discovering those projects which he took no pains to conceal. They found him in company with Valence and the sons of the Duke of Orleans, were very badly received, and heard a conversation by no means complimentary to the Jacobins and the convention. On the next day, however, they returned, and obtained a private interview. Dumouriez now entirely threw off the mask. He began by declaring that he was strong enough to combat his foes both in front and in rear; that the convention was composed of two hundred brigands and six hundred fools; that he scorned at their decrees, and that their force would not extend beyond the precincts of Paris. "As to the revolutionary tribunal," added he, with increasing indignation, "I will overthrow it from its base; whilst I carry a sword by my side, that horrible thing shall never exist." He then broke out against the volunteers, whom he called cowards; said that he would have none others but the troops of the line, and with those he would soon put an end to the disorders of Paris.—"Do you not desire the establishment of a constitution?" asked one of the envoys.—"The new one imagined by Condorcet, is a master-piece of folly."—"But what would you substitute in its place?"—"That of 1791, bad as it is."—"But then a king would be necessary, and the name of Louis is execrated."—"It signifies little what he is called, Louis or John."—"Or Philip," replied one of the envoys.—"But how would you replace the present assembly?" Dumouriez considered for a moment, and then added, "there are local administrations all chosen by and with express confidence of the nation, and the five hundred district presidents should be the five hundred national representatives." "But before they meet, who could do the first act towards effecting this revolution?"—"The Mamelukes; that is to say, my army. They will express this wish, the district presidents will confirm it, and I shall make peace with the allies, who, if I prevent it not, will be in Paris in fifteen days."

The three envoys, who either, as Dumouriez thought, wished to sound him as to his dispositions towards the Jacobins, or were desirous of making him discover his projects still further, suggested to him another idea. "Why not," said they, "put the Jacobins, who are a deliberating body already assembled, in the place of the convention?" Expressions of indignation mingled with astonishment broke from the general in reply to this hint, and they withdrew their proposition. They then spoke of the danger to which his design would expose the Bourbons who were imprisoned in the Temple, and in whose fate he appeared to interest himself. "If the whole and the last member of the family, both at Paris and Coblenz, were to perish," replied Dumouriez, "France would not have to seek a sovereign (un chef), and would be saved; and for the rest, he declared that if Paris committed fresh barbarities against the unfortunate captives in the Temple, he should be there immediately with twelve thousand men, and would soon render himself master of the city. "I shall not imitate," said he, "the imbecility of Broglic, who with thirty thousand men, allowed the Bastille to be taken; but, taking up two posts, at Nogent and Pont-Sainte-Maxence, I will cause the Parisians to die with hunger. Your Jacobins may then expiate all their crimes; if they spare the unfortunate prisoners, and drive the seven hundred and forty tyrants from the assembly, they shall be pardoned."

The envoys then spoke of the dangers which threatened himself. "I shall always have time," said he, "to gallop towards the Austrians."—"You then wish to partake of the fate of Lafayette." "I shall pass over to the enemy with a very different character from his; besides, foreign powers have another opinion of my talents, and they have not to reproach me with the events of the 5th and 6th of October."

Dumouriez indeed had no reason to fear a similar fate to that of Lafayette; his talents were too great, and the firmness of his principles were in too little credit, to entitle him to an honourable captivity at Olmutz. The three envoys quitted him, saying, they would sound Paris and the Jacobins on this subject.

Dumouriez, although he believed these envoys to be pure Jacobins, had not the less boldly expressed his sentiments on that account. His designs were now evident; the troops of the line and the volunteers regarded each other with suspicion, and every thing predicated that the standard of revolt was about to be raised.

The executive council having received these alarming accounts, a decree was passed on the suggestion of the committee of general safety, summoning Dumouriez to the bar of the assembly. Four emissaries, accompanied by the minister at war, were ordered to set out for the army, to communicate this decree to the general, and to bring him to Paris. These emissaries were Bancal, Quinette, Camus, and Lamarque. To these Beurnonville was added, and the part he had to act was very difficult, on account of his intimate friendship with Dumouriez.

This commission left Paris on the 30th of March. On the same day Dumouriez removed to the camp at Bruille, whence he threatened at the same time three important places, Lille, Condé, and Valenciennes. He was very doubtful what part to take, for his army were much divided in opinion. The artillery, the troops of the line, the cavalry, and all the disciplined regiments, appeared devoted to him; but the national volunteers began to murmur, and to separate themselves from the other corps. In this situation, there was only one thing to be done; to disarm the volunteers; but this exposed him to a dubious combat, for the troops of the line might feel some repugnance to slaughtering their companions in arms; beside, among these volunteers, some had fought with great intrepidity, and appeared strongly attached to him. Hesitating to attempt this rigorous measure, he determined to seize on the three places, in the centre of which he had now taken his position. By them he was enabled to obtain live stock, and they afforded him support against that enemy he most dreaded. But the public opinion was very much divided in these three places. The popular societies, aided by the volunteers, had risen up against him, and threatened the troops of the line. At Valenciennes and Lille, the emissaries of the convention busily stirred up the zeal of the republicans, and in Condé only, the influence of the division of Neuilly gave the advantage to his partisans. Among the generals of the divisions Dampierre behaved towards him, as he himself had towards Lafayette after the 10th of August; and many others who had not yet openly avowed their sentiments, were ready to desert him.

On the 31st, six volunteers, having the words republic or death, inscribed with chalk upon their caps, made towards his tent, and pretended even that they designed to seize on his person. Aided by his faithful Baptiste, he repelled them, and gave them over to the vengeance of his hussars. This event caused a great sensation in the army; but several corps sent him, in the course of the day, addresses which revived his confidence, and he immediately raised the standard, and detached Miaczinsky, with several thousand men, to march upon Lille. Miaczinsky advanced towards this place, and confided to the mulatto Saint George, who commanded a regiment of the garrison, the secret of the enterprise. This latter persuaded him to enter the city with a small escort. The unfortunate general suffered himself to be drawn into this act, and the moment he entered Lille, he was apprehended and given up to the authorities. The gates were closed, and the division remained without a commandant on the glacis of Lille. Dumouriez immediately despatched an aid de-camp to rally them. But he also was taken, and the troops dispersed. After this fruitless attempt, he tried a similar one on Valenciennes, where general Ferrand commanded, whom he believed inclined to favour him. But the officer who was ordered to surprise the place betrayed him, and joined Ferrand and the emissaries of the convention, and thus Valenciennes was also lost. Condé only now remained; being situated between France and the enemy's territory, this was his last support, and if he failed to capture it, he must necessarily submit to the Imperialists, throw himself entirely into their hands, and expose himself to the indignation of the army, by uniting them with the allied troops.

On the 1st of April, he removed his head-quarters to the low grounds of Saint Amand, for the purpose of approaching nearer to Condé. He arrested the son of Lecointre, the deputy of Versailles, and sent him as an hostage to Tournay, requesting Clerfait the Austrian to keep him prisoner in the citadel. On the evening of the 2nd, the four deputies of the convention, preceded by Beurnonville, arrived at the head-quarters of Dumouriez. The hussars of Berchiny were drawn up before his door, and he was surrounded by all his staff. Dumouriez first embraced his friend Beurnonville, then required of the deputies the object of their mission. They refused to explain themselves before the train of officers, whose appearance was rather formidable, and expressed a desire to retire to an adjoining apartment. Dumouriez consented, but his officers insisted that the door should remain open. Camus then read the decree, and enjoined him to submit thereto. He replied, that the state of his army required his presence, and that when it should be perfectly re-organized, he should see what was to be done. Camus insisted peremptorily; but Dumouriez answered that he was not such a simpleton as to go to Paris, and give himself up to the revolutionary tribunal; that the tigers wanted his head, which he had no mind to give them. The emissaries in vain assured him that nothing of this kind was meditated against him; that they would answer for his safety, that his compliance would satisfy the convention, and that he would be soon restored to the army. Dumouriez turned a deaf ear to their solicitations, begged them not to drive him to the adoption of an extreme measure, and advised them to make a discretionary report, by which they might declare that the general Dumouriez had appeared too necessary to his troops to permit them to separate him from them. Saying these words, he begged them to come immediately to their decision. He then passed into the other apartment with Beurnonville, where he found his staff, and awaited in the midst of them the resolution of the commissaries of the convention. The latter, with undaunted firmness, quitted the apartment immediately after, and repeated to him their summons. "Will you obey the assembly?" said Camus. "No," replied the general. "Well, then," resumed Camus, "you are suspended from your functions, your papers will be immediately seized, and your person arrested." "This is too much," exclaimed Dumouriez; "here, hussars!" The hussars rushed in. "Arrest these gentlemen," said he, in German, "but do them no injury." Beurnonville begged to share their fate. "Yes," replied Dumouriez, "and in this I consider that I render you a great service, by snatching you from the revolutionary tribunal."

He then offered them refreshments, and despatched them immediately afterwards to Tournay, to be kept as hostages by the Austrians. On the morning of the next day, he mounted his horse, and made a proclamation to the army and to France, and observed in his soldiers, and especially in the troops of the line, apparently the most favourable dispositions.

The news of these events arrived successively at Paris. His interview with Proly, Dubuisson, and Pereyra was known, and also his attempts upon Lille and Valenciennes, and finally, the arrest of the four commissaries. The convention, the municipal assemblies, and the popular associations immediately declared their sittings permanent, a price was put on the head of Dumouriez, all the relations of the officers in his army were arrested to serve as hostages, the levy of forty thousand men for the protection of the capital was ordered, and Dampierre received the command of the army of Belgium. These vigorous measures were accompanied, as usual, by reciprocal abuse. Dumouriez and the Orleans family were supposed to be united in the same conspiracy, and the Girondists were considered as accomplices. Dumouriez, it was said, was one of those military aristocrats, who belonged to the old staff establishment, whose disaffected principles were ever the topic of animadversion; Orleans was declared to be the first of the great who had feigned a love for liberty, and who now threw off the mask, after having borne it for years; the Girondists, finally, were represented as deputies who had become faithless, as all members of the right side had ever been, and who abused their functions for the destruction of liberty. Dumouriez had only done at last what Lafayette and Bouillé had done at first; Orleans had followed the steps of all the other members of the Bourbon family, and had only held out his feigned attachment to the revolution a little longer than the Count of Provence; and the Girondists, like Maury and Cazalès, in the constituent, and like Pastoret in the legislative assembly, had betrayed their country by the same line of conduct, but only at different periods. Thus Dumouriez, Orleans, Brissot, Vergniaud, Guadet, and Gensonné were all considered either the traitors or accomplices in treason for the time being.

The Girondists replied by maintaining that they had always been opposed to Orleans; that it was the Mountaineers who had defended him; that they had always been on terms of disagreement with Dumouriez, and had not been connected with him; and that, on the contrary, those who had been sent to him in Belgium, those who had followed him in all his expeditions, those who had always shown themselves his friends, and who still endeavoured to palliate his conduct, were the Mountaineers. Lasource, carrying his boldness still further, was imprudent enough to point out Laëroix and Danton, and to accuse them of having damped the zeal of the convention, by disguising the conduct of the general. This reproach revived the suspicion which had been before awakened by the behaviour of Laëroix and Danton in Belgium. It was actually said that they had entered into a mutual engagement of forbearance with Dumouriez; that he had connived at their rapine, and that they had excused his defection. Danton, who required nothing of the Girondists but silence, rendered furious by this accusation, sprung to the tribune and declared mortal and implacable war against them. "There can be no longer either peace or truce between us and you," exclaimed he; then, his frightful countenance becoming still more terrific by the agitation of passion, and shaking his fist at the right side of the assembly: "I have entrenched myself," said he, "in the citadel of reason; I will sally forth from it with the cannon of truth, and shall pulverise those wretches who have dared to accuse me."

The result of these reciprocal accusations was, 1st. The nomination of a committee, to examine the conduct of the envoys sent into Belgium; 2nd. The adoption of a decree, calculated to produce fatal consequences, which decided, regardless of the inviolability of the representatives, that they might be brought to trial when any strong presumption existed of their being accomplices with the enemies of the state; and finally, the arrest of Philip of Orleans and all his family, and their confinement in the prisons of Marseilles*. Thus, this prince, the football of all parties, alternately suspected by each, and accused of conspiring with all, because he conspired with none, afforded a striking proof that no living monument of bygone grandeur could possibly exist in the face of the present revolution, and that however deep or voluntary his abasement, it was insufficient to quiet suspicion, or elude the scaffold.

Dumouriez felt that he had not a moment to lose; seeing Dampierre and many other generals of the division abandon him, several waiting only for a favourable opportunity to do the same, and, finally, a crowd of emissaries tampering with his troops, he determined immediately to put them in motion, in order to attach both officers and soldiers to him by active service, and to take them out of the reach of any influence but his own. Besides, he was critically situated, and a delay might be fatal. He therefore appointed an interview with the Prince of Cobourg for the morning of the 4th, that he might definitively settle with him and Colonel Mack the operations which he meditated. This interview was to take place near Condé. His scheme was to take immediate possession of this city, to expel all the disaffected from the garrison, and then, marching with all his army upon Orchies, to threaten Lille, and attempt its reduction by a display of all his forces.

On the morning of the 4th, he accordingly set out for the place of rendezvous, to proceed thence to Condé. He had only ordered an escort of a troop, fifty strong, of cavalry to attend him, and as they did not arrive sufficiently early, he started without them, leaving orders that they should immediately follow him. Thouvenot, the son of the Duke of Orleans, a few officers, and some attendants, accompanied him. But scarcely had he reached the road to Condé, when, to his astonishment, he met two battalions of volunteers. Not having commanded their removal from quarters, he dismounted, to enter a neighbouring house, to write an order for their return; but scarcely had he put his foot to the ground, when shouts and firing commenced from the armed multitude. The battalions divided; the one body pursuing him, crying out, Stop him! and the other endeavouring to cut off his flight towards a ditch. He instantly galloped off with those who accompanied him, and got ahead of the volunteers, who were pursuing him as hard as they could. Being arrived at the banks of the ditch, and his horse refusing to leap it, he flung himself in, climbed the other bank, in the midst of a shower of shot, and accepting the horse of a servant, set off at full gallop towards Bury. After a rapid flight during the whole day, he arrived there in the evening, and was joined by Colonel Mack, who had been informed of what had passed. He sat up writing the whole night, agreed to all the conditions of Colonel Mack and the Prince of Cobourg respecting their alliance, and astonished them by proposing to return to his army after what had happened.

In fact, that very morning, he remounted his horse, and, accompanied by some imperial cavalry, re-entered Maulde, and was again in the midst of his army. Some of the troops of the line immediately surrounded him, and gave him the most lively demonstrations of attachment; yet many faces looked very grave. The news of his flight to Bury into the arms of the enemy, and the sight of the imperial dragoons, produced impressions unfortunate for him, but honourable to our soldiers, and favourable for the fortune of France. He was informed that the artillery, on the news of his having gone over to the Austrians, had quitted the camp, and the retreat of this influential portion of the army had discouraged the rest. Entire divisions had fled to Valenciennes, and rallied round the standard of Dampierre. He was, therefore, obliged to abandon his army, and return to the imperialists. He was followed by a numerous staff, in which were the sons of the Duke of Orleans, and Thouvenot, and by the whole regiment of the hussars of Berchiny, the whole of which regiment insisted on accompanying him.

The Prince of Cobourg and Colonel Mack, with whom he had by this time contracted a friendship, treated him with the greatest consideration, and wished to renew their projects with him, by making him the chief of a new emigration of a very different character from that of Coblenz. But, after two days' reflection, he told the Austrian prince that it was with French soldiers, accepting of the imperialists only as auxiliaries, that he had designed to execute his projects against Paris; but that, as a Frenchman, he could not consent to put himself at the head of foreigners; and he demanded passports to retire into Switzerland. These were given him; and the great notion that was entertained of his talents, and the light estimation in which his political principles were held, procured for him that consideration which the virtues of Lafayette, who now reaped the reward of his patriotism in the dungeons of Olmutz, could not obtain. Thus ended the career of this extraordinary man, who had displayed every kind of talent; that of a diplomatist, a statesman, and a warrior; and civil as well as military courage, braving equally the storms of faction and the perils of war, defending himself in the most desperate situations, and undertaking the most hazardous enterprises; but without principle, possessing no moral elevation, exercising no influence but that of genius, which, in the rapid succession of events, talents, and renowned characters which this epoch produced, soon lost its power, and ceased to attract or to astonish. Such was the character who had entered into a contest with the revolution, and who proved, by a striking example, that no individual, however powerful, can prevail against a national passion till it becomes exhausted. In going over to the enemy, Dumouriez had not for his excuse the aristocratic wilfulness of Bouillé, or the highmindedness of principle which characterized Lafayette, for he had tolerated all disorders till they thwarted his private views. By his defection, he certainly had to accuse himself of having accelerated the fall of the Girondists, and hurried on the grand revolutionary crisis; yet it should not be forgotten that this man, without being attached strongly to any one cause, preferred that of liberty from choice; it must not be forgotten that he had a tender affection for France; and that when the whole nation believed it impossible to resist foreign powers, he tried the experiment, and was himself more confident in our ability than even ourselves; that at Saint Menes, he taught us to confront an enemy with cool courage; that at Jemappes he stimulated us by aspirations for military glory, and restored us to our rank among the greatest nations; and, lastly, it must never be forgotten, that if he did ultimately abandon us, he also had saved us. Besides, he spent his old age in melancholy retirement, far from his country*; and it is impossible to help regretting that of the life of such a man, fifty years should have passed in the intrigues of a court, thirty in exile, and only three in a manner worthy of his transcendent genius.

Dampierre received the command in chief of the army of the north, and entrenched himself in the camp of Famars, so as to guard those of our fortresses which were exposed to the enemy. The strength of this position, as well as the plan itself of the campaign, as designed by the allies, according to which they had determined not to advance further till Mayence should be taken, necessarily retarded the course of the war in this quarter. Custine, who, to excuse his own errors, ceased not to blame the other generals and the ministers, was favourably heard when speaking against Bournonville, who was regarded as an accomplice of Dumouriez, although given up by him to the Austrians; and he obtained a wide command, from the Rhine, the Vosges, and the Moselle, as far as Huningen. As the defection of Dumouriez had commenced by negotiations, the penalty of death was denounced against any general who should listen to the propositions of an enemy, without making him previously acknowledge the sovereignty of the people and the French republic. Bouchotte was then appointed minister of war, and Monge, although very popular with the Jacobins on account of his complying disposition, was displaced as incapable of fulfilling the multiplied duties of his office. It was besides determined that three envoys of the convention should remain constantly with the armies, and that one of them should be renewed every month.

THEIR PRINCIPAL LEADERS.

THE defection of Dumouriez, the unfortunate state of our armies, and the imminent danger to which the revolution, nay the country itself was exposed, induced, as a matter of sheer necessity, all those violent measures which we are about to relate, and compelled the convention at last to occupy itself with the consideration of the oft renewed scheme of communicating more vigour to the action of the government, by concentrating all its power in the convention. After considering several plans, the assembly adopted that which proposed the constitution of a committee of the Public welfare*, composed of nine members. This committee was to deliberate in secret. Its office was to superintend and subsequently of twelve, was installed the 1st of June, 1793. Under the immediate direction of Robespierre's party, it contrived to concentrate every species of power and authority within itself: in fact, it exercised dictatorial authority from the fall of the Dantonists to the 9th Thermidor.

The Committee of the General Safety operated as an Auxiliary to the Committee of the Public Welfare, in administrative details and matters of lesser importance.

After the 9th Thermidor, the Convention organised sixteen government committees, each independent of the other. The Committee of the Public Welfare, whose duties were limited to diplomatic and military operations; the Committee of the General Safety, charged with the high police; and fourteen others, among which several branches of the administration were allotted, such as the Finance Committee, the Legislative Committee, the Educational Committee, the Agricultural Committee, &c.

Besides these, at different stages of the revolution were committees of which mention has already been made, whose functions were of a temporary character, and whose power was exhausted by the performance of almost single acts, or by the organization of particular measures. Such were the Committee of Electors, who merged in the commune shortly after the destruction of the Bastille, who organized the national guard. The Insurrectional Committee, and the Central Revolutionary Committee, self-composed associations of factious anarchists, who methodized popular tumults and insurrections in aid of the dominant Jacobinical party.

The term "Committee" was also conferred either in derision or opprobrium upon meetings or associations in the nature of clubs (ante, p. 75, note). Such was the committee which the Jacobins accused the Queen of presiding over at the Tuilleries, as having for its object a correspondence with the Emperor of Austria, her brother, and termed the Austrian Committee, &c. &c. Trans.

* It may not be amiss to notice some of the names and objects of the numerous associations either of a political or administrative character termed Committees, which distinguished the revolution, and the mention of which so frequently occur. Committees of government (comités de gouvernement) were formed by selecting from the body of the assembly certain members who were to make inquiry and report upon the expediency of proposed laws or measures, and this general definition of a committee applies particularly to those committees charged with various branches of the administration, and possessing greater or lesser authority in respect of the objects of their appointment. After the defection of Dumouriez, (April, 1793,) as related in the preceding chapter, the convention delegated the supreme administration of the affairs of the nation, whether home or foreign, to two government committees, known by the names of The Committee of the Public Welfare, and The Committee of the General Safety. The object of the Committee of the Public Welfare is stated in the text, as providing for the defence of the republic by prompt and energetic measures. It was to superintend and accelerate the motions of the executive power, and possessed a general control over all the other committees. This Committee of the Public Welfare, originally composed of nine members, and accelerate the action of the executive power, and it might even suspend the orders of the latter if deemed contrary to the public welfare, informing the convention, at the same time, of this suspension. It was empowered further, in cases of great urgency, to take measures of exterior and interior defence, and resolutions signed by the majority of its members were to be executed immediately by the executive power. Its existence was limited to one month, and its warrant of arrest was not to be issued but against those who personally committed the act complained of*.

Barrère, Delmas, Bréard, Cambon, Jean Debry, Danton, Guithon, Morveaux, Treillard, and Lacroix d'Eure-et-Loir†, were nominated members of this committee, which though yet somewhat limited in its power, possessed an overpowering influence. It corresponded with all the commissaries of the convention, gave them instructions, and might substitute for the measures of the ministry any others it might be pleased to imagine. By means of Cambon it possessed a control over the finances, and with Danton it acquired the audacity and influence of this powerful party chief. Thus, as the danger increased, rapid strides were made towards an absolute dictatorship.

Recovered from the terror which the desertion of Dumouriez had occasioned, each party began again to impute to each other a privy with his treasons, and the strongest necessarily obtained the mastery over the more feeble. The sections, and the popular societies, who always commenced every attack, now took the lead, and accused the Girondists in various petitions and addresses.

There had been formed, on the principles of Marat, a new association still more violent than any which had hitherto existed. Marat had said that up to this time there had been nothing but mere babble upon the subject of the sovereignty of the people, but that if the doctrine were well understood, every section would be sovereign within the limits of its district, and could, at its pleasure, revoke the powers it had given. The most turbulent of the agitators, acting upon this doctrine, pretended that they had been deputed by their sections, to ascertain how this power was used, and to consult upon measures of public safety. They assembled at L'Evêché, and declared themselves authorized to correspond with all the municipalities of the republic. They called themselves, the central committee of public safety, and from this association the most seditious propositions emanated; they resolved to present themselves in a body before the assembly, and demand what were their means of saving the country. They had already attracted the observation of the convention, and also drew upon themselves that of the commune and the Jacobins. Robespierre, who undoubtedly looked forward to the result of that insurrection which soon took place, but who always dreaded the use of such an engine, and who always experienced terror upon the eve of any outbreak, inveighed against the violent resolutions which were passed in these inferior debating clubs, and persisted in his favourite line of policy, which consisted in defaming those whom he denominated faithless deputies, and ruining them in the public opinion, before he employed any more decisive measures against them. Ready to accuse, he feared physical force, and preferred verbal contentions and the conflicts of the galleries to insurrections, as by them he obtained honour without running any danger. Marat, who courted the praise of moderation, complained, as others did, of the association of L'Evêché, although he had furnished them with their principles of action. Commissaries were sent to ascertain whether its members were men stimulated by an immoderate zeal for the cause of the revolution, or hired disturbers of the public peace. Being assured that they were patriots carried away by an extravagant zeal, the society, instead of excluding them, as had been proposed, merely took a list of their names, and expressed a public disapprobation of their conduct, as, according to the Jacobins, there should be no other centre of public safety than their own club. It was in precisely the same manner that the insurrection of the 10th of August had been concocted and previously condemned; and all those who were too timorous to act boldly, or sorry to see their own designs anticipated, disapproved of these first attempts, whilst they desired the result they had in view. Danton alone preserved a profound silence on this subject, and neither disavowed his connexion with, or disapproved of the proceedings of these agitators. He was not fond of seeking a triumph in the tribune by long accusations, but preferred the means of action, which in his hands possessed enormous strength, he being the most turbulent and reckless mob-leader in all Paris. Yet after all it was not positively known that he was secretly concerned in the insurrection, but his silence gave rise to suspicions.

Many sections condemned the association of L'Evêché; and that of Mail addressed an energetic petition to the convention on this subject. The section of Bonne-Nouvelle, on the contrary, read an address to the assembly, in which Brissot, Vergniaud, Guadet, and Gensonné, &c. were accused as the accomplices of Dumouriez, and in this address it was required that they should be stricken by the sword of justice. After tumultuous debates, the petitioners received the thanks of the assembly; but it was declared, that, in future, it would not hear accusations against its members, but that charges of this description should be laid before the committee of public safety.

The section of the Corn-Market, which was remarkable for its violence, prepared, under the presidency of Marat, a new petition, and sent it to the Jacobins, the sections, and the commune, to receive their approbation, that it might be finally presented by the mayor to the convention. In this petition, which was hawked about from place to place, and publicly exhibited everywhere, it was declared that part of the convention was corrupt, that some of its members were the accomplices of the monopolists and of Dumouriez, and that their places ought to be vacated, and filled by others. On the 10th of April, whilst this petition was circulating from section to section, Pétion, indignant at what was passing, demanded liberty to address the assembly. He expressed himself with a vehemence which was very unusual with him against the calumnies which were levelled against part of the convention, and demanded the adoption of measures of repression. Danton, on the contrary, made honourable mention of the petition which was preparing. Pétion, revolted by this commendation, required that its authors should be given up to the revolutionary tribunal. Danton replied again, that faithful representatives, strong in conscientious rectitude, had no reason to fear defamation; that in a republic, it was impossible to prevent it, and that as yet neither the Austrians had been defeated, or a constitution settled, and that consequently it was very doubtful whether the convention had merited eulogium. He insisted that the assembly should no longer give its attention to private quarrels; but that those who felt themselves aggrieved should apply to the legal tribunals. The question was then dismissed; but, being renewed again by Foulfrède, it was again put aside. Robespierre, delighting in personal discussions, reproduced it once more, and demanded permission to unmask the enemies of the state. His request was granted, and he commenced a more malignant and infamous defamation of the Girondists than he had ever before indulged in. We must take a brief notice of his speech, which exhibits the colours in which the conduct of his enemies appeared to his dark and disordered intellect*.

According to him, there existed besides the aristocracy of the great who were driven out in 1789, a civic aristocracy as haughty and despotic as the former, whose treasons had succeeded to those of the nobility. A thorough revolution did not suit this party, but they desired a king, and the constitution of 1791, to secure their own domination. The Girondists were the leaders of this aristocracy. Under the legislative assembly they had seized on the ministry by means of Roland, Clavière, and Servan; having lost these posts, they sought to avenge themselves by the events of the 20th of June; and on the eve of the 10th of August, they had treated with the court, offering to make peace on the condition of being restored to power. On the 10th, they had contented themselves with suspending the king, and shunned the abolition of royalty, and appointed a governor for the young prince; they then seized again on the ministry, and calumniated the commune, to deprive it of all influence, and to attain to an exclusive domination. On the formation of the convention they had, in like manner, obtained an ascendancy over all the committees, and continued to defame Paris, representing that city as the source and centre of all crimes, perverting the public opinion by means of their journals, and by the immense sums which Roland had devoted to the distribution of the most pernicious publications; and, finally, that, in January, they had opposed the execution of the tyrant, not from any attachment to his person, but from a love of royalty. "This faction," continued Robespierre, "is the sole cause of the disastrous war which now afflicts us. It has been their desire to expose us to the invasion of Austria, who promised a congress in conjunction with the civic constitution of 1791. This war has been conducted by the most perfidious counsels, and after having employed the traitor Lafayette, this faction has availed itself of the traitor Dumouriez, all for the purpose of accomplishing that object it has so long aimed at. This faction at first feigned to be at variance with Dumouriez, but this was a mere subterfuge; for otherwise it would not have given him the ministry by means of his friend Gensonné, and would not have allowed him six millions of francs for secret service money." That Dumouriez had conspired with this faction, to allow the Prussians to escape in the Argonne, when he might have destroyed them; in Belgium, it was true, he said, that he had gained a great victory, but a great victory was indispensable before he could obtain confidence, which, being once obtained, he had abused in every possible manner; that he had not invaded Holland, which he might have occupied from the commencement of the first campaign; that he had hindered the union of the conquered territory with France, and that the diplomatic committee, in concert with him, had neglected nothing to alienate the Belgian deputies who demanded that union. Those envoys of the executive power whom Dumouriez had so harshly treated, because they had been severe upon the Belgians, had been every one of them chosen by the Girondists, who had previously determined to send disorganizers into Belgium, against whom they might have an opportunity of inveighing, that they might thus throw disgrace upon the cause of republicanism. Dumouriez having, after many delays, attacked Holland, returned into Belgium, and lost the battle of Neerwinden; and that it was Miranda, the friend and creature of Pétion, who by his retreat had completed his defeat. Returning then into France, the general had raised the standard of revolt, at the very moment when insurrections in support of royalty took place in the west. Every thing was prepared to render these simultaneous attempts successful. A perfidious minister had been nominated to the war department for this very purpose; the committee of general safety had been composed entirely of Girondists, except seven or eight faithful deputies who never attended its consultations, and it had done nothing to ward off the dangers which threatened, whilst nothing had been neglected to insure the success of the conspiracy. As to the reinstating of a king, all the generals belonged to the Egalité family; his family had ranged themselves round Dumouriez; his sons, his daughter, and even the intriguing Sillery had fled to him for protection. This general commenced his treasons by a manifesto, and what does he say? Precisely what the writers and orators of the Girondist faction declare in their journals and speeches; that the convention is composed of wretches, with the exception of a few members; that Paris is a centre of every crime, and that the Jacobins are the subverters of society, the propagators of disorders, and the fomenters of civil war, &c.

Such was the construction which Robespierre put on the defection of Dumouriez, and the opposition of the Girondists. After having drawn out at length this arid tissue of calumnies, he proposed sending all the accomplices of Dumouriez, all the Orleans family, and all their friends, to the revolutionary tribunal. "As to the deputies Guadet, Gensonné, Vergniaud, &c., it would," said he, "be sacrilege to accuse such honest gentlemen; I feel my own impotence against them, and I therefore leave them to the wisdom of the assembly."

The galleries and the Mountain applauded this virtuous orator. The Girondists were indignant at his infamous conduct, in which a perfidious rancour of heart had as great a share as an habitual suspicion; for he had in this speech artfully connected distinct facts, to obviate all objections: indeed, Robespierre displayed more ability in this base and cowardly accusation than in his ordinary declamations. Vergniaud, oppressed with contending emotions, rushed to the tribune, and demanded the liberty of reply with so much warmth, energy, and resolution, that it was granted him, and even the galleries and the Mountain desisted at last from interrupting him. To the laboured charges of Robespierre he replied by an unpremeditated harangue, which glowed with all the animation and eloquence of innocence.

"I have no hesitation," said he; "nor shall I employ either time or art in replying to M. Robespierre, for I seek only to give vent to the emotions of my soul; neither shall I speak with a view chiefly to my own defence, for I know that in revolutionary times the very refuse of mankind frequently domineer over the most noble and upright; but my principal object is to enlighten France. My voice, which has frequently carried terror into the palaces of princes, and precipitated tyranny to the dust, shall also strike with consternation the consciences of those reprobate villains who desire to substitute their own despotism for that of royalty."

He then replied to every imputation of Robespierre, what every one who confined himself to a narration of the simple facts might have done. He had, he said, by his speech in July, first started the idea of the dethronement. A little before the 10th of August, doubting the success of the meditated insurrection, and not knowing whether it really would take place, he had intimated to a messenger of the court the steps which were necessary on the part of the king to reconcile himself with the nation, and to save the country. On the 10th, he had sat in the assembly amidst the roar of artillery, whilst M. Robespierre lay hid in a cellar; he had not then pronounced for the dethronement, because the pending combat was still doubtful; and he had proposed nominating a governor for the Dauphin, because, in case royalty should have survived the present struggle, a good education given to the young prince would have tended to secure the future welfare of France. He and his friends had caused the declaration of war to be made, as it had already commenced, and it was better to announce it openly and assume an attitude of defence, than to suffer it passively. He and his friends had also obtained the ministry, and been nominated to the committees by the public voice. In the commission of twenty one in the legislative assembly, they had opposed the idea of their quitting of Paris, and had prepared those means of defence which had been so successfully employed in the forest of the Argonne. In the committee of general safety of the convention, they had been unremittingly assiduous in their labours, and in the face of their colleagues, who might have afforded them assistance. As for Robespierre, he had altogether deserted the committee, and had never made his appearance there. They had not calumniated Paris, but had fought against those assassins who usurped the name of Parisians, and dishonoured Paris as well as the republic; they had not perverted public opinion; that, for his own part, he had never written a single letter, and those which Roland had published were well known to every one. He and his friends had proposed an appeal to the people in the proceedings against Louis XVI., because they believed that in a question so important, the national consent could not be dispensed with. As for himself, he scarcely knew Dumouriez, and had never seen him but twice; on his first return from the Argonne, and on his second return from Belgium; but that Danton and Santerre visited, congratulated, and caressed him with the most prodigal demonstrations of attachment, and invited him to dine at their houses every day. As to Egalité, he was equally unacquainted with him: the Mountainers alone were his friends; and whenever the Girondists attacked him, the Mountainers as constantly took up his defence. What, therefore, could be brought against him and his friends? Were they intriguers and conspirators? How happened it, then, that they did not frequent the sections, and throw them into agitation by inflammatory discourses? that they did not fill the galleries with their partisans, to carry their decrees by terror? that they had never wished to apprehend the ministers in those assemblies of which they were members?—or were they moderates? They were not so on the 10th of August, when Robespierre and Marat hid themselves; but they were so in September, when the prisoners were assassinated and the 'Garde-Meuble' pillaged!

"You know," said Vergniaud in conclusion, "that I have borne with silence the bitter calumnies of which I have been the object for the last six months; that I have sacrificed the most just resentments upon the altar of my country; that I have, though exposed to the reproach of cowardice, though by my forbearance I might be thought tacitly to acknowledge myself guilty, though I thus denied myself the performance of some of those small services I am still permitted to render to the nation, you know that I have avoided bringing all the flagitious falsehoods of Robespierre into the broad light of truth. May this day be the last which we throw away in such scandalous and disgraceful debates!" Vergniaud then demanded that the section of the Corn-market should be summoned, and compelled to produce its registers.

The eloquence of Vergniaud captivated even his enemies; his candour, and his touching persuasiveness, interested and won the great majority of the assembly, and from all sides he received the most animated applause. Guadet now came forward, and the Mountain, who had hitherto maintained silence, roused into rage by his appearance in the tribune, uttered yells of fury. The sitting was adjourned; and it was not until the 12th that Guadet obtained permission to reply to Robespierre, which he did in a manner calculated to excite more powerfully the passions of the assembly than did even the speech of Vergniaud. He acquitted all parties of conspiracy, but appear-ancea, he said, were much stronger against the Mountain, and the Jacobins, who had been intimately connected with Dumouriez and Egalité, than against the Girondists, who had always been at variance with both. "Who was it," exclaimed Guadet, "who attended Dumouriez to the Jacobin club and the theatres?—Your own Danton." "Ah! dost thou accuse me?" replied Danton; "thou knowest not my power!"

The conclusion of the speech of Guadet was adjourned to the following day. He insisted that no conspiracy existed; but that if there was one, the Mountain alone were implicated in it. He read, in conclusion, an address, which, like that of the Corn-market, was signed by Marat; it was from the Jacobins, and Marat had signed it as president of the society. It contained these words, which Guadet read to the assembly: "Citizens, let us arm ourselves. The counter-revolution is in the government; it is in the heart of the convention. Citizens, let us march there,—let us march."

"Yes," cried Marat, from his place, "let us march!" Upon this exclamation, the assembly rose, and demanded an impeachment against Marat. Danton opposed this motion, and said, that as it appeared that both sides of the assembly were agreed to accuse the family of Orleans, that they should immediately be sent before the tribunals, and that as for Marat, he could not be justly accused for an exclamation which had escaped him in the heat of a violent debate. Danton was answered that the family of Orleans were not to be tried at Paris but at Marseilles. He again wished to reply, but he was not listened to, and a priority was given to the impeachment against Marat, and Lacroix demanded that he should be immediately arrested. "Since I have enemies," exclaimed Marat, "who are lost to all shame*, I only ask one thing: This decree is calculated to produce a commotion among the people; allow me, then, accompanied by two gendarmes, to go to the Jacobin club, that I may recommend them to be peaceable." Without regarding this ridiculous proposition, he was immediately arrested by order of the assembly, and the act of impeachment was ordered to be ready by twelve o'clock the next day.

Robespierre hastened to the Jacobins to give vent to his indignation; he applauded the energy of Danton, and the moderation of Marat, and recommended peace to the people, that it might not be said that Paris had risen in insurrection to deliver a Jacobin.

On the next day, the act of impeachment was read and approved of by the assembly, and the prosecution being once commenced against Marat, was seriously followed up by the revolutionary tribunal.

It was the form of a petition which had been drawn up against the Girondists, that had led to these violent explanations on both sides of the assembly; but no determinate decision had been come to on this subject; and, in fact, it was impossible to come to any, for the assembly was not sufficiently strong to check the movements which gave rise to these petitions. The idea of a general address from all the sections had been followed up with activity; one general form had been resolved upon, and out of forty-three sections, thirty-five adhered to it; the council-general of the commune approved of this address, and the fifteen commissaries of the thirty-five sections, having the mayor, Pache, at their head, presented themselves at the bar of the assembly. This might be called a manifesto by which the commune of Paris declared their intentions, and were determined to rise in insurrection if they were not complied with. They had pursued the same line of conduct before the 10th of August, as they did now before the 31st of May. Rousselin, the speaker and commissary of one of the sections, read this petition. After having dwelt upon the criminal conduct of a certain number of deputies, the petition demanded their expulsion from the convention, and named them one after the other. These deputies were twenty-two in number; viz., Briesot, Guadet, Vergniaud, Gossoué, Grangeneuve, Buzot, Barbaroux, Salles, Biroteau, Pontécoulant, Pétion, Lanjuinais, Valazé, Hardy, Louvet, Lelhardy, Gorsas, Fauchet, Lanthénas, Lasource, Valady, and Chambon.

The galleries manifested the greatest delight on the reading of these names. The president informed the petitioners that the law obliged them to sign their petition. This they lost no time in doing; but Pache alone, wishing to protract his neutrality, remained behind. His signature was demanded; he replied that he was not of the number of the petitioners, and that he had been merely ordered by the council-general to accompany them; but, seeing that he could not retreat, he advanced and signed it. The galleries rewarded him by loud applause.

Boyer-Fonfrède then presented himself in the tribune, and said, "that if modesty did not forbid him, he should ask to be added to the honourable list of the twenty-two deputies." The majority of the assembly, fired with the most generous indignation, cried out, "Let them include us all in their list of proscription!" The twenty-two deputies were immediately surrounded, and received the most lively testimonies of esteem and attachment; the debate, interrupted by this scene, was adjourned for a few days.

At the appointed time it recommenced; the imputations and justifications of the two sides of the assembly had again taken place. But the deputies of the centre, taking advantage of some communications which had been made on the state of the armies, proposed that the assembly should exclusively confine their attention to the general interests of the republic, and pass over private topics of dispute. This was consented to; but on the 18th, a new petition against the right side, brought forward that of the thirty-five sections. Many acts of the commune were, at the same time, complained of; by one of these it declared itself in a continual state of revolution, and by another established within itself a committee of correspondence with all the municipalities of the kingdom. The commune, in fact, had long endeavoured to give its local authority a character of generality, which would enable it to speak in the name of France, and thus rival the power of the convention. The committee of L'Évêché, which had been dissolved by the advice of the Jacobins, had also attempted to open a communication between Paris and all the other cities of France, and the commune now adopted this idea, by organizing this correspondence within itself. Vergniaud addressed the assembly on this subject, and attacking, at the same time, the petition of the thirty-five sections, the acts which were imputed to the commune, and the designs which its conduct made evident, demanded that the petition should be declared seditious, and that the municipality should be obliged to lay their registers before the assembly, that the resolutions into which they had entered might appear. These motions were adopted, notwithstanding the opposition of the galleries, and the left side. At this time the right side, supported by the Plain, began to carry every question. Lasource, one of their warmest partisans, had been nominated president, and they still possessed the majority, that is to say, the legal majority, which, however, is but a weak resource against force, and indeed only serves to exasperate it the more.

The municipal officers who had been summoned to the bar, boldly gave up the registers of their deliberations, and appeared to wait for the approval of their contents. These registers purported: 1st. That the council-general should declare itself in a state of revolution, till some remedy should be provided for the public scarcity. 2nd. That the committee of correspondence with the forty-four thousand municipalities should be composed of nine members, and enter immediately on its functions. 3rd. That twelve thousand copies of the petition against the twenty-two deputies should be printed and circulated by the committee of correspondence. 4th, and lastly. That the general council should regard the prosecution of one of its members, or even of a president or secretary of section or club, for his opinions, as an attack upon itself. The last resolution was framed for the protection of Marat, who was accused of having signed a seditious address in the capacity of president of a section.

Thus the commune disputed every inch of ground with the assembly, and came to a decision diametrically opposite on every contested point. Was the question of supplies under discussion—they declared themselves in a state of revolution, if their violent measures were rejected. Was Marat accused—they covered him with their ægis; was there any question concerning the twenty-two deputies, they appealed to the forty-four thousand municipalities, and opened a correspondence with them, requiring the means of opposing the convention. Their opposition was directed against every question; and what was more, associated with the preparations for an insurrection.

Scarcely was the reading of the registers finished, when the younger Robespierre demanded the honours of the sitting for the municipal officers. This motion was opposed by the right. The Plain hesitated, and observed that it might be dangerous to take from the magistrates any part of the consideration and respect with which they were regarded by the people, by refusing them a common privilege granted to every petitioner. In these tumultuous debates, the sitting was prolonged to eleven at night; the right side and the Plain retired, and one hundred and forty-three members remained solely with the Mountain to admit the municipality of Paris to the honours of the sitting. Declared in the same day scandalous libellers, re-polled by the majority, and admitted to the honours of the sitting only by the faction of the Mountain and the galleries, the municipality could not be otherwise than highly irritated, and naturally became a rallying point for the party which aimed at crushing the legal authority of the convention.

Marat was at length brought before the revolutionary tribunal. It was solely the energetic feeling displayed by the right side, who carried the Plain with them, that decided the measure of his impeachment. But every energetic step, while it confers honour on a party struggling against a superior power, only hastens its destruction. The Girondists, in resolutely prosecuting Marat, were in fact preparing a triumph for him. The substance of the act of impeachment was, that Marat, having by his newspapers promoted murder and massacre, and sought to bring about the degradation and dissolution of the national convention, was impeached and brought before the revolutionary tribunal. The Jacobins, the Cordeliers, and all the restless spirits of Paris, interested themselves deeply in the fate of "this austere philosopher, brought up, as they said, 'in the school of adversity and meditation; in whom were united genius, extraordinary sapacity, and a profound knowledge of human nature; who could detect traitors on their car of triumph, at the very moment when the deluded mob were offering up their incense! Traitors,' they exclaimed, 'shall pass away, but the reputation of Marat now begins to flourish!'"

Although the revolutionary tribunal was not then composed as it afterwards was, nevertheless Marat could not be condemned there. The consultation lasted but a few seconds, and he was unanimously acquitted on the 24th of April, amidst the acclamations of a numerous concourse assembled to witness the trial. He was immediately surrounded by a throng of women, Sans-culottes armed with pikes, and detachments from the armed sections, who carried him in triumph to the convention, and placed him on his seat as deputy; two municipal officers headed the procession. Marat, crowned with a garland of oak-leaves, and raised on the shoulders of two pioneers, was brought in this triumphant manner into the middle of the chamber. One pioneer, leaving the procession, advanced to the bar. "Citizen president," said he, "we bring you the worthy Marat. Marat has always been the friend of the people, and the people will always be friends to Marat! If the head of Marat must fall, that of a pioneer must fall with it." The wretch, as he uttered these words, brandished his axe, and the galleries yelled forth savage applause. He then desired permission for the procession to file through the chamber. "I shall consult the assembly," said the president Lasource, alarmed by this terrific and revolting scene; but the multitude did not wait for him to do this, but rushing in on all sides, filled every corner. A promiscuous throng of men and women occupied the vacant seats of deputies, who had retired with disgust and dismay. Marat at last arrived, and was hugged from one to the other with the most vociferous applause, and, freed from the embraces of the petitioners, he was passed on to his colleagues with the most cordial demonstrations of joy. He immediately afterwards, withdrawing himself from the congratulations of the Mountain, ascended the tribune, and declared to the legislators that he came to offer to them a pure heart and a spotless name, and pledged himself to die in defence of the liberties and rights of the people.

New honours awaited him at the Jacobin club. Many chaplets had been prepared for him by the women; the president offered him one of these; and a child, four years of age, mounted the table, and placed another on his head. Marat threw off these chaplets with insolent disdain. "Citizens," exclaimed he, "indignant at beholding an iniquitous faction betray the republic, I endeavoured to unmask them, and put a rope about their necks. They opposed me, and an impeachment was the consequence; but I have come off victorious. This faction is humiliated, but it is not yet crushed. Why waste your time, then, in decreeing triumphs? be on your guard against enthusiasm. I resign the crowns you have offered me; wait till I have finished my career, and you will then be able to determine whether I deserve them."

This display of insolent modesty was rewarded by acclamations of applause. Robespierre was present, and undoubtedly he both envied and despised the base popularity of his colleague. Nevertheless, he contributed to swell the vanity of this victor of the day. These congratulations being over, the ordinary discussions were again debated; the means of purging the government, and expelling all traitors, Rolandists, Brissotines, &c. were the questions agitated. For this purpose, it was proposed to draw up a list of all the agents of the various administrations, and to point out those deserving of dismissal. "Send this list to me," said Marat, "and I will make the selection, and notify it to the ministers." Robespierre observed that the ministers were nearly all accomplices of the traitors, that they would pay no attention to the representations of the society, and that it would be better to make application to the committee of public welfare, placed by its functions above the executive power; and, besides, the society could not, without compromising itself, communicate with ministers whose designs were so evil, and whose conduct was so equivocal. "These are frivolous arguments," replied Marat, disdainfully; "a patriot as pure as I am might hold parley with the devil himself; I shall address myself to the ministers, and cull upon them, in the name of the society, to satisfy me as to their intentions."

The virtuous and eloquent Robespierre always commanded a respectful consideration, but the audacity and effrontery of Marat astonished and led captive the imaginations of impetuous and fiery spirits. His odious familiarity had made him a favourite of the porters of the market-places, who were flattered by their intimacy with the friend of the people*, and were always ready to afford to his insignificant person the protection of their brute force, and the terror they inspired in places of popular resort.

The Mountain, foreseeing the obstacles they would have to encounter, only became the more exasperated on that account; these obstacles were of a more formidable nature in the provinces than at Paris; and the impediments which their commissaries, who had been sent into the departments to hasten the recruiting service, met with, aggravated their irritation into fury. All the provinces were disposed to favour the revolution, but they had not all espoused its cause with the same ardour, nor had they proceeded to the same extremities as the city of Paris. The ambitious, the unoccupied, the turbulent, and the talented, are always the first to engage in a revolution; and a metropolis always contains more men of this description than provinces, because it is the resort of those who have emancipated themselves from all the bonds of society, and shaken off their attachment to the opinions, prejudices, and traditions of their forefathers. Paris therefore necessarily contained the most violent revolutionists. Situated at a short distance from the frontiers, pre-eminently exposed to the attacks of the enemy, encountering unparalleled dangers, the seat of government, it had witnessed the agitation of all the great questions. Thus the danger, the contest, everything conspired to produce the highest state of excitement and the greatest excess. The provinces not being subject to the same violent perturbations, regarded these excesses with horror, and partook of the sentiments of the right side and the Plain. Extremely dissatisfied with the treatment experienced by their deputies, they thought they perceived in the capital, beyond the extravagance of the revolution, the ambitious design of domineering over France, as Rome had domineered over her conquered provinces. Such were the notions the peaceable, industrious, and moderate part of the nation entertained with respect to the revolution of Paris. Yet these sentiments were more or less developed, according to local circumstances. Every province and every city possessed its violent revolutionists, for adventurous and turbulent characters are everywhere to be found. The municipalities were almost exclusively governed by these men, who had taken advantage of the reorganization of all the authorities, ordered by the legislative assembly after the 10th of August, to instal themselves in those situations. The inactive and moderate must always yield to the more resolute and violent; and it was therefore natural that men of the latter character should possess themselves of the municipal functions, the most responsible of all, and which require the utmost diligence and activity. The majority of the peaceable citizens confined themselves to their sections, where they sometimes gave their votes and exercised their civic rights. The departmental authorities had been assigned to the more wealthy and respectable notables, who from that very cause were a less active and energetic sort of men. Thus all the violent revolutionists had intrenched themselves in the municipalities, whilst the rich and middling classes occupied the sections and departmental posts.

The commune of Paris, aware of this circumstance, was anxious to open a communication with the municipal bodies, but was thwarted, as we have seen, by the convention. The parent Jacobin society had made up for this by its own correspondence; and that sort of connexion which they had failed in establishing between municipality and municipality, already existed from club to club, which amounted nearly to the same thing; for those who assisted at the discussions of the Jacob-bin clubs, were the same that managed the affairs of the general councils of the communes. Thus the entire Jacobin party of France, united in one compact body in the municipalities and clubs, and maintaining a correspondence from one extremity of France to the other, was arrayed against the whole mass of persons observing a middle course; a very numerous body, but divided into a multitude of sections, neither actively employed nor holding any communication with each other, meeting only occasionally to give their votes, having a few clubs of a moderate description, and but feebly governed by the departmental authorities, timid and undecided as moderation and opulence invariably are in presence of a revolutionized people, headed by factious leaders.

The strength of the position thus occupied by the revolutionists, led them to aim at extending their control over the great body of the people. The people were well disposed towards the republic, but were revolted by its excesses, and at this period they had the advantage in every province. Since the municipality, aided by a formidable police, and invested with authority to make domiciliary visits, and hunt out foreigners and disarm suspected persons, had the power of exercising the most vexatious severities against peaceable and inoffensive citizens, there had been a sudden reaction in the sections, which had united to check the power of the municipalities. In almost every town in France they had assumed an attitude of determination, had taken up arms, and were in avowed opposition to the municipalities, resisting their inquisitorial police, supporting the right side, joining loudly in their demand for order, peace, and respect for persons and property. The municipalities and Jacobin clubs, on the contrary, were clamorous for new regulations of police, and the establishment of revolutionary tribunals in the departments. In some places they were near proceeding to violence on these points, but the sections were so strong in numbers that the vigour of the municipalities was considerably daunted, and the Mountain deputies, despatched to hasten the recruiting and excite the revolutionary ardour of the provinces, were terrified at the resistance they experienced, and filled Paris with alarm.

Such was the situation of almost the whole of France, and such the state of parties. The struggle demonstrated itself with more or less violence, and the opposing parties more or less threatening, according to the circumstances and danger of each particular city. Wherever the cause of the revolution was in the greatest jeopardy, there were the Jacobins disposed to employ the most violent measures, and the moderate party to resist them. But that which especially roused the fury of the revolutionary passions, was rather the dread of treason at home than the danger of a foreign enemy, so that on the northern frontier, exposed to the attacks of the enemy, and little disturbed by factious, but one opinion prevailed; all were united in the common defence, and the commissaries from Lille to Lyons had made tolerably favourable reports to the convention. But at Lyons, where secret cabals concurred with its geographical and military situation to expose it to great dangers, similar and equally violent excesses had taken place as those of Paris. By its eastern situation, and vicinity to

Piedmont, Lyons had always attracted the regard of the counter-revolutionists; and the first emigration of Turin had essayed to establish a party in that city in 1790, and had even wished to send one of the French princes there. Mirabeau had also devised such a plan after his fashion. Ever since Coblenz had been the head-quarters of the emigration, an agent had been left in Switzerland, to correspond with Lyons, and, through the medium of Lyons, with the camp of Jallès and the fanatics of the south. These machinations had provoked a re-action of Jacobinism, and the efforts of the royalists only tended to produce a Mountain party at Lyons. These latter had formed an association called the central club, which was composed of delegates from the other clubs of the adjacent country. At its head was a Piedmontese, whose restless disposition had driven him from one place to another, till at last he established himself at Lyons, where his ardour in the cause of the revolution had successively procured for him the situation of municipal officer and president of the civil tribunal. The name of this man was Chabrier, and the language which he held at the central club would not have been borne by the Jacobins of Paris, but would have subjected him to be accused by Marat, of receiving pay from the foreign enemy, to promote anarchy and confusion. Besides this club, the Mountainers of Lyons possessed all the offices of the municipality, with the exception of the mayoralty, which was held by Nivière, the friend and disciple of Roland, and the head of the Girondist party at Lyons. Overborne by so many stormy violences, Nivière had, like Pétion, given in his resignation, and had, like him, been re-elected by the sections, who were more influential and energetic at Lyons, than in any other part of France. Of eleven thousand voters, nine thousand had obliged Nivière to resume the mayoralty, but he had resigned a second time, and the municipality at last succeeded in nominating a mayor of its own choice. On this occasion each party resorted to physical force; the younger members of the sections had driven Chabrier from his club, and stripped the hall where he poured forth his fanatic ravings. The department, in dismay, had appealed to the commissaries of the convention, who at first, expressing themselves strongly against the sections, then against the excesses of the commune, had alienated all parties, and were denounced by the Jacobins, and finally recalled by the convention. Their task was confined to remodelling the central club, uniting it to the Jacobins at Paris, and as a means of preserving it in full vigour, in expelling some few members who could not be tolerated. By May, animosity had reached its highest pitch; on one side, the commune, composed entirely of Jacobins, and the central club, over whom Chabrier presided, demanded the establishment of a revolutionary tribunal at Lyons, and paraded in all the public places a guillotine, brought for the express purpose from Paris, which they thus exposed to public attention in order to terrify the traitors and aristocrats; and, on the other side, the sections, in arms, were determined to resist the violence of the municipality, and prevent the establishment of that sanguinary tribunal, from which the Girondists at Paris had not been able to free the capital. In this state of things, the secret agents of royalism at Lyons awaited the favourable moment to take advantage of the indignation of the Lyonese, which was ready to break out.

In every other part of the south, as far as Marseilles, a moderate republican spirit prevailed and was more equally diffused, and the Girondists still possessed the affections of the people. Marseilles, jealous of the supremacy of Paris, became indignant at the insults offered to her favourite deputy Barbaroux, and was ready to rise against the convention, the moment any hostile intention should be made upon the national representation. Although one of the richest cities in France, she was not favourably situated to resist external counter-revolutionists, for her only point of contiguity was Italy, where no mischief was brewing, and her port did not, like that of Toulon, attract the anxious regard of England; neither had the idea of secret plots so exasperated the public mind as at Paris and Lyons, and the municipality, weak and exposed to threats, were on the point of being thrust out by the ascendancy of the overpowering sections. The deputy Moses-Bayle, who met with an unwelcome reception, found that the recruiting service was forwarded with the greatest enthusiasm, and that the populace were entirely attached to the Girondists.

From the Rhine, east and west, to the sea-side, fifty or sixty departments exhibited similar demonstrations; in fact, at Bordeaux these sentiments were universal. There, the sections, the municipality, and the principal club, proud of their Girondist deputation, were unanimous in resisting the violence of the Mountain, and in supporting that distinguished party, whom they regarded with feelings of pride, as having originated with them. The opposite party, on the contrary, had gained admission into no more than one section, where they were unsupported, powerless, and silenced. Bordeaux required neither taxes, provisions, or revolutionary tribunal; and prepared petitions against the commune, and at the same time equipped several battalions for the service of the republic.

But along the sea-side, drawing a line from the Gironde to the Loire, and from the Loire to the mouth of the Seine, very different inclinations demonstrated themselves, and dangers of the most formidable aspect threatened. There, the implacable Mountain had to contend not only with the moderate and generous republican spirit of the Girondists, but with the constitutional royalism of 1789, which stigmatised the revolution as illegal, as well as with the fanaticism of the feudal times, which, equally hostile to the revolution of 1793 and that of 1789, acknowledged no other temporal authority than that of their lords, or any other spiritual authority than that of their pastors.

In Normandy, and particularly at Rouen, its chief city, the inhabitants had always been devotedly attached to Louis XVI.; and, in the constitution of 1790, they saw all the hopes they had cherished for liberty and monarchy realised. But since the abolition both of royalty and the constitution, that is to say, since the 10th of August, a condemnatory and hostile silence prevailed in Normandy. In Brittany still more hostile inclinations had been manifested; the people there were still subject to the influence of their lords and pastors. In the neighbourhood of the Loire, this attachment went so far as to goad them to insurrection, and on the left bank of that river, in Le Bocage, Le Louroux, and La Vendée, they were in a state of complete insurrection, and took the field with arms ten thousand men strong.

It is here necessary to give some account of this unfortunate district, inhabited by a people so determined and heroic, who brought so many miseries upon France, indeed, nearly caused her destruction, and goaded on the revolutionary dictatorship to its worst excesses.

On both sides of the Loire the people had always retained the most fervent attachment for their ancient customs, and especially for their priests and their religious worship. When, therefore, in consequence of the civil constitution, the members of the clerical body were set at variance, a complete schism took place. The non-juring priests, who refused to subscribe to the new limitations concerning the churches, were preferred by their flocks; and when, dispossessed of their cures, they were obliged to retire, the people congregated round them in the woods, and regarded both themselves and their religion as objects of persecution. They assembled together in small companies, noted with hostility to the constitutional priests as being intruders, and frequently committed the most grievous excesses against them. In Brittany, and in the environs of Rennes, revolts more formidable and general, caused by the dearth of provisions, and the threat of abolishing religious observances, which seemed to be implied by the words of Cambon, "Those who want mass must pay for it," took place. The government, however, succeeded in repressing these partial risings on the right side of the Loire; but the co-operation of these insurgents with those of the left bank of the river, the theatre of the principal insurrection, was still very much to be feared.

It was particularly upon this left bank of the river, in Anjou and Lower and Upper Poitou, that the famous war of La Vendée first broke out. This district of France had been less affected by the silent and imperceptible changes wrought by time, than any other portion of the empire. The feudal system, from its ancient date and long duration, had received a patriarchal character, and the revolution far from producing a reform in this country, wounded all the cherished prejudices and superstitions of the inhabitants, and instead of being welcomed as a benefit, was felt as a persecution. It is necessary to give some account of the Bocage and the Marais, before its manners and the state of its society can be understood. Leaving Nantes and Saumur, and journeying along the Loire, as far as the sands of Olonne, Luçon, Fontenay, and Niort, the traveller discovers a variegated and undulating country, intersected by ravines, and divided by hedges, which have given it the name of the Bocage. Approaching the sea, the soil becomes more flat and less elevated, and terminates at last in salt marshes, in which a variety of ditches have been cut, thus rendering the country difficult of access; this part is called the Marais. The principal product of this country is pasturage, consequently cattle are plentiful. The peasants cultivated no more wheat than was sufficient for their own consumption, and procured the remaining necessities of life by the sale of their flocks and herds. Nothing could be more primitive than this simple industrious life. No great cities existed in these secluded districts, but only a few great villages, whose population did not exceed two or three thousand inhabitants. Between the two great roads which lead, the one from Tours to Poitiers, and the other from Nantes to Rochelle, a space of thirty leagues intervenes, which is traversed only by cross-roads, leading to villages and hamlets. The land was parcelled out into a multitude of small farms, bringing in no more than a rent of five or six hundred francs, and tenanted by single families, who divided with their landlords the profits arising from the sale of their cattle. By this division of property, a frequent familiar intercourse was kept up between the possessors and cultivators of the soil. The utmost simplicity of life was exhibited even in the manor-houses; the abundance of game in these countries, made the sports of the field a frequent and delightful exercise; the peasants followed their lords to the chase, where every one distinguished himself by his dexterity and spirit. The priests exercised a truly paternal authority over their flocks, and the purity of their morals, for riches had not corrupted their character, or exposed them to the invidious malevolence which wealth provokes; and the lower classes cheerfully submitted to the government of their superiors, and believed the doctrines of their pastors, for they were neither oppressed by the one, or scandalized by the other. Between civilization and barbarity, there is an intermediate state of simplicity, ignorance, and innocence; and perhaps it might be quite as well to stop here, if it were not the lot of man to press onwards to the highest degree of civilization through a medium of evil.

When the revolution, which had elsewhere produced such beneficial results, reached this country, with its iron rule, it caused the deepest distress. To adapt it to the state of society in these districts, it should have been modified, but this was impossible; and those who have accused the revolutionists of not conforming their new laws and government to local circumstances, neither understand the impracticability of exceptions, or perceive the necessity of insisting on a universality and uniformity of principles in the new social system. The revolution was not understood in these regions, and the inhabitants only viewed it through the medium of the misrepresentations of their priests and landlords. Although the feudal rights had been abolished, they had not ceased to pay them. They held assemblies for the nomination of their mayors, and always conferred that office on their lords. But when the destitution of the non-juring priests deprived the peasants of those pastors in whom they reposed their confidence, their distress was aggravated into irritation, and they followed them (as was the case in Brittany) into the woods to great distances to assist at those religious ceremonies, which, in their eyes, appeared the only true worship. From that moment, their minds became inflamed with the most deadly hate, and the priests did not neglect to take advantage of these feelings. The events of the 10th of August had sent many nobles of Poitou back to their estates; the 21st of January entirely alienated them, and they imparted their sense of indignation to those connected with them. Nevertheless, they entered into no conspiracy, as was generally believed; but the known estrangement of the country suggested to others who had no connection with the country the scheme of a conspiracy. One conspiracy was certainly formed in Brittany, but none in the Bocage; the people there had no pre-determined plan in view; they suffered themselves to be pushed to extremity. Finally, the levy of three hundred thousand men, in the month of March, excited a general insurrection. After all, it did not much concern the peasants below Poitou what passed in France; but the destitution of their clergy, and especially their obligation to join the armies, exasperated them. According to the old system, the quota of a district was only composed of those whose natural desire for change induced a departure from the place of their birth; but the present laws struck equally at all, without regarding their tastes or inclinations. Forced, therefore, to take arms, they preferred battling against the republic than in her defence. At the same time, that is, in the commencement of March, the draft of soldiers occasioned a revolt in the Upper Bocage and in the Marais. On the 10th, a draft was to take place at Saint-Florent, near Ancenis, in Anjou; the young men refused to enlist, the guard determined to force them, and the military commandant ordered a piece of artillery to be pointed on the mutineers. On this, they sprang forward with their sticks, seized on the cannon, disarmed the guard, but seemed dismayed at their own temerity. A carrier, named Cathelineau, much looked up to in this country, and remarkable for his intrepidity and eloquence, hearing this news, quitted his farm, and hastened into the midst of his compatriots, rallied them, rekindled their courage, and imparted a consistency to the insurrection by adopting measures for its continuance. On the same day, he determined to attack a republican post, defended by eighty men; the peasants followed him with their clubs and fire-arms, and after one discharge, every shot of which told, for they were great marksmen, they rushed upon the post, disarmed the soldiers, and rendered themselves masters of the position. On the following day, Cathelineau marched upon Chemillé, and carried it, in spite of two hundred republicans, and three pieces of cannon. A gamekeeper at the Chateau of Maulevrier, named Stofflet, and a young peasant of the village of Chauzeau, collected each a troop of their countrymen, and hastened to join Cathelineau, who daringly conceived the project of attacking Cholet, the chief town of the district, and garrisoned by five hundred republicans. Their method of warfare was precisely the same. Taking advantage of the hedges, and the inequalities of the soil, they succeeded in surrounding the enemy's battalion, and opened an unerring fire upon them under cover. After having thrown the republicans into some confusion by this destructive sharp-shooting, they availed themselves of the first moment of hesitation that manifested itself, and rushed suddenly upon them, surrounded their ranks, routed and disarmed the soldiers, and despatched them with their clubs. Such were the military tactics common sense had suggested, and indeed they were well adapted to the nature of the country. The troops whom they attacked drew up in a line, and, without any cover, received, but could not return their fire, for they could neither make use of their artillery, or come to the bayonet, against enemies who were dispersed on every side. In this situation, not being veterans in war, they could not, for a moment, withstand such a well-directed and brisk fire, which could never be equalled by troops of the line. But, when they saw these furious men burst upon them in front, rear, and flank, uttering appalling shouts as they advanced, a panic and confusion was almost inevitable. Their destruction was then certain, for flight, so easy to the country people, was impracticable for troops of the line. To have contested with these difficulties, veterans should have been despatched, for those who had first to attack the rebels were but national guards, lately drafted, and taken from the villages, almost all of them violent republicans, and whose zeal was the main cause of their first appearing in battle.

The victorious band of Cathelineau entered Chollet, and seized upon all the arms and ammunition they found there, and made cartridges out of the charges of the cannons. It was thus that the Vendéans always procured military supplies. Their defeat imparted no advantage to the enemy, for they carried nothing with them but a musket or club across the fields, whereas each victory on their part procured for them considerable ammunition for carrying on the war. The victorious insurgents celebrated their success with the money they found*, and then burnt all the official papers of the government, which they regarded as so many instruments of tyranny. They then returned to their villages and farms, which they never cared to quit for any length of time.

Another insurrection, much more general, broke out in the Marais and the department of La Vendée. At Machecoul and Challans, the recruiting was the occasion of a general rising. A perruquier named Gaston killed an officer, assumed his uniform, put himself at the head of a troop, carried Challans, then Machecoul; or his company burnt the papers of the various republican administrations, and committed massacres previously unheard of in the Bocage. Three hundred republicans were shot by companies of twenty and thirty. The insurgents first made them confess, and then led them to the bank of a ditch, at the side of which they shot them, to save themselves the trouble of removing their bodies. Nantes immediately sent some hundred men to Saint-Philbert, but, hearing of a rising at Savenay, recalled them, and the insurgents of Machecoul remained masters of the conquered country.

In the department of La Vendée,—that is to say, towards the south of the theatre of this war,—the insurrection was still more serious and formidable. The national guards of Fontenay, who set out to march upon Chantonay, were defeated. Chantonay was pillaged. General Verteuil, who commanded the eleventh division of military, hearing of this defeat, sent off General Marcé with twelve hundred men, partly taken from the troops of the line, and partly from the national guards. He came up with the rebels, first at Saint-Vincent, where they were defeated, and the general had time to add twelve hundred men and nine pieces of cannon to his little army. Marching upon Saint-Fulgent, he again met the Vendéans in a bottom, and halted to rebuild a bridge which they had destroyed. At four o'clock in the evening, on the 18th of March, they attacked him. Taking advantage of the inequality of the ground, they commenced their sharp-shooting with their ordinary superiority, and perceived the republican army, dismayed by their murderous fire, and obliged to await the appearance of an enemy concealed behind rising grounds, rapidly dispersing on all sides. Finally, they became assailants in their turn, spread disorder through the ranks of the republicans, and made themselves master of their artillery, as well as of the ammunition and arms which the soldiers threw away in their retreat, to remove every impediment to their flight.

This success, more distinguishable in the department of La Vendée, properly so called, procured for the insurgents the name of Vendéans, which they afterwards retained, although the war was much more actively carried on out of La Vendée. The robberies committed in the Marais also gained for the inhabitants the appellation of brigands, though the great majority did not deserve that title. The insurrection spread in the Marais from Nantes as far as Sables; and in Anjou and Poitou as far as the environs of Vihiers and L'athenay. The success of the Vendéans is attributable to many causes; the nature of their country and its local peculiarities, their address and courage, and finally the inexperience and rash impetuosity of the republican troops, who, levied in haste, were too precipitate in their attack, and thus gave the Vendéans not only victory, but its consequences,—that is to say, ammunition, confidence, and assurance.

The Easter season brought the insurgents back to their homes, from which they never liked to be long absent. The war was for them little else than a kind of hunting-party, on which they would have to be out but for a few days; they took with them provisions sufficient for a few days, and then returned to their villages to inflame their neighbours with the recital of their exploits. They formed similar appointments for the month of April. The insurrection now became general, and spread through the whole breadth of the country. This theatre of war may be said to be comprehended within a line, extending from Nantes, through Pornic, the Isle of Noirmoutiers, Sables, Luçon, Fontenay, Niort, and Parthenay, and returning in its course through Airvault, Thouars, Doué, and Saint-Florent, as far as the Loire. The insurrection, although commenced by men scarcely superior to the peasants they commanded, other than by their natural accomplishments, was soon taken up by men of a far superior rank. The peasants presented themselves in crowds at the châteaux, and forced their lords to place themselves at their head. The whole of the Marais insisted on being commanded by Charette. This man belonged to a family of shipowners at Nantes; he had served in the navy, where he had risen to the rank of lieutenant, and at the peace he retired to a chateau belonging to his uncle, and devoted his time chiefly to the sports of the field. His delicate complexion and slight frame seemed little capable of enduring the hardships and fatigues of war; but having been long accustomed to the rough life of a huntsman, passing whole months in the woods, sleeping in the open air, and on the bare earth, he had invigorated his constitution, had acquired a perfect knowledge of the country, and was celebrated by the peasantry around for his address and courage. He hesitated at first to accept the command which was offered him, pointing out to the insurgents the dangers of their enterprise. But he yielded at last to their solicitations, and by suffering them to commit excesses, he placed their lives in jeopardy, and engaged them irrevocably in his service. Clever, crafty, stern, and obstinate, he became the most formidable of all the Vendean chiefs. The whole of the Marais implicitly obeyed him, and with fifteen and sometimes twenty thousand men, he threatened Sables and Nantes. As soon as his followers were assembled, he seized on the Isle of Noirmoutiers, an important position, where he might establish his head quarters, and opened a communication with England.

In the Bocage, the peasants made a similar demand upon MM. de Bonchamps, d'Elbée, and de La Rochejaquelein, and forced them to abandon their chateaux, and place themselves at their head. M. de Bonchamps had formerly served under M. de Sully, and had become an excellent officer, of great personal intrepidity, and noble and dignified in his deportment and sentiments. He commanded all the insurgents of Anjou and the banks of the Loire. M. d'Elbée was also experienced in military service, and joined to a warm devotion for the cause he had espoused, a perseverance of character and a complete acquaintance with that species of rustic warfare in which he was about to engage. He was at this time the most popular leader in the Bocage. He commanded all the parishes around Cholet and Beaupréau. Cathelineau and Stofflet still retained that command which they had earned by the confidence they imparted, and joined MM. de Bonchamps and d'Elbée, to march upon Bressuire, where General Quéteanu was stationed. This latter had carried off from the chateau of Clisson the family of Lescure, whom he suspected of conspiracy, and detained them prisoners at Bressuire. Henry de La Rochejaquelein, a young man who had formerly belonged to the king's guard, but had since retired to the Bocage, was at that time at Clisson, the house of his cousin De Lescure. He escaped, and raised the standard of insurrection at Aubiers, his native village, and at all the parishes in the neighbourhood of Chatillon. He soon joined the other chiefs, and, with their assistance, forced General Quéteanu to retire from Bressuire. M. de Lescure and his family were then set at liberty. He was a young man, of the same age as Henry de La Rochejaquelein. He was a calm, prudent, cool, and undauntedly courageous man, and added to these qualities a strong feeling of justice. Henry, his cousin, also possessed the courage of a hero, and frequently was too impetuous; he was also excitable, and generous in his sentiments. M. de Lescure then put himself at the head of his peasants, who flocked around him, and the four leaders united their forces at Bressuire, to march from thence upon Thouars. The wives of all these leaders distributed cockades and flags; the men marched out singing songs of enthusiasm, and considered that they set out upon a crusade. This army was not encumbered with baggage, for the peasants would never remain long from their homes; they, therefore, carried with them bread enough for a few days, and, in extraordinary cases, the several parishes through which they passed, upon receiving notice, supplied them with whatever they might require. This force was composed of about thirty thousand men, and was called the grand royal and catholic army. It showed itself before Angres, Saurmur, Doué, Thouars, and Parthenay. Between this army and that of the Marais, commanded by Charette, several other considerable bodies had been assembled, the chief of which, under the orders of M. de Royrand, might amount to ten or twelve thousand men.

The main body, commanded by Bonchamps, D'Elbée, De Lescure, De la Rochejaquelein, Cathelineau, and Stofflet, arrived before Thouars on the 3d of May, and prepared for an assault on the morning of the 4th. But it was necessary previously to pass over the Thoué, which surrounds Thouars on almost every side. General Quéteanu defended the passages. The Vendéans opened a cannonade with the artillery they had taken from the republicans, and played upon the bank with the same success as on former occasions. M. de Lescure, thinking it was now time to carry the passage, advanced in the midst of a heavy fire from the enemy, which riddled his clothes, but could not procure more than one peasant to accompany him. But La Rochejaquelein perceiving this, rushed forward; his troops followed, the bridge was crossed, and the republicans driven back into the town. It was necessary now to make a breach, but the Vendéans had no means of effecting this. Henry de La Rochejaquelein, therefore, mounting on the shoulders of his men, began to scale the ramparts. D'Elbée commenced a vigorous attack on his side, and Quéteanu, not being able to hold out, consented to surrender the town to avoid the horrors of the town being sacked. The Vendéans, thanks to their leaders, behaved with the greatest moderation; no outrages were committed against the inhabitants, but the tree of liberty and the papers of the several administrations were burnt. The generous Lescure now returned the civilities he had received, when prisoner, from Quéteanu, and wished to persuade him to remain with the Vendean army, that he might thus escape the severities of the government for having delivered up the town. Quéteanu magnanimously refused this offer, and determined to return to the republicans, and demand a trial.

A GENERAL VIEW OF THE PROGRESS OF THE REVOLUTION—REFLECTIONS UPON THE GIRONDISTS.

The disastrous intelligence from La Vendée, concurring with that received from the north, which announced the reverses of Dampierre, in conjunction with the news from the south, which apprised the republican government that the Spaniards had assumed a threatening attitude upon the Pyrenees, as well as from several provinces where hostile feelings had demonstrated themselves, these tidings threw the capital into great agitation. Many departments adjacent to La Vendée, being informed of the success of the insurgents, thought themselves authorized to send troops against them. The department of the Hérault raised six million francs and six thousand men, and forwarded an address to the people of Paris, urging them to imitate their example. The convention, to encourage this enthusiasm, approved of the conduct of the department of the Hérault, and thereby authorized all the communes of France to exercise acts of sovereignty, by raising men and money.

The commune of Paris was by no means behind-hand. She held forth that it depended on the Parisians to save France, and hastened to prove her zeal, and employ her new power, by raising an army. The commune immediately passed a resolution, declaring, that, in accordance with the solemn approbation given by the convention to the conduct of the Hérault, there should be levied within the precincts of Paris twelve thousand men, to march against La Vendée. In imitation of the convention, they chose from the council-general commissaries to accompany this army. These twelve thousand men were to be taken from the companies of the sections, in the proportion of fourteen from every hundred and twenty-six men. In conformity with the practice of the revolutionists, a species of dictatorial power was given to the revolutionary committee of each section, to point out those fittest for the service for which they were intended. "Consequently," so said the order of the commune, "all unmarried clerks of all the offices of Paris, except principals and their head assistants, and the clerks of notaries and solicitors, the foremen of bankers and merchants, shopmen, messengers of public offices, &c., are liable to be drawn for the army in the following proportions: out of two one shall go; of three, two; of four, two; of five, three; of six, three; of seven, four; of eight, four; and so on. Those clerks of offices who were drawn were allowed to retain their places, and one-third of their salaries; no refusal is to be allowed. They are to communicate their wants, and then to be immediately provided by the committee of their section with whatever is necessary for their equipment. They are then to assemble together to nominate their officers, and to become immediately afterwards subject to their orders."

But to raise an army and to ensure its formation with such a show of compulsion, was not enough; how to support it was now the question, and therefore application must be made to the rich. "The rich," it was said, "do nothing for the defence of their country and the revolution; they live in a happy state of indolence, and leave it to the people to shed their blood for their country; they must at least be forced to contribute some portion of their wealth for the common safety." For this purpose, a forced loan was suggested, to be furnished by the citizens of Paris in proportion to the amount of their respective incomes. All those possessed of a yearly income from a thousand to fifty thousand francs, were to contribute accordingly from the sum of thirty francs to that of twenty thousand. All those who possessed more than an income of fifty thousand francs, were permitted to retain thirty thousand, and forced to give up the rest. The personal effects and real property of such who refused to comply with this patriotic demand were liable to be seized and sold by the revolutionary committee, and their possessors were marked out as persons suspected of disaffection.

Such measures as these, which affected all classes, whether it were those who were impressed into the military service, or those who were forced to support its expenses, provoked a powerful opposition in the sections. We have already seen that these sections were a good deal divided, and were more or less violent in proportion to the preponderance therein of the lower classes. In some, especially those of the Quinze Vingts, the Gravilliers, and Corn-Market, they declared that they would not leave Paris so long as any federalists and troops of the line, who, said they, were the body-guard of the convention, remained behind. The resistance of these originated in their jacobinism, but that of many others had a very different cause. All the clerks, foremen, and apprentices, had manifested a strong opposition to the two orders of the commune. The former dependants of the emigrant aristocracy, who were always busy in stirring up disturbances, joined this discontented multitude; they thronged together in the streets and public places; Down with the Jacobins! down with the Mountain! was their cry; and the same obstacles which the revolutionary system had encountered in the provinces, it had to contend with on this occasion in Paris.

A general cry was now raised against the aristocracy of the sections. Marat declared that Messieurs the grocers, the attorneys, and the clerks, conspired with Messieurs of the right side and the rich against the revolution; that it would be a good plan to forcibly apprehend them, and reduce them to the condition of the sans-culottes, without a rag to cover their nakedness.

Chaumette, procurator of the commune, delivered a long harangue upon this occasion, in which he deplored the miseries of his country, originating, he said, in the perfidy of the ministers, the egotism of the rich, the ignorance of the people, and the recklessness of many citizens, in regard of the common weal. He then proposed, and caused a resolution to be passed, that the convention should be applied to, to furnish the means of educating the people, of overcoming the egotism of wealth, and assisting the poor. Also, that an assembly should be formed of the presidents of all the revolutionary committees of the sections, and the deputies of all the administrative bodies, and that it should meet every Sunday and Thursday at the Commune, to provide for the safety of the common weal, and, lastly, that it should call upon every good citizen to meet in the sectional assemblies to give full effect to their patriotism.

Danton, always prompt in discovering resources in a moment of danger, conceived the project of embodying two armies of sans-culottes, the one to march upon La Vendée, and the other to remain in Paris, to keep the aristocrats in awe, and to support them at the expense of the rich. He, also, for the purpose of commanding a majority in the sections, suggested the idea of paying those who attended their sittings. Robespierre, borrowing these notions from Danton, more fully developed them at the Jacobin club, and pointed out other classes of citizens quite as much to be suspected: not confining himself any longer to the late nobles, priests, or financiers, he included all those citizens who had in any way committed a demonstration of incivism, and proposed that these should be imprisoned until the peace; that the action of the revolutionary tribunal should be accelerated, and that new sources of communication should be opened to counteract the effect of disaffected journals. By availing oneself of these resources, he said, the right side and its machinations might be effectually resisted, without resorting to illegal measures, or violating the laws.

All these ideas had but one object, that of arming the people; of placing one party within, who was to combat another from without; of arming the people at the expense of the rich; and, in fact, causing the people to attend at their own deliberative assemblies for payment out of the pockets of the rich; to imprison all persons opposed to the revolution, under the denomination of suspected, a term more comprehensive in its designation than it had ever yet been; to establish a correspondence between the sections and the commune, and for that purpose to constitute a new revolutionary assembly, which was to devise fresh plans of securing the public welfare, in plain language, an insurrection. The assembly of the Evêché, which had been recently dissolved, but again renewed upon the motion of Chaumette, and altogether with a more serious aspect, had evidently this object in view.

From the 8th to the 10th of May, the most alarming news constantly succeeded each other; Dampierre, who commanded the army of the north, had been killed; in the interior, the provinces continued in a state of revolt. Normandy appeared on the point of making common cause with Brittany. The insurgents of La Vendée, advancing from Thouars to Loudun and Montreuil, had taken those two cities, and nearly reached the banks of the Loire. The English, disembarking on the coasts of Brittany, were about, it was said, to join them, and carry their attacks into the heart of the republic. The inhabitants of Bordeaux, indignant at the treatment which their deputies experienced, had assumed the most menacing attitude, and disarmed the sections wherein the Jacobins had intrenched themselves. At Marseilles, the sections were in a state of absolute insurrection; disgusted with the excesses committed under the pretext of disarming suspected persons, they had met together, dissolved the commune, transferred its powers to a committee called the central committee of the sections, and instituted a popular tribunal to prosecute all originators of massacre and pillage. Besides these measures in their own city, they sent deputies to the sections of the town of Aix, to enforce the imitation of their example throughout the province. Paying no respect to the commissaries of the convention, they seized their papers, and ordered them to quit the city. Disorders equally serious prevailed at Lyons. The administrative body, in concert with the Jacobins, had, after the example of Paris, commanded a levy of six million francs and six thousand men to be made, had determined to disarm suspected persons, and to establish a revolutionary tribunal; the sections became disgusted with these measures, and seemed ready to come to an open rupture with the commune. Thus, whilst the enemy advanced towards the north, the insurrection, which had already broken out in Brittany and La Vendée, appeared on the point of being propagated throughout France, by gaining admission into Bordeaux, Rouen, Nantes, Marseilles, and Lyons. The intelligence of this general disaffection arriving in the brief space of two or three days, from the 12th to the 15th of May, greatly alarmed the Mountaineers, and the Jacobins. The proposed measures were urged with increased violence; they desired that all the waiters of coffee-houses and taverns, and that all servants, should join the army immediately; that the popular societies should all of them set out on their march in a body, that the commissaries of the assembly should immediately join their sections, in order to induce them to provide their quota; that thirty thousand men should be forthwith transported to the theatre of war, in the private carriages of the rich; that the latter should be made to contribute without delay the tenths of their fortunes; that suspected persons should be imprisoned and kept as hostages; that the conduct of the ministers should be scrutinised; that the committee of public welfare should have it in charge to circulate an address to those citizens whose political opinions had been misled; that all civil operations should be suspended, that the civil tribunals should cease to exercise their functions; that the theatres should be closed; that the tocsin should be rung, and the alarm guns should be fired.

Danton, to inspire his colleagues with courage in the midst of the dangers which seemed to threaten them, made two remarks: the first was, that the apprehension that Paris would be deserted by her good citizens, whose presence was so necessary for her preservation, ought not to impede the recruiting operations, for there would always remain at Paris at least a hundred and fifty thousand patriots ready to rise, at a moment's notice, to exterminate the aristocrats who dared openly show themselves. The second was, that the agitation produced by civil warfare, so far from holding out encouragement to foreign enemies, was on the contrary calculated to strike them with terror: "For," said he, "Montesquieu has already made this observation, when speaking of the Romans; a people all armed, and habituated to war, whose passions are entirely absorbed in martial fury, have nothing to fear from the cold and mercenary courage of foreign soldiers. The feeblest of the two parties would be strong enough to exterminate automatons, whose discipline can neither inspire them with animation or spirit."

It was then immediately resolved that the ninety-six commissaries should join their sections, in order to obtain their quota, and that the committee of public welfare should continue to exercise its functions for a month more at least. Custine was appointed general of the army of the north, and Houchard of that of the Rhine. A general distribution of the armies upon the frontiers took place. Cambon presented the draught scheme of the forced loan to be obtained from the rich, and chargeable upon the property of the emigrants. "This is one way," said he, "of making the rich take part in the revolution, by obliging them to acquire a portion of the national possessions, if they wish their security to stand upon the national credit that is pledged for its payment."

The commune, on its own part, ordered that a second army of sans-culottes should be levied and stationed in Paris, to keep aristocracy within due bounds, whilst the first army marched against the rebels; that a general imprisonment of all suspected persons should take place, and that the central assembly of the sections, composed of the administrative authorities, of the presidents of the sections, of the members of the revolutionary committees, should meet together as soon as possible to make the apportionment of the forced loan, and to settle the lists of suspected persons, &c.

Internal commotion had attained its height; on one side the aristocrats abroad, it was said, were in agreement with those at home; that the conspirators of Marseilles, La Vendée, and Normandy acted in concert; that the members of the right side directed the operations of this vast insurrection; and that the violence of the sections of the former town resulted from their intrigues with Paris: on the other side, every excess was attributed to the Mountain, who were accused of designing to disorganize the whole of France, and to assassinate twenty-two deputies. On both sides it became a mutual question how the peril was to be avoided, and what means should be adopted to save the republic. The members of the right side, resuming their courage, prepared for some act of great energy. Some sections, viz., those of the Mail, the Butte des Moulins, and many others, gave them powerful support, and refused to send deputies to the central assembly. They also rejected the forced loan, saying that they themselves would defray the expenses of their volunteers, and were opposed to new lists of suspected persons, repeating that their revolutionary committee were competent to give efficiency to all measures of police within their own district. On the other hand, the Mountainers, the Jacobins, the Cordeliers, and the members of the commune, cried out treason, and repeated everywhere, that all true patriots should unite their efforts to save the republic from the conspiracy of the twenty-two deputies. At the Cordeliers, it was openly maintained that they should be apprehended and put to death. In one assembly, where a concourse of fanatic females were accustomed to congregate, it was proposed that the opportunity afforded by the first tumult in the convention should be seized upon to assassinate them. These furies carried daggers about their persons, daily disturbed the assembly by their clamour in the galleries, and declared that they themselves would save the republic. It was everywhere stated that many hundreds of these daggers had been made by a single armourer in the Faubourg St. Antoine. Neither party ever stirred out without arms and without weapons of attack or defence. No settled design had as yet been agreed upon; but all minds were in such a state of ferment and agitation, that the slightest occasion would have sufficed to produce a simultaneous explosion. At the Jacobins, measures of every description were proposed. It was declared, that since the accusations of the commune against the twenty-two deputies did not prevent them from holding their sittings in the convention, a more energetic measure was necessary; that the citizens appointed for La Vendée ought not to quit Paris till they had saved the country; that the people had the means of saving the country in their hands, but that it was necessary to point out the means to them; and that, for this purpose, a committee of five members should be appointed, who should be permitted by the society to be the depository of all secret communications. To this others replied, that every thing should be stated openly in the club, and that there was no occasion to conceal anything from it, and that it would be much safer to act in an undisguised manner. Robespierre, who considered these notions imprudent, opposed them. Before he could consent to have recourse to illegal acts, "he must be certain," he said, "that the measures which he himself had proposed would be insufficient. Have you yet," said he, "raised your revolutionary army? Have you enforced those measures which are necessary for the payment of the sous-cultotes, whether in arms, or sitting in their sections? Have you arrested all suspected persons? Have you converted your public places into armourers' workshops, and magazines of military stores? You have adopted none of those prudent and salutary measures which by no means compromise the patriots, and you suffer men who understand nothing of public affairs, to propose acts which are the cause of all the calamities of which you are the object. It is not until all legal measures are exhausted, that recourse is to be had to violent means, and even then it is not proper to suggest them in a society which is expected to act with wisdom and discretion. I know," added Robespierre, "that I am accused of moderation, but I am too well known to fear such imputations."

Now, as on the eve of the 10th of August, all feeling the necessity of siding with one party hesitated and rambled from plan to plan, but suggested a meeting to come to some understanding with each other. The assembly of the Malice had already been formed, but the department as yet took no part in it; only one of its members, the Jacobin Dufourmy, had attended it; many sections held back; the mayor had not yet made his appearance, and its next sitting was adjourned till Sunday, the 19th of May, to consider the object of its meeting. Although the object for which this assembly was called together was clearly defined by the commune, yet the same notions were broached there as at any other place, and it was there stated as it had been elsewhere, that a new 10th of August was wanted. Hitherto, it had not gone beyond violent language, and the ordinary blusterings of a club. There had also been noticed women mixed with the men, but this tumultuous assemblage had not exhibited greater licence in its opinions and language than any other of the popular assemblies.

The 15th, 16th, and 17th of May were stormy days, and every question gave rise to bitter discussion and furious conflicts in the assembly. The people of Bordeaux sent in an address, in which they declared their resolution of rising in the defence of their deputies, and intimated that one division was to march against the insurgents of La Vendée, and the other upon Paris, to exterminate the anarchists who dare to threaten the national representation with violence. A letter from Marseilles announced the continued opposition of the sections in the town; and a petition from Lyons demanded the aid of the assembly, to release those who had been imprisoned as suspected persons, and who were menaced with the revolutionary tribunal, by Chabrier and the Jacobins. The reading of these addresses excited a fearful tumult; both the assembly and the galleries seemed on the point of proceeding to personal violence. Nevertheless, the right side, roused by the dangers which threatened them, communicated their courage to the Plain, and it was resolved by a great majority that the petition of the inhabitants of Bordeaux was a noble display of patriotism; every revolutionary tribunal established by the local authorities was abolished, and those citizens who might be forced thither, were authorized to repel force by force. These resolutions, at the same time, aggravated the indignation of the Mountain, and exalted the courage of the right side. On the 18th, the fury of both parties had reached its height. The Mountain, deprived of many of its members, who had been sent into the departments, cried out against the oppression they suffered. Guadet requested permission to address the assembly, in order to present an historical parallel, and indeed he seemed to foretell in a most impressive manner the fate of the opposing parties. "When formerly in England," said he, "a patriotic majority attempted to resist a factious minority, the latter cried out against oppression, and by these clamours succeeded at last in oppressing the majority itself. They called themselves patriots, to the exclusion of all others. With this title, also, did the deluded multitude, who were instigated by the promise of plunder, and the partition of property, plume themselves; and by such perversion of honourable appellations, and such iniquitous bribes held out to penury, avarice, and base ambition, were they led on to the commission of that act of outrage against the nation called the purging of the parliament, of which Pride, formerly a butcher, but then a colonel, was the author and chief perpetrator. A hundred and fifty members were driven out of the House of Commons, and the minority, consisting of fifty or sixty at most, remained masters of the state.

"But what followed? These patriots, the instruments of Cromwell, and whom he forced to commit the most absurd iniquities to promote his own advancement, were at last driven out themselves, and their crimes furnished a pretext for the final accomplishment of the designs of the usurper." Here Guadet, pointing out the butcher Legendre, Danton, Lacroix, and all the other deputies who were infamous for their immorality, added: "Cromwell at last entered the house of parliament, and addressing these same members, who alone in their own opinions were capable of saving the country; you, said he to one, are a robber; to another, you are a drunkard; to a third, you are a speculator of the public money; and to a fourth, you are a whoremonger: fly, said he to all, and leave your places for honest men. They yielded without a word, and Cromwell assumed the supreme power."

This striking and affecting allusion made a deep impression on the assembly, who continued silent. Guadet continued, and in order to prevent this "Pride's purge" (purigation Pridienne), proposed several measures of police, which were adopted by the assembly in the midst of outcries of dissatisfaction. Immediately after, a shameful scene took place in the galleries. A woman attempted to thrust one of the men out of the chamber; she was seconded on all sides; and the unfortunate man, who made a stout resistance, was nearly crushed to death by the people. The guard in vain endeavoured to restore silence and tranquillity. Marat cried out that this man whom they wanted to turn out was an aristocrat. The assembly were indignant at Marat, inasmuch as it increased the danger of the unfortunate being who was exposed to assassination. He replied that tranquillity would never be restored till the nation was delivered from all aristocrats, the accomplices of Dumouriez and statesmen (hommes d'état), for such was his designation of the members of the right side, on account of their reputation for superior intelligence.

The president Isnard at this moment took off his hat, and demanded permission to make an important declaration. He was listened to in profound silence, and in a tone of deep anxiety he spoke as follows. "A conspiracy of England has been brought to my knowledge, of which it is my duty to inform the assembly. It is the design of Pitt to arm one part of the people against the other, by instigating them to insurrection. This insurrection is to be commenced by women, many deputies are to be assassinated, and the convention dissolved, and at the same time a descent of the English on our coasts is to take place.

"Such is the declaration," said Isnard, "which I feel it my duty to make."

The president was applauded by the majority; his declaration was ordered to be printed, and it was decreed that the deputies should not in future separate, so that each might share the common danger. The tumult which had taken place in the galleries was then explained. The woman who had first commenced this disturbance belonged, it was said, to a society called the Fraternity, who were accustomed to occupy the galleries, to the exclusion of strangers, and the federalists of the departments, and thus disturbed the debates by their hootings. The popular societies were then spoken of, and immediately clamours burst forth on every side. Marat, who had been continuously running in and out of the lobbies, and crossing from one bench in the hall to another, all the time speaking against the statesmen, pointed out one of the members of the right side, and said to him, "Thou art one, but the people will give thee and others their due." Guadet then sprang to the tribune, and endeavoured to inspire the assembly with courage to come to a bold determination; he enumerated all the disorders of which Paris had become the theatre, the propositions which had been made in the popular societies, the terrible language uttered at the Jacobins, and the designs that had been openly avowed in the assembly of the Mairie. He maintained that the disturbance which they had just witnessed had no other object than to bring about a scene of confusion, that the meditated assassinations might be perpetrated the more effectually. Although interrupted every moment, he yet succeeded in gaining a hearing to the end, and proposed two measures heroically bold, but, unfortunately, utterly impracticable.

"The anarchical authorities of Paris," said he, "are the great sources of every evil we complain of. I propose, then, to annul them, and to replace them by all the presidents of the sections.

"The convention not being free, I propose also that another should be assembled elsewhere, and that all new members should meet at Bruges, ready to constitute a convention on the first signal they may receive from you, or the moment they hear of the dissolution of the present convention."

These two propositions produced a fearful tumult. All the members of the right rose up, crying out, that this was the only means of saving the republic, and seemed to acknowledge the audacious genius of Guadet, who possessed the means of communicating this truth. The left side, on the contrary, also rose, and menacing their adversaries in their turn, exclaimed that the plot was at last discovered, the conspirators unmasked, and that their machinations against the indivisibility of the republic were at last avowed. Danton then would have rushed to the tribune, but he was not permitted, and Barrère, in the name of the committee of public safety, took precedence.

Barrère, with his usual insinuating address and conciliatory tone, said "that if he had been permitted to speak before, he could have discovered many facts illustrative of the state of France, which had come to his knowledge within the last few days." He then spoke of the scheme of dissolving the convention; that the president of his section had collected from the conversation of the procurator Chaumette, a line of argument demonstrative of that intention; that at the Evêché, and at another assembly of the Mairie, the same question had been discussed; that to attain this object, it was proposed to excite a tumult, that the women were to be employed for this purpose, and that twenty-two deputies were to be assassinated in the confusion. Barrère added, that the minister for foreign affairs and the minister of the interior must have procured information on this subject, and that they ought to be heard. Alluding then to the measures which had been proposed, "He agreed," he said, "in opinion with Guadet as to the character of the authorities of Paris; the department," he said, "was perfectly impotent; the sections usurped the sovereignty of the nation, and the commune was urged into every kind of extravagance and excess by its procurator Chaumette, who had been formerly a monk, and consequently, like all nobles and priests, an object of suspicion; but he believed that the dissolution of these authorities would rather occasion a tumultuous anarchy. As to the assembling of new members at Bruges, that course would neither be able," said he, "to save the convention or supply its place. There was but one means, he thought, of defending oneself from the real dangers which threatened, without having recourse to extreme measures: this was to nominate a commission of twelve deputies, who should have it in charge to verify all the acts of the commune which had been passed during the last month, to gain information respecting any plots which might be carrying on in the interior, and to bring to light all the designs which had been formed against the national representation, to interrogate ministers, to collect from all the committees and all the authorities every needful information, and finally, be authorized to have at their disposal the necessary means of securing the persons of the conspirators."

The first flash of admiration and excitement past, the majority were very glad to adopt this conciliatory project of Barrère. Nothing was more common than the nomination of these commissions. On every fresh event, on every danger, on every new occasion, the assembly nominated a committee for the purpose of providing for the contingency, and from the very moment that individuals were appointed to carry any measure into execution, the assembly seemed to consider that the measure would, as a matter of course, be carried out, and that the committees should always possess energy, intelligence, or power, sufficient for the purpose of the assembly. The present committee, however, was not deficient in energy, for it was composed almost exclusively of members of the right side, of which number were Doyer Fonfrède, Rabaut Saint-Etienne, Kervégan, and Henry Larivière, all members of the Gironde. But the very energy of these deputies only hastened their downfall. Appointed for the purpose of protecting the convention from the violence of the Jacobins, they only aggravated their fury, and augmented that danger which they were called upon to avert. The Jacobins had daily menaced the Girondists in their harangues; the Girondists replied to these menaces by the constituting a commission; and to this menace the Jacobins finally prepared to reply by one fatal blow, in originating the events of the 31st of May and the 2nd of June.

This commission had scarcely been instituted when popular societies and sections cried out as usual, against an inquisition and martial law. The assembly of the Mairie, which had been adjourned to Sunday the 19th, again met, and was much more numerously attended than it had been before; but the mayor was not present, and an administrator of police presided. Some sections were also absent, and hardly thirty-five sent their commissaries. This assembly called itself the central revolutionary committee. It was agreed that no register should be kept, that nothing which transpired should be committed to writing, and that no one should be suffered to retire till the sitting was broken up. The questions to be discussed were then fixed upon. The avowed objects for which this association had been formed was to consider the best means of enforcing the loan, and to frame a new list of the suspected. But the first words that were uttered began by declaring the patriots of the convention incapable of saving the commonweal, that it therefore became necessary to make provision for such incapacity, consequently there was a necessity of apprehending suspected persons, whether they existed in the administrations, the sections, or in the assembly itself, and to put it out of their power of committing any mischief. One member coolly and deliberately asserted that he knew no suspicious characters but what were in the convention, and that the blow should first alight there. He then proposed a simple method of effecting this: it was, to seize upon the twenty-two deputies, to carry them off to a certain house in the faubourgs, and there murder them, and then to forge letters giving out that they had emigrated. "We need not do this ourselves," added he, "for if we pay for this service, it will be easy to find executioners." Another member replied that this proposition was impracticable, and that it would be better to wait till Robespierre and Marat had brought forward their measures of insurrection, which doubtless would be found more effective. "Silence," cried many voices, "no names." A third member, a deputy from the section of 92, considered it unjustifiable to resort to assassination, so long as tribunals existed to pass judgment upon the enemies of the republic. This observation produced much tumult; the doctrine it contained was loudly exclaimed against; it was observed that none were suffered there but those who could bring themselves to a level with existing circumstances, and that every one ought to accuse his neighbour if he had any suspicion of his want of energy. And instantly that person who had shewn his hankering after laws or tribunals was expelled the assembly. It was perceived, at the same time, that a member of the section of the Fraternity, a section very unfavourably disposed towards the Jacobins, was taking notes, and he was forthwith expelled in the same manner as the former. The assembly then continued, in the same tone, to set about the proscription of the deputies, discussed the locality that was to be the scene of this Septembrization, and ordered the imprisonment of other suspected persons both in the commune and the sections. One member wished the execution to take place that very night, but he was answered that it was impracticable; he replied, that they had men all ready, and added, that at midnight Coligny was at the court, and that at one o'clock he was dead*.

The time elapsed in these and similar propositions; the discussion of these different measures was put off to the following day, and it was settled they should discuss three questions: 1. the carrying off of the deputies; 2. the proscription list of the suspected; 3. the purging of all the public offices and committees. They then adjourned till six o'clock the following evening.

On Monday, the 20th, this assembly met again; on this occasion Pache was present. He was presented with several lists of suspected persons, containing names of every degree. Some members observed that it was necessary that no handwriting of a member should be known, and that therefore the lists should be re-copied; others declared that the republicans had nothing to fear. Pache said that it mattered little to him how many knew he had been furnished with these lists, for they concerned the police of Paris, which was under his charge. The subtle and reserved character of Pache did not fail in consistency, and he was not desirous of taking any part in what was required of him, beyond what was prescribed by the law and by his office.

One member, taking notice of these precautions, remarked that he must certainly be ignorant of what had passed the evening before, that he could not know the order of the questions, and that the first was the carrying off the twenty-two deputies. Pache then observed that the persons of all the deputies were confided to the protection of the city of Paris, and that to use personal violence against them would compromise the capital with the departments, and provoke a civil war. He was asked, why then had he signed the petition of the 15th of April against the twenty-two? He replied, that in that case he did no more than his duty, in placing his signature to a petition which had been given him to present to the convention; but that the question at present proposed travelled out of the commission of the assembly, who had met solely for the purposes of taking expedient measures with regard to the loan and the suspected persons; and that if such discussions as the present were continued, he should be obliged to break up the sitting. These observations caused a great disturbance; and as in the presence of Pache nothing could well be done, and as they had no taste for merely employing themselves upon the lists of suspected persons, they adjourned sine die.

* In evident allusion to the fate of Coligny, who perished in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in August, 1572, which lasted seven days: the present dark reference to this parallel of the September murders, seems to confirm what the author of Curiosities of Literature has asserted, viz. that this massacre, called by the world religieux, was by the French cabinet considered at that time merely as a political or state expedient. Trans.

On Tuesday, the 21st, there were no more than a dozen members present. Some were unwilling to assist at so tumultuous and violent a meeting; and others found that they were not able to deliberate there with sufficient energy.

It was at the club of the Cordeliers, therefore, that all the fury of the conspirators was on the next day, the 22nd, to discharge itself. The men, as well as women, uttered the most horrible yellings. It was an immediate insurrection that they wanted, and the blood of twenty-two deputies would not now satisfy them, but they thirsted for that of three hundred. One woman, speaking with the vehemence of her sex, proposed that all the citizens should assemble at the place de la Revolution, to present in a body a petition to the convention, and not go away until they had forced from them all those decrees which were indispensable to the public welfare. The young Varlet, who had been lately particularly conspicuous in every riot, presented some articles of a plan of insurrection; he proposed proceeding to the convention with the Rights of Man covered with erape, and carrying off all the deputies who belonged to the constituent and legislative assemblies, dismissing all the ministers, and putting the remainder of the Bourbon family to death. Legendre hastened to the tribune to protest against such proposals. The utmost pitch of his voice could hardly surmount the groans and the hootings which were directed against him, and with the greatest difficulty he proceeded with the utmost energy to combat the incendiary notions of young Varlet. Nevertheless, they would have a time fixed for the insurrection; they must needs appoint a day to go and demand of the convention what they desired: the night, however, being advanced, they all went away without having come to any decision whatever.

All Paris had been already apprised of what had been said, as well in the two assemblies held at the mayoralty on the 19th and 20th, as in the sitting of the Cordeliers of the 22nd. A great number of members of the central revolutionary committee had themselves denounced the designs which had there been then avowed, as well as the propositions which had been made; and the report of a conspiracy against a considerable body of citizens and deputies was every where circulated. The commission of twelve was informed of it with great minuteness, and prepared to put in action against the reputed authors of this plot the most violent measures.

The section of the Fraternity denounced them formally on the 24th, in an address to the convention; they reported what had been said and done in the assembly of the Mairie, and loudly accused the mayor himself of having assisted at the meeting. The right side seconded with their acclamations this spirited denunciation, demanding that Pache should be summoned to the bar. Marat replied, that the members of the right side were themselves the sole conspirators, and that Valazé, at whose house they were accustomed to meet every day, had advised them to arm themselves, in consequence of which they had repaired to the convention provided with pistols. "Yes!" exclaimed Valazé, "I did give this advice, because it became necessary to defend our lives, and by adopting my suggestion, we certainly should have preserved them." "Yes, yes!" energetically shouted all the members of the right side. Lasource added a fact of a very grave nature, namely, that the conspirators, apparently under the impression that the execution was to have taken place in the preceding night, came to his house for the purpose of carrying him off.

At this period, it was understood that the commission of twelve was supplied with all the necessary means for developing the conspiracy, and prosecuting its authors, and they announced their report thereon for the next day. The convention at the same time declared, that the section of the Fraternity had deserved well of the country.

On the evening of the same day, there was a great outcry at the municipality against the section of the Fraternity, who have, said they, calumniated the mayor and the patriots, by imagining that they were desirous of murdering the national representatives. Since the thing had been merely proposed, and had been opposed amongst others by the mayor, Chaumette, and the commune informed that it was calumnious to characterize it as an absolute conspiracy, it certainly could not be deemed one in the strict sense of the word; it did not resemble those plots hatched in profound secrecy, such as are often concerted within the walls of palaces, but was, on the contrary, such as the multitudinous populace of a great city might form; it was the commencement of those popular movements tumultuously proposed and tumultuously executed by the deluded mob, as on the 14th of July and on the 10th of August. In this sense, it was undoubtedly a conspiracy; but it is almost useless to endeavour to arrest the progress of these general commotions, for they do not aim at attacking unawares that power which is unsuspicious and slumbering, but strike openly and fearlessly at that authority which is awake and vigilant.

On the succeeding day, the 24th, two other sections, those of the Tuileries and the Butte-des-Moulins, joined themselves to that of the Fraternity, for the purpose of denouncing the same proceedings. "If reason," said the section of the Butte-des-Moulins, "is not sufficient to weigh with them, make an appeal to the good citizens of Paris, and we can assure you, beforehand, that our section will itself contribute not a little to prostrate again to the dust these disguised royalists, who insolently assume the designation of sans-culottes." On this very day, the mayor wrote to the assembly an explanation of what had passed at the Mairie. "It was not," said he, "a conspiracy; it was a mere deliberation upon framing the lists of suspected persons. Certain hot-headed individuals had, it is true, interrupted the proceedings by the introduction of some unreasonable propositions, but as for Pache he had himself called to order those who had travelled out of the commission; but these ebullitions of the imagination were productive of no result." Little regard, however, was paid to this letter of Pache, whilst they listened to the Commission of Twelve, who presented themselves in order to suggest a decree of general safety. This decree placed the national representation, and the députés which contained the public treasure, under the safeguard and protection of the good citizens. All were required, at the sound of drum, to repair to the point for mustering the company of the quarter, and to march at the first signal which should be given. No one was to be absent from the appointed place; and, during the nomination of a commandant-general, to fill the situation of Santerro, who had departed for La Vendée, the oldest officer of the legion was to have the superior command. The meetings of the section were to be closed at ten o'clock in the evening, and their presidents were made responsible for the execution of this article. The draft of this decree was adopted without amendment, notwithstanding several debates, and the opinion of Danton, who said, that in thus putting the assembly and other public establishments under the protection of the citizens of Paris, they decreed an acknowledgment of their own pusillanimity (on decroûtail la peur).

Immediately after having proposed this decree, the commission of twelve at once arrested the two administrators of police, Marino and Michel, who were accused of having, at the assembly of the Mairie, made those propositions which had been productive of so much alarm. Besides these, they also arrested the deputy of the procurator of the commune, named Hébert; a man who, under the style of Père Duchêne, had written a newspaper sheet still more abominable than that of Marat, and which he had, by a style of language, at once grovelling and revolting, levelled to the capacity of the lowest dregs of the populace. Hébert, in this newspaper, openly printed and published all the obnoxious things which the aforesaid Michel and Marino were accused of having verbally suggested at the Mairie. The commission appeared to think it their duty to prosecute both those who recommended, and those who would have executed a new insurrection. Scarcely was the mandate of arrest sent forth against Hébert, before he repaired in all haste to the commune to announce what had happened to him, and to show to the general council the mandate of arrest by which a blow had been struck at him. It would tear him away, he said, from the execution of all his functions, but nevertheless, he would obey it. The commune, he was sure, would not forget the oath they had taken, to consider themselves as collectively attacked in the person of one of their members. He did not invoke the recollection of this oath on his own account, for he was ready to lose his head on the scaffold, but on the part of his fellow-citizens, thus menaced with a new kind of slavery. Numerous cheers followed this harangue of Hébert. Chaumette, the procurator-in-chief, embraced him, as did also the president, in the name of the whole council. The sitting was declared permanent until they should receive tidings of Hébert. The members of the council were recommended to carry their condolences and assistance to the wives and children of all those who had been or should be imprisoned.

The sitting accordingly became permanent, and from hour to hour messengers were sent to the commission of twelve, to obtain news of their magistrate, who had been, to use his own expression, torn away from his functions. At half-past two o'clock in the morning, they learnt that he had undergone an interrogatory, and that Varlet had likewise been arrested. At four o'clock, it was announced that Hébert was imprisoned in the Abbaye. At five o'clock, Chaumette presented himself at the door of this prison, in order to obtain an interview with him, but he could not gain admission. In the morning, the council-general prepared a petition to the convention, and caused it to be carried by expresses through each of the sections, in order to secure their support. In almost every one of the sections great contrarities existed. They were every moment constantly desiring to change the bureaux and the presidents, to make or to annul arrests, to support or oppose the system of the commune, to sign or reject any petition emanating from it. In the sequel, this petition, approved by a great number of sections, was presented on the day of the 26th, to the convention. The deputation of the commune complained of the calumnies circulated against the magistrates of the people; they required that the petition of the section of the Fraternity should be referred to the public prosecutor, in order that the culpable parties, if any, or else the calumniators, should be brought to punishment. In short, they demanded justice to be done upon the commission of twelve, who had perpetrated violence on the person of one of the public magistrates, in abstracting him from his functions, and imprisoning him in the Abbaye. Isnard was at this time president, and in that character addressed the deputation. "Magistrates of the people," commenced he, with a grave and severe tone, "it is especially necessary that you hearken to important truths. France has confided her representatives to the city of Paris, and she charges herself with their preservation. If the national representation has been violated by either of those conspiracies by which we have been surrounded since the 10th of March, an evil from which the magistrates have been the last to preserve us; I declare, in the name of the republic, that Paris should have felt the vengeance of France, and her name should have been rased from the list of cities." This reply, solemn in itself, and delivered impressively, produced in the assembly a profound emotion; a multitude of voices demanded that it should be printed. Danton asserted that this was calculated to augment the division which had begun to display itself between the capital and the departments, and that there was no necessity for doing any thing which might be likely to add to that unhappiness. The convention, being of opinion that sufficient impression had been made by the delivery of the speech, and by the energetic proceedings of the Twelve, passed at once to the order of the day, without giving any directions for the proposed printing of the president's reply.

The deputies of the commune were thus dismissed without obtaining any thing. The remainder of the 25th, and the whole of the next day, the 26th, passed in the exhibition of disorderly scenes among the sections. They disputed on all hands, and different opinions were alternately uppermost, according to the hour of the day, or the greater or lesser number of persons of each party present. The commune continued to send messengers to inquire into the state of M. Hébert. At one time, they found him asleep; at another, you were not free; you were domineered over by those who preached up murder." Legendre, from his place, loudly exclaimed, "Their aim is to make us lose our sitting! I protest that if Lanjuinais continues his slanders, I will hurl him to the foot of the tribune!" This scandalous threat drew down censure from the assembly, and plaudits from the galleries. Guadet soon after demanded that the words of Legendre should be inserted in the minutes and circulated throughout France, that she might know how her deputies were treated. Lanjuinais, continuing, repeated that the decree of the past night had not been lawfully carried, since the petitioners had voted along with the deputies; or, even were that not the case, the matter should be reconsidered, as, at all events, the assembly was not then unbiased. "When you are free," added Lanjuinais, "you do not vote impunity to crime." On the left, it was affirmed that Lanjuinais falsified the facts: that the petitioners had not voted, that they had even retired into the passages. On the right, the contrary was maintained; and without being heard at all on this point, they put to the vote the repeal of the decree, which was carried by a majority of fifty-one. "You have done," then exclaimed Danton, "a great act of justice, and I hope that, before the end of the sitting, it will be again brought forward. But if the commission which you are now about to re-establish retains the exercise of its tyrannical powers, if the magistrates of the people are not restored to liberty and their functions, then I declare to you that, after having proved that we surpass our enemies in prudence and sagacity, we shall also prove that we are capable of going beyond them in audacity and revolutionary vigour." The provisional enlargement of the arrested parties was then put to the vote, and carried unanimously. Rabaut St. Etienne wished to be heard on the part of the commission of twelve; he called for attention in the name of the public safety, but could not make himself be heard; in conclusion, he gave in his resignation.

The decree was thus repealed, and the regaining of the majority by the right side appeared to prove that it had only appertained to the left during some moments of distraction. Although the magistrates in question had been released, although Hébert had been restored to the commune, where he was received with garlands, notwithstanding this, the repeal of the decree had raised up a multitude of passions, and the storm which had appeared to have subsided for a moment, began to bluster anew with terrible violence.

The same day, the assembly which had been held at the Mairie, and which had ceased to meet since the mayor had prohibited the discussion of the propositions denominated those of the public welfare, was called together again at the Evêché in the electoral club, whither several electors occasionally resorted. This assembly was composed of commissaries of the sections, chosen in the committees of superintendence, of commissaries of the commune, of the department, and of various clubs. Even the women were represented there, and out of a number of five hundred persons a hundred females might be counted, at the head of whom one was placed who had been rendered conspicuous by her political ravings and popular eloquence. On the first day there appeared at this meeting no more than the deputies from thirty-six sections; there remained twelve who had not deputed any commissaries; and to these a fresh summons was addressed. The assembly occupied itself at length in naming a commission of six members, charged with the consideration of, and report upon, the measures to be adopted for ensuring the general safety. After this preliminary act, they adjourned till the morrow, the 29th.

The same evening, a great tumult occurred among the sections; in spite of the decree of the convention, by virtue of which their sittings were to close at ten o'clock, they prolonged them considerably later, constituting themselves at that hour into patriotic societies, under which new designation they carried their debates far into the night. In some of these meetings, fresh addresses were framed against the commission of twelve; in others, they drew up petitions to the assembly, demanding an explanation of the words of its president, Isnard,—"Paris shall be raised from the list of cities."

At the commune, Chaumette made a long speech on the palpable conspiracy which had been devised against liberty, the ministry, and the right side, &c. Hébert having come among them, related the particulars of his imprisonment; upon this, he received a garland (which he deposited upon the bust of J. J. Rousseau) and finally returned to his section, accompanied by the commissaries of the commune, who paraded in triumph the magistrate thus delivered from his fetters.

Next day, the 29th, the convention was afflicted with new intelligence of a distressing kind, coming from the two most important military points; the North and La Vendée. The army of the north had been repelled between Bouchain and Cambray, and the latter town and Valenciennes were deprived of all communication. At Fontenay the republican troops had been completely defeated by general Lescuré, who had taken possession of Fontenay itself. This news occasioned the greatest consternation, and rendered the state of the moderate party more dangerous. The sections came in procession with banners bearing these words—Resistance to oppression. Some among them required, as they had announced the preceding night, an explanation of the words of Isnard; others declared, that there was no other inviolability except that of the people, and that consequently those deputies who had sought to arm the departments against Paris should be impeached; that the commission of twelve should be annulled; that a revolutionary army should be organized, &c.

At the Jacobins the sitting was not without its special object. On all sides, it was proclaimed that the moment had arrived when it was at length necessary to save the people; and whenever a member presented himself to suggest the measures to be employed, he was referred to the commission of six, nominated at the central club. "That," said they, "has it in charge to provide for every thing, and to pursue the means of securing the public welfare." Legendre, wishing to speak of the dangers of the day, and of the necessity of exhausting lawful measures before recourse was had to extremities, was treated as a double dealer. Robespierre, without explaining himself, said that it was for the commune to closely identify itself with the people; that, as for himself, he was incapable of prescribing the means of security; that such a service was not to be accomplished by any single man, certainly not by him, worn out by four years of revolution, and consumed by a fever, slow, yet mortal.

These words from the tribune made a great sensation, and called forth animated cheers. These words sufficiently indicated that he as well as every body else deferred taking any settled course until it had been settled by the municipal authority at the Evêché what they would do. This assembly of the Evêché, again met, and, as on the preceding night, a considerable number of females mixed with the members. Its first act was to impart confidence to propriétaires by swearing to respect property. Property was respected, said they, even on the 10th of August and 14th of July; and instantly they took the oath to respect it on the 31st of May, 1793. After this, Dufourny, member of the commission of six, said that, without a commandant-general of the Parisian guard, it would be impossible to answer for any favourable result, and that he felt himself called on to demand the nomination of one without delay by the commune. A woman, the celebrated Lacombe, seconded the motion of Dufourny, declaring, that without prompt and vigorous measures it would be impossible to protect themselves. On this, they despatched deputies to the commune, and that body replied much in the language adopted by Pache, that the mode of nominating a commandant-general was by the regulated decrees of the convention, and inasmuch as this mode prohibited the commune from naming one itself, all they could do therefore was to wish them success. It was in point of fact nothing more than a recommendation to the club to consider this appointment among the number of those extraordinary measures it behoved them to take for that public welfare which they were bound to protect. The assembly subsequently invited all the cantons of the departments to unite themselves with it, and despatched deputies for that purpose to Versailles. A blind confidence was required in the name of the six, and a promise was exacted that all their suggestions should be executed without examination. Silence was prescribed on every subject which regarded the grand question of the means, and they adjourned until the following morning at nine o'clock, in order then to commence a sitting which should be permanent and decisive.

The commission of twelve was apprized of all this the same evening: the committee of public safety knew it also, and learnt besides, by means of a placard printed in the course of the day, that there had been suspicious private meetings at Charenton, at which Danton, Marat, and Robespierre had attended. The committee of public welfare, profiting by a moment at which Danton was absent from it, commanded the minister of the interior to make the most active inquiry for the discovery of this secret suspicious meeting. Nothing, however, was discovered, and every inquiry tended to prove that the rumours were groundless. It appeared altogether a fabrication, originating with the municipal assembly. Robespierre ardently desired a revolution which should be openly directed against his antagonists the Girondists, but he did not choose to compromise himself in order to forward such a scheme; it was enough for him to let it take its course, as he had repeatedly done in former instances during the month of May. In fact, his language held to the Jacobins, wherein he said that the commune ought to closely identify itself with the people, and devise those means he was unable of himself to suggest, was an actual connivance at insurrection*. This acquiescence was quite sufficient, and there was excitement enough at the central club to operate, without mixing himself up with their proceedings. As for Marat, he aided the movement by his newspapers, and by his outrageous behaviour every day at the convention, but he was not one of the commission of six, absolutely charged with the insurrection. The only man who could be suspected to have been the concealed author of this movement was Danton, but he was irresolute; he desired the abolition of the commission of twelve, yet at the same time he did not wish that any interference with the national representation should take place. Meilhan, meeting him in the course of the day at the committee of public safety, accosted him, conversed with him amicably, and gave him to understand the distinction the Girondists made between him and Robespierre, what consideration they had for his great influence, and ended by observing what a grand part he would be enabled to play by using his power for the general benefit, and the support of honest men. Danton, affected by these words, hastily raised his head, and said to Meilhan, "You Girondists have no confidence in me." Meilhan renewed his former assertions. "They have no kind of confidence," repeated Danton, who parted without desiring to continue the conversation. These expressions completely demonstrated the bias of this man. He despised this municipal populace; he had no taste either for Robespierre or Marat, and would have preferred to place himself at the head of the Girondists, had he not known them destitute of all confidence in him. A difference both of conduct and principles separated them entirely; besides this, Danton could not discover, either in their character or opinions, that energy which was requisite in order to preserve the revolution, the grand object which he regarded beyond every thing else. Danton, indifferent to persons, sought but to distinguish that one of the two parties who could ensure to the revolution the most certain and rapid progress. Possessing entire control over the Cordeliers and the commission of six, it is to be presumed, that he had a great part in the movement which was then preparing, and it appeared as if he would first of all have overthrown the commission of twelve, sure enough of seeing what he wished come to pass afterwards with respect to the Girondists.

At length, the scheme of the insurrection was formed in the heads of the conspirators of the central revolutionary club. They did not intend, to use their own expression, to create a physical insurrection, but one altogether moral; to respect persons and property; in short, to violate, in the most methodical manner possible, both the laws and the liberty of the convention. Their scope was to put the commune into a state of insurrection, to summon in its name all the armed force which it had the right of calling out, to surround the convention with this armed body, and to make an address to it, which should in form seem nought else than a petition, but in substance should operate as a command; they meant, in a word, to petition sword in hand.

On Thursday, the 30th, the commissioners of the sections assembled at the Evêché, and formed themselves into what they called the Republican Union. Invested with full powers from all the sections, they declared themselves in insurrection for the purpose of preserving the common weal, menaced by an aristocratical and liberty-oppressing faction. The mayor, persisting in his ordinary line of conduct, made certain representations as to the character of this measure, which, however, he contented himself by mildly protesting against, and concluded by rendering obedience to the insurgents, who ordered him to repair to the commune to proclaim what they were about to decree. It was in the sequel resolved that the forty-eight sections should be assembled for the purpose of promulgating, that same day, their resolution in regard to the intended insurrection, and that immediately afterwards the tocsin should be rung, the barriers closed, and the générale beaten in all the streets. The sections accordingly did assemble, and the day passed in collecting, in an uproarious manner, the vote in favour of the insurrection. The committee of public welfare, and the commission of twelve, sent messengers to the authorities to ascertain what all this meant. The mayor informed them, with a show at least of apparent regret, of the plan formed at the Evêché. L'Huillier, procurator-syndic of the department, declared openly and with a calm confidence of manner, the present scheme of this entirely moral insurrection, and he then quietly rejoined his colleagues.

Thus terminated the proceedings of the day, and at dusk the clang of the tocsin, and the beating of the générale, resounded through every street, the barriers were closed, and the citizens asked each other in amaze whether new massacres were not about to dabble the capital with their blood. All the deputies of the Gironde, as well as the threatened ministers, passed that night from home. Roland went to hide himself at the house of a friend. Buzot, Louvet, Barbaroux, Guadet, Bergoing, and Rabaut St. Etienne, intrenched themselves in a detached room, furnished with good weapons of defence, and ready, in case of attack, to defend themselves to the last drop of their blood. At five o'clock in the morning, they issued forth with the intent of delivering themselves up to the convention, where, under favour of the early dawn, several members had already assembled, summoned thither by the tocsin. Their arms, which they carried openly, prevented their being attacked by the crowds through whom they passed, and they arrived at the convention, where they already found several Mountainers, and where Danton was chatting with Garat. "Observe," exclaimed Louvet to Guadet, "what horrible expectation lightens up those countenances." "Doubtless," replied Guadet, "it is to-day that Clodius exiles Cicero." Garat, who on his part had been astonished to find Danton thus early at the assembly, observed him attentively. "Why all this uproar!" said he to Danton, "and what would they have!" "Nothing will come of it," replied the latter, dryly, "we must let them break up a few printers' presses*, and send them about their business afterwards." Twenty-eight deputies were present. Fermont occupied, for a moment, the chair; Guadet sat boldly as his secretary; the number of deputies continued to increase, and they awaited the moment to open the sitting.

Meanwhile, the insurrection was carried into effect at the commune. The delegates of the central revolutionary committee, having at their head the president Dobsen, presented themselves at the Hotel de Ville, provided with full revolutionary powers. Dobsen commenced his address by declaring to the council-general that the people of Paris, deprived of their rights, were about to annul all the constituted authorities. The vice-president of the council required to be apprized of the powers of the committee. He examined them, and finding they expressed the resolution of thirty-three sections of Paris, he declared that the majority of the sections abrogated the constituted authorities. In consequence, the council-general and its officers retired; Dobsen, with the commissaries, assumed the vacant place amidst shouts of "Long live the Republic!" He subsequently deliberated with this new assembly, and proposed to reinstate the municipality and council-general in all their functions, seeing that neither the one or the other had ever been wanting in their duty towards the people. Immediately on this, they restored the old municipality and council-general with loud acclamations. The intent of these apparent formalities was no other than to revive the municipal authorities with additional powers, which should, indeed, be unlimited, and sufficient for the purposes of the insurrection. Immediately after this, a new provisional commandant-general was proposed. This person was named Henriot, a coarse sort of man, devoted to the commune, and commandant of the battalion of sans-culottes. In order to ensure the assistance of the people, and to keep itself in an armed state during these moments of agitation, it was decreed that forty sous per day should be given to each of the poorer citizens on service, and that these should be immediately chargeable on the produce of a forced loan, to be levied on the wealthy. This was a sure means of arming in the interests of the commune and against those of the sections, all the working-men, who preferred gaining forty sous a day, by taking part in these revolutionary measures, to earning thirty by working at their customary employments.

During the time that all these determinations were forming at the commune, the citizens of the capital assembled at the sound of the tocsin, and collected round a flag, posted at the door of each captain of a section. A great number knew not what to think of these movements; many inquired of each other why they had assembled, ignorant of the measures which had been taken during the night, both by the commune and sections. In this state of mind, they were incapable either of acting for themselves, or showing any resistance to what might strike them as being wrong; and thus, while they all heartily disapproved of the insurrection, they appeared to be countenancing it by their presence.

sence. Upwards of 80,000 armed men traversed the streets of Paris with the utmost tranquillity, suffering themselves to be quietly led, by the audacious authority which had thus assumed the reins of government. The sections of the Buttes-Moulins, Mail, and the Champs Elysées, who had long declared themselves against the commune and the Mountain, were alone prepared to offer resistance, inasmuch as the danger which they partook in common with the Girondists, inspired them with a little more courage. They assembled together, armed, and awaited what should take place, in the attitude of men who believed themselves menaced, and stood on the defensive. The Jacobins and sans-culottes, dismayed by these manifestations of resistance, and always apt to magnify appearances, ran about in the Faubourg St. Antoine, crying out that the revolted sections were about to hoist the cockade and white flag, and that it was necessary to resort to the centre of Paris, in order to put a stop to a royalist explosion. In order to excite a more general impulse, it was proposed to fire the alarm gun. This had been placed at the Pont Neuf, and the punishment of death was awarded against any one who should fire or cause it to be fired without the decree of the convention. Herriot, however, gave orders to fire, but the commandant of the post had refused to obey this order, and required a decree to warrant him in so doing. The messengers of Herriot being reinforced, the commandant and his adherents were overcome, and in a moment the report of the alarm-gun was added to the noise occasioned by the tocsin and the beating of the générale.

The convention having met early in the morning, issued warrants on the instant to all the various authorities, requiring to be informed of the actual situation of the capital. Garat, who was present in the hall, and had been employed in attendance upon Danton, was the first of those who appeared at the tribune, and he reported nothing but what was already well known, namely, that an assembly had been held at the Evêché, which had demanded a reparation of the injuries that had been inflicted upon Paris, as well as the abolition of the commission of twelve. Scarcely had Garat finished speaking, when the new commissaries, styling themselves the administration of the department of the Seine, presented themselves at the bar, and declared that they were carrying on nothing but a purely moral insurrection, which had for its object reparation for the outrages that had been inflicted upon the city of Paris. They added, that the greatest order was preserved, that each citizen had sworn to respect both persons and property, that the armed citizens traversed the streets inoffensively, and that all the assembled authorities would arrive in the course of the day to communicate to the convention their professions of attachment and their requisitions.

The president, Mallarmé, immediately communicated a note from the commandant of the post at the Pont Neuf, reporting the contest which had arisen respecting the alarm-gun. Dufriche-Valazé instantly demanded that the authors of this movement should be looked to, as well as those who had reprehensibly rung the tocsin, and that the commandant should be arrested who had been audacious enough to cause the alarm-gun to be fired without the decree of the convention. At this demand, the galleries and the left side raised an outcry which it was no more than natural should excite some apprehension. It did not, however, discourage Valazé. He said that they should not induce him to compromise his character; that he was a representative of twenty-five millions of men, and that he would persevere in his duty to the last. He demanded, in conclusion, that they should on the instant give audience to the commission of twelve, which had been so calumniated, and that they should listen to its report, for that what had occurred afforded proof of those conspiracies which it had never ceased to denounce. Thuriot replied to this speech of Valazé; words ran high, and a disturbance commenced. Mathieu and Cambon endeavoured to act as mediators; they implored silence from the galleries, and moderation from the orators of the right side, and strove to impress on all parties that, at this precise time, a conflict in the metropolis would be fatal to the revolutionary cause; that quiet was the only means of maintaining the dignity of the convention, which dignity was, in its turn, the sole means by which that assembly could succeed in making itself respected by the malcontents. Vergniaud, disposed, like Mathieu and Cambon, to employ conciliatory methods, professed that he also regarded the contest in which they seemed ready to engage as fatal to liberty and the revolution. He confined himself, afterwards, to reproaching Thuriot, although mildly, with having sought to aggravate the dangers under which the commission of twelve already lay, by depicting it as the scourge of France, at the very moment when every popular movement was directed against it. He was of opinion that if it had been guilty of arbitrary exercises of power, it was just to dissolve it; but that it should first be heard; and that since its report would necessarily tend to rouse the passions, it would be politic to delay it until a calmer moment. This, according to his notion, was the only means to maintain the dignity of the assembly, and to demonstrate that it was not acting under restraint. For the present, it was most desirable to ascertain who had given, in Paris, the order to sound the tocsin and to fire the alarm-gun; they ought not, at least, to hesitate in summoning to their bar the provisional commandant-general. "I repeat to you," exclaimed Vergniaud, in conclusion, "that, whatever may be the issue of the combat in which we may engage to-day, it will bring with it, in its train, the destruction of liberty; let us swear, then, to remain firm to our duty, and to die each of us at his post, rather than abandon the common weal." The assembly rose immediately, and took the oath proposed by Vergniaud. Subsequently, they debated on the proposition of summoning the commandant-general to the bar. Danton, upon whom, at this moment, all eyes were fixed, and of whom the Girondists and the Mountaineers had appeared to demand whether he were the originator of the movements of the day, presented himself at the tribune, and at once obtained the most profound attention. "What we must first do," said he, "is to suppress the commission of twelve. That is a far more important point than to summon to our bar the commandant-general.

It is to men endowed with political understanding that I address myself. To call Henriot before us will answer no purpose in the present state of things; for it is not desirable to trouble ourselves with the instrument, but with the cause of these disturbances. Now this cause is the commission of twelve. I do not pretend to decide on its conduct or its actions; it is not for having committed arbitrary arrests that I attack it—it is as being an impolitic institution that I call upon you to put it down." "Impolitic?" exclaimed they on the right side, "we do not quite comprehend that." "Do not you comprehend it?" rejoined Danton; "then it is necessary to explain it to you. This commission was constituted for no other purpose than to repress the popular energy, and it has not been considered that it is this very spirit of moderation which will destroy the revolution and France itself. This commission has devoted itself to the prosecution of those energetic magistrates whose only fault was the awakening of the public ardour. I will not pause to examine whether these prosecutions have not been made subservient to personal resentments, but it has unequivocally shown a disposition which we ought this day to condemn. You yourselves, on the report of your minister of the interior, whose character is so mild, whose spirit is so impartial, so pure, have enlarged those individuals whom the commission of twelve had imprisoned: what then are you about with the commission itself, since you annul its acts? The cannon has pealed, the people have risen, and we should do right to thank the people for their energy in the interest of that self-same cause which we support; and if you are politio legislators, you will yourselves applaud their spirit, you will retrace your own errors, and you will abolish your commission. I address myself," again exclaimed Danton, "only to those men whose eyes are open to our situation, and not to such dull beings as, in the midst of those grand movements, listen but to the language of their own passions. Hesitate not, therefore, to satisfy the people." "What people?" shouted the members on the right side. "What people?" returned Danton, "this immense population, which is our advanced sentinel, which hates vehemently both tyranny and the cowardly moderation which would restore it. Hasten to satisfy it; save it from the aristocrats; save it from the effects of its own fury; and if, when it shall have been satisfied, any perverse men (no matter to what party they may appertain) should desire to prolong an insurrection then become useless, Paris itself will compel them to shrink back into their own nothingness."

Rabaut St. Etienne sought to justify the commission of twelve on the score of good policy, and set himself to prove that nothing could be more politic than to create a commission to discover the plots of Pitt and of Austria, who fomented by the influence of their secret service money, all the disturbances that existed in France. "Down!" cried some, "let us hear no more of Rabaut!" "No!" exclaimed Bazin, "leave him to himself; he is a liar! I will prove that his commission has organized civil war in Paris." Rabaut endeavoured to proceed. Marat requested the admission of a deputation from the commune. "Permit me first to conclude," said Rabaut. "The commune! the commune! the commune!" shouted the galleries and the Mountain. "I must declare," replied Rabaut, "that when I would address to you the words of truth, you have interrupted me." "Well, then, conclude!" said they to him. Rabaut then finished by suggesting that the commission might be suppressed if they pleased; but that the committee of public welfare should be immediately charged to pursue all those inquiries which they had already commenced.

The deputation from the insurrectional commune was now introduced. "A grand conspiracy has been formed," said this deputation, "but it has also been discovered; the people, who aroused themselves on the 14th of July, and the 10th of August, to overthrow tyranny, have risen anew to stop the counter-revolution. The council-general has sent us to explain to you the measures which it has adopted. The first has been, to place property under the safeguard of republicans; the second, to allow forty sous a day to those citizens who consent to remain under arms; the third, to frame a commission for the purpose of communicating with the convention during the period of agitation. The council-general conjure you to appoint for this commission a hall immediately proximate to your own, where its members may sit and co-operate with you."

Scarcely had the deputation ceased its address, when Guadet presented himself, for the purpose of replying to their demands. This was not the member among the Girondists whose presence was best calculated to allay the excitement of the passions. "The commune," said he, "in pretending to have discovered a conspiracy, is only deceived in one word: it should have said that it has executed one." Groans from the galleries interrupted him. Vergniaud moved that they should be cleared. A horrible tumult arose on this, and nothing could be heard but confused outcries during a considerable space of time. The president, Mallarmé, repeated, but in vain, that if the convention were not respected, it would put in force the authority with which the laws had invested it. Guadet occupied the tribune throughout the uproar, and hardly contrived to get a sentence heard now and then in the intervals of this disorder. In the end, he proposed that the convention should suspend its deliberations until its liberty should be secured, and that the commission of twelve should be charged to prosecute, on the instant, all those who had sounded the tocsin and fired the alarm-gun. Such a proposition as this was not calculated to appease the tumult. Vergniaud would have re-appeared at the tribune to restore a little calm, but a fresh deputation from the municipality arrived to reiterate the requisitions it had already made. The convention, pressed anew, could no longer hold out, and decreed that the workmen embodied to watch over public order and property, should receive forty sous per day*; and that a chamber should be provided for the commissaries of the

After this decree, Couthon was about to reply to Guadet, and the day, already far advanced, was consumed in discussions destitute of any result. All the male population of Paris, assembled under arms, continued to march through the city, with the greatest regularity, and in the same uncertainty of object. The commune occupied itself in framing new addresses relating to the commission of twelve, and the assembly ceased not to agitate itself either for or against the commission. Vergniaud, who happened to go for a moment out of the hall, and who had thus witnessed the singular spectacle of a whole population not knowing what part to take, and ready to obey blindly the first authority which should assume the direction of it, considered in what way there was a chance of profiting by this tendency, and brought forward a motion, the scope of which was to distinguish the agitators of the Parisian people, and to attach the latter to himself by a demonstration of confidence. "I am," said he to the assembly, "far from accusing either the majority or minority of the city of Paris; this day will serve to render evident the great affection Paris has for liberty. It is sufficient to walk through the streets, in order to perceive the order which reigns therein, the numerous patrols which promenade there. The sight of this touching spectacle affords sufficient ground to declare that Paris has deserved well at the hands of the whole country."

At these words, all the assembly rose, and voted with acclamations that Paris had deserved well of the country. The Mountain and the galleries applauded, surprised to hear such a proposition issue from the mouth of Vergniaud. This motion was, doubtless, but a mere flattering demonstration, exceedingly well managed, but could not afford the means of awakening the zeal of the sections, nor could such a mark of confidence bring round him those who had all along approved of the proceedings of the commune, or infuse sufficient courage and spirit to enable them to successfully resist the progress of the insurrection.

At this moment, the section of the Faubourg St. Antoine, excited by the emissaries who had come to tell them that the Butte-des-Moulins had displayed the white cockade, came down towards the interior of Paris with its guns, and stopped at some paces from the Palais-Royal, where the section of the Butte-des-Moulins had intrenched itself. The latter had put itself in order of battle in the garden, had closed all the gates, and held itself ready with its guns, to stand a siege in case of attack. Outside, the people still circulated the report that it had mounted the white cockade and flag, and urged the section of the Faubourg St. Antoine to commence the attack. Nevertheless, several officers of the latter represented that, before proceeding to these extremities, it was requisite to assure themselves of the facts, and endeavour to put matters upon a right footing. They presented themselves at the gates, and demanded to speak with the officers of the Butte-des-Moulins. They were admitted, and found no colours but the national flags. Then followed explanations and mutual embraces: the St. Antoine officers returned to their battalions, and immediately after, the reconciled sections united with each other, and traversed the streets of Paris together.

Thus the submission became hourly more general, and they left the new commune to continue their squabbles with the convention. At this moment, Barrère, always ready to suggest temporizing plans, proposed, in the name of the committee of public welfare, to abolish the commission of twelve, but at the same time to place the armed force at the disposal of the convention. Whilst he was explaining his scheme, a third deputation arrived, to express their final intentions to the assembly, in the name of the department, of the commune, and of the commissaries of sections, at a special meeting at the Bréché.

The procurator-syndic of the department, L'Huillier, addressed the assembly.

"Legislators," said he, "for a long time past, the city and department of Paris have been calumniated in the eyes of the world. The same men who have sought to ruin Paris in the public estimation are those who favoured the massacres of La Vendée; they are those who flatter and support the hopes of our enemies; they are those who degrade the constituted authorities, and seek to mislead the people, in order that they may possess the right to make complaints against them; they are those who have denounced to you imaginary plots, in order to create real ones; they are those who have demanded at your hands the commission of twelve to oppress the liberty of the people; they are those, in short, who, by a wicked agitation, by addresses stuffed with false suggestions, and by their correspondences, maintain animosities and divisions in your hearts, and deprive their country of the greatest of benefits, that of a good constitution, which it has earned by so many sacrifices."

After this vehement apostrophe, L'Huillier denounced projects of federalism, declared that the city of Paris would perish in order to sustain the unity of the republic, and demanded justice for the celebrated words of Isnard, "Paris shall be raised from the list of cities."

"Legislators!" exclaimed he, "was the project of destroying Paris well formed? Would you have desolated this sacred dépôt of the arts and of human knowledge?" After these affected lamentations, he demanded vengeance against Isnard, the twelve, and many other culprits, such as Brissot, Guadet, Vergniaud, Gensonné, Buzot, Barbaroux, Roland, Lebrun, Clavière, &c.

The right side remained silent, the left applauded, as did also the galleries. The president, Grégoire, replied to L'Huillier by emphatic praises of Paris, and invited the deputation to the honours of the session. The petitioners who composed it were mixed up with a great crowd of people, too numerous to be accommodated at the bar; they went and placed themselves by the side of the Mountain, who received them with eagerness, and made way for them. A multitude of unknown persons was then dispersed throughout the hall, and mixed with the assembly itself. The galleries, at this spectacle of fraternity between the people and their representatives, reiterated their plaudits. Osselin immediately moved that the petition should be printed, and that they should deliberate upon its contents, according to a draft framed by Barrère. "President," exclaimed Vergniaud, "consult the assembly, and ascertain whether it will enter into a debate in its present state." "Put the project of Barrère to the vote," cried they on the left. "We protest," returned the members on the right, "against all debate." "The convention is not free," said Doucet. "Well, then," replied Levasseur, "let the left side go over towards the right, and then the members will be distinct from the petitioners, and can then debate." At this suggestion, the Mountain hastened to pass over to the right side, and for a moment the two parties were confounded together, and the benches of the Mountain were entirely abandoned to the petitioners. They put to vote the printing of the address, which was carried. "To the vote with the project of Barrère!" was then shouted. "We are not free," replied several members of the assembly. "I propose," exclaimed Vergniaud, "that the convention should go and join the armed force, by which it is surrounded, in order to seek protection against the violence it is now suffering." On concluding these words, he left the hall, followed by a great number of his colleagues. The Mountain and the tribunes applauded ironically on this departure of the right side. The Plain remained undecided and alarmed. "I propose," immediately exclaimed Chabot, "that the names of the members shall be called over, in order to distinguish the absence of those who have deserted their post." At this moment, Vergniaud and those who had followed him re-entered, apparently quite overwhelmed with chagrin; for this retreat of theirs, which would have been imposing had it been adopted by the assembly, now became petty and ridiculous. Vergniaud attempted to speak, but Robespierre would not give up to him the tribune, which he occupied. He kept possession of it, exploring the adoption of prompt and energetic measures, in order to satisfy the people; and he proposed that, besides the suppression of the commission of twelve, severe measures should also be adopted against its members. He went afterwards, at great length, into the consideration of the draft of Barrère's bill, and stated his objection to that article which placed the armed force at the disposal of the convention. "Now make an end!" impatiently exclaimed Vergniaud. "Yes," answered Robespierre, "I shall make an end, but it shall be with you! With you, who, after the revolution of the 10th of August, have endeavoured to lead to the scaffold those who made it! Against you, who have never ceased to call for the destruction of Paris! With you, who would have saved the tyrant! With you, who have conspired with Dumouriez! My ending is, an impeachment against all the accomplices of Dumouriez, including those names specified by the petitioners."

After long and vehement acclamations, a decree was drafted, put to the vote, and adopted, amidst a tumult so great that it was not without great difficulty that the fact of its containing a sufficient number of voters could be ascertained. It purported that the commission of twelve should be suppressed; that its papers should be seized, and their contents reported within three days; that the armed force should remain in permanent requisition; that the constituted authorities should render an account to the convention of the means taken to secure general tranquillity; that the detected conspiracies should be prosecuted, and that a proclamation should be issued, for the purpose of conveying to all France a correct statement of the proceedings of this day, which the evil-disposed would doubtless strive to misrepresent.

It was now 10 o'clock at night, and already the Jacobins and the commune complained that the day had passed away without producing any result. The decree adopted, although it did not decide anything as to the persons of the Girondists, yet was the first point gained at which they rejoiced, and at which they obliged the oppressed convention to rejoice also. The commune immediately caused the entire city to be illuminated. They formed a civic procession by the light of flambeaux; the sections walked mixed with each other, that of the Faubourg St. Antoine with those of the Butte-des-Moulins and of the Mail; the deputies from the Mountain, together with the president, were compelled to bear part in this procession, and the victors even forced the vanquished to celebrate their own defeat.

The character of this day was sufficiently obvious. The insurgents wished to do every thing according to form, they did not desire to abolish the convention, but whilst obtaining from it whatever it required, they made a show of preserving respect for it. The timid members of the Plain lent themselves willingly to this deception, which tended to impress a belief that they were still free, although acting under restraint in everything they did. They had, in effect, abolished the commission of twelve, and suspended the decision on its conduct for three days, in order to prevent the appearance of having been compelled to yield. They had not awarded to the convention the disposal of the armed force, but had decided that a statement should be submitted to it of the arrangements that were made, in order that the show of sovereignty might be maintained; in conclusion, a proclamation was suggested, for the purpose of declaring officially, that the convention had no cause for fear, and that it was perfectly free.

The next day, Barrère was charged with the framing of this proclamation, and he disguised the proceedings of the 31st of May with that dexterity which he was known to possess, and which made him always seek to furnish to the weak an honest pretext for submitting to the strong. Too rigorous measures, he said, had excited discontent; the people had risen calmly but energetically; had proclaimed, in the first place, respect for property; notwithstanding they had displayed themselves throughout the day, covered with their arms, they had respected the liberty of the convention, and the life of every one of its members, at the same time demanding an act of justice, which the convention had been eager to render. It was thus that Barrère expressed himself with regard to the abolition of this commission of twelve, an institution originating with himself.

On the 1st of June, tranquillity was far from being re-established. The meeting continued at the Evêché; the department, and the commune always specially summoned, were in session; the uproar had not subsided in the sections, and on all hands it was said, that only one-half had been obtained of what was desired, since the twenty-two preserved their seats in the convention. Disturbance, there-

In point of fact, all essential and substantive power was merged in the insurrectional assembly at the Evêché, while the legal authority was in the committee of public welfare, which had been invested with all the extraordinary powers of the convention. A hall had been appropriated on the 31st of May, where the constituted authorities might be enabled to correspond with the committee of public welfare. During the whole day of the 1st of June, the committee of public safety continued to send for the members of the insurrectional assembly, to learn from them what this revolted commune still required. What it wanted was but too evident; it was the arrest or the expulsion of those deputies by whom they had been so courageously resisted. All the members of the committee of public welfare were deeply affected by this measure. Delmas, Treillard, Bréard, were sincerely afflicted. Cambon, a grand advocate, as he always called himself, for revolutionary power, but scrupulously attached to legal forms, became indignant at the audacity of the commune, and said to Bouchette, successor of Beurnonville, and like Pache, a truckler to the Jacobins, "Minister of war, we are not blind; I see perfectly well that the employés of your Bureau are amongst the leaders and promoters of all this." Barrère, in spite of his customary discretion, began to grow indignant also, and exclaimed, "It is necessary to see, in this sad day's business, whether it be the commune of Paris, or whether it be the convention that represents the French republic." The Jacobin Lacroix, the friend and lieutenant of Danton, appeared in the eyes of his colleagues embarrassed by the outrage which was preparing to be attempted against the laws and the national representation. Danton, who had confined himself to the approving and strongly recommending the abolition of the commission of twelve, because he would have nothing done which might check the popular energy, Danton himself had desired that the national representation should be respected; but he foresaw, on the part of the Girondists, new disturbances and fresh resistance to the progress of the revolution, and had heartily wished to discover any method short of proscription for removing them. Garat suggested to him one plan for this purpose, and he eagerly grasped at it. All the ministers were present at the committee; Garat repaired thither with his colleagues. Deeply afflicted at the situation in which he found the leaders of the revolution with regard to each other, he conceived a generous idea, which might have the effect of restoring unanimity. "Recollect," said he, to the members of the committee, and particularly to Danton, "the quarrels of Themistocles and Aristides; the obstinacy of one in rejecting whatever was proposed by the other, and the dangers which they consequently brought upon their country. Recollect the generosity of Aristides, who, deeply affected with a sense of the evils they were mutually causing to the public, had the magnanimity to exclaim, 'O Athenians, you cannot become tranquil and happy, until you shall have cast both Themistocles and myself into the Barathrum.' Now," added Garat, "let the chiefs of the two sides of the assembly repeat the words of Aristides, and let them go in equal numbers into voluntary exile; from that moment our discords will be calmed; there will remain in the assembly sufficient talent to provide for the common weal, and the country will, in exercising this noble-minded ostracism, cherish the memory of those men who have withdrawn themselves for the purpose of preserving to it the blessings of peace." All the members of the committee were moved with this generous and politic suggestion. Delmas, Barrère, even the impetuous Cambon, were enchanted with the idea. Danton, who would thus be the first sacrificed, rose, with tears in his eyes, and said to Garat,—"You are right; I will go to the convention and propose this, and I will offer to be the first to repair, as hostage, to Bordeaux." They now separated, impressed with this noble-minded idea, in order to go and communicate it to the leaders of the two parties.—They addressed themselves particularly to Robespierre, with whom, however, such an act of self-denial by no means agreed, and who replied that it was nothing else than a snare laid for the Mountain, to get rid of its most courageous defenders. So that only a portion of this suggestion could be carried out, and that was the voluntary banishment of the Girondists, the Mountaineers having absolutely refused to conform to this self-sacrifice. Barrère, who was charged in the name of the committee of public welfare, to make the proposal to the former, in which the latter had not had the magnanimity to agree, then framed the draught of a decree, that a proposal should be made to the twenty-two and the members of the commission of twelve, that they should voluntarily resign their functions.

During this time, the definitive plan of the second insurrection was resolved upon in the assembly at the Evêché. It was complained, both there and among the Jacobins, that the energy of Danton had relaxed since the abolition of the commission of twelve. Marat proposed that they should go and demand of the convention, that the twenty-two should be put upon trial, and he recommended that this requisition should be obtained by compulsory measures. A short and energetic petition was accordingly drawn up for this purpose. The plan of insurrection was settled, not in the assembly, but in the executive committee charged with what were denominated measures for the public welfare, and composed of Varlet, the Dobsens, the Guzmans, and all those who had been constant agitators since the 21st of January. This committee agreed to surround the convention with an armed force, and not allow any of its members to leave the hall until they had passed the required act. To this end, it was necessary to recall to Paris the troops which had been destined for La Vendée, and which they had taken good care to detain in the barracks of Courbevoie. They believed they could obtain from these battalions as well as from some others under their control that co-operation which they might not have been able to have obtained from the guard of the sections. By surrounding the National Palace with these devoted troops, and keeping, as on the 31st of May, the remainder of the armed force at their command and in ignorance, they conceived it would be easy to forestall all resistance from the convention. It was Henriot to whom was again confided the command of the troops collected round the National Palace. It was this then that they promised themselves for the next day, Sunday the 2nd of June. But in the evening of Saturday, they wished to see whether one last resource would not avail them, and to experimentalize upon some new requisition. As it was, this evening they beat the générale and rung the tocsin: upon this the committee of public welfare lost no time in summoning the convention to a session in the midst of this new political tempest.

At this juncture, the Girondists, assembled for the last time, dined together in order to consult on what remained for them to do. It was evident, in their eyes, that the existing insurrection had no longer for its object, either the breaking of printing presses, as Danton had said, or even the suppression of a commission, and that its real object was pointed against their own persons.—The advice of some amongst them was, to remain firm at their posts, and to die on the curule chair in defending to the last that authority with which they had been invested. Pétion, Buzot, Gensonné adopted this solemn and magnanimous resolution. Barbaroux, heedless of consequences, and following only the inspirations of his heroic mind, would have gone to brave his enemies with his presence and his courage. Others again, and also Louvet, who most warmly maintained this latter notion, were for instantly deserting the convention, where they could be of no further use, where the Plain had not courage enough to give them their suffrages, and where the Mountain and the galleries were determined to drown their voices with hooting. They were for retiring each one to his department, to foment the insurrection already well-nigh proclaimed there, and to return in full strength to Paris, to avenge the laws and national representation. Every one, in fact, proposed his own plan, and they knew not how to decide. The noise of the tocsin and of the drums compelled these unfortunate companions to quit the table, and seek an asylum without having come to any resolution whatever. They then repaired to the house of one of their members less compromised than themselves, and not included in the famous list of the twenty-two. This man, whose name was Meilhan, had already received them, and had, in the Rue Des-Moulins, a large dwelling, wherein they might assemble in arms. They repaired thither in haste, with the exception of a few, who had other means of concealment.

The convention had assembled at the sound of the tocsin; very few, however, of the members were present, and every member of the right side was absent. Lanjuinais alone, eager to brave every danger, had gone thither in order to denounce the conspiracy, the revelation of which made nobody any wiser. After a brief and stormy sitting, the convention replied to the petitioners, that considering the decree, which enjoined the committee of public safety to make a report upon the twenty-two, it had nothing to enact upon the new demand of the commune. They separated in disorder, and the conspirators suspended until the next morning the definitive execution of their project.

The générale and tocsin were heard throughout the whole night of Saturday until Sunday morning, June 2nd, 1793, when the alarm-guns were fired, and all the population of Paris were in arms by break of day. Nearly eighty thousand men were collected round the convention, but upwards of sixty-five thousand of these took no part in the event, contenting themselves with remaining under arms. Several devoted battalions of artillery were ranged, under the command of Henriot, around the National Palace. They had one hundred and sixty-three pieces of ordnance, military waggons, machines for heating shot, lighted matches, and all the warlike apparatus calculated to strike the imagination. Since the morning, those battalions, the departure of which for La Vendée had been retarded, had re-entered Paris; these men were excited by being persuaded that fresh conspiracies had just been discovered, that the leaders of these conspiracies were in the convention, and that it was necessary to root them out from thence. It was said that to this mode of reasoning was added that of assigns for one hundred sous each. These battalions, thus led away, marched from the Champs Elysées to La Madeleine, from thence to the Boulevard, and from the Boulevard on to the Carrousel, ready to execute whatever the conspirators might direct.

Thus the convention, surrounded by not more than some thousand madmen, now appeared besieged by eighty thousand men. Although the convention might be said not to be really in a state of siege, they were not on that account exposed to less danger, since the thousand men who actually surrounded them were prepared to commit any kind of outrage.

The deputies of either side had repaired to the sitting. The Mountain, Plain, and the Right Side, occupied their respective benches. Most of the proscribed deputies, assembled at the house of Meilhan, where they had passed the night, were desirous likewise of repairing to their posts. Buzot made efforts to extricate himself from those who would have restrained him, in order that he might go and perish in the midst of the convention. However, they succeeded in preventing him going thither. Barbaroux, alone successful in getting away, went immediately to the convention, to demonstrate during this day a noble-minded courage. The remainder were constrained to remain in their asylum, and await the issue of the fearful sitting.

The day's business being commenced at the convention, Lanjuinais, whom neither the galleries, the Mountain, or the imminence of the danger, were sufficient to intimidate, was first to endeavour to speak. His attempt excited the most violent uproar. "I come," said he, "to engage your attention with the means of warding off the fresh perils to which you are exposed." "Down, down," exclaimed they, "he would create a civil war!" "So long as civil war shall be permitted to make its voice heard, even here," replied Lanjuinais, "I will not suffer the character of a representative of the people to be degraded in my person. Until now you have done nothing, but have suffered every thing. You have sanctioned whatever has been exacted of you. An insurrectional assembly meets, it names a committee charged with the execution of revolt, it appoints a provisional commandant to head the revolt; and this acsembly, this committee, this commandant, you countenance, and suffer all!" A tremendous confusion drowned at this moment the voice of Lanjuinais. At length his anger mounted to such a pitch, that several deputies of the Mountain, including Drouet, the younger Robespierre, Julien, and Legendre, rose from their benches, rushed to the tribune, and would have dragged him from it. Lanjuinais resisted, and kept his post by main force.

The disorder now spread throughout the whole assembly, and the yellings from the galleries contributed to render the present scene the most appalling of any that had yet been acted. The president put his hat on, and at last succeeded in making himself heard. "The scene which is now taking place amongst us," said he, "is most distressing; liberty must be sacrificed, if you continue to conduct yourselves thus. I call you to order; you who have thus misconducted yourselves at the tribune." A little calm followed this appeal, and Lanjuinais, who dreaded not chimerical propositions so long as they were courageous, also demanded that they should proceed to abrogate the revolutionary authorities of Paris, that is to say, that unarmed persons should domineer over the armed. Scarcely had he finished, before the petitioners of the commune presented themselves anew. Their language was more brief and more energetic than ever. "The citizens of Paris have not quitted their arms since four o'clock. Since that hour, they have not ceased to claim of their representatives their rights, unworthily violated, and during this time, their representatives have been deriding their indolence and inertness. It is necessary, therefore, to put them under arrest; it is necessary to save the people instantly, or the people will protect themselves." Scarcely had the petitioners finished speaking, when Billaud Varennes and Tallien required a report upon this petition, during the present sitting and without separating; others, in great numbers, required the order of the day. At length, in the middle of this tumult, the assembly, animated by its danger, arose and voted the order of the day, upon the ground that a report had been ordered of the committee of public safety within three days. At this decision, the petitioners rushed forth, aggravating their cries and menaces, and exposing to view their concealed weapons. All the men who had been in the galleries retired, as if to execute some design, and only the women remained. A great noise was heard outside the hall, and shouts of "Aux armes! Aux armes!" were plainly distinguishable. At this moment, several deputies strove to represent to the assembly that the determination it had taken was imprudent, and that it was necessary to terminate this dangerous crisis by conceding what was required, and by putting under provisional arrest the twenty-two accused deputies. "We will go, all of us, to prison," exclaimed Laréveillère Lépéaux. Cambon then announced, that in an half hour the committee of public safety would make its report. The report had been ordered within three days, but the danger becoming more and more urgent, the committee had been induced to hasten it. In fact, Barrère presented himself at the tribune, and proposed the former suggestion of Garat, which the evening before had so worked upon all the members of the committee, which Danton had embraced with fervour, while Robespierre had repelled it, and which consisted in the voluntary and reciprocal exile of the leaders of the two parties. Barrère, not being able to propose it to the Mountainers, proposed it thus to the twenty-two. "The committee," said he, "has had no time to develop any fact, or to examine any testimony; but, viewing both the political and moral state of the convention, it is of opinion that the voluntary suspension of the obnoxious deputies would produce the happiest effect, and would save the republic in this fatal crisis, the issue of which it is terrific to anticipate."

Barrère had hardly concluded his speech, when Isnard ascended the tribune, and said, that since they had put individuals in the balance against the country, he would never hesitate, and not only would he renounce his functions, but his life also, if it were necessary. Lanthenas imitated the example of Isnard, and abdicated his functions. Fouchet offered his resignation and his life to the republic. Lanjuinais, who thought he ought not to make this voluntary concession, presented himself at the tribune, and said, "I believe that up to this moment, I have shown sufficient energy to prevent your anticipating from me either resignation or voluntary suspension." On these words, a great outcry was made in the assembly. Lanjuinais cast a look of assurance on those who had interrupted him. "The sacrificer," cried he, "who led in old times a victim to the altar, covered it with flowers and garlands, and did not insult it. We would make a sacrifice of our powers, but these sacrifices should be free, and we are not so. We cannot go from hence, not even by descending through the windows; the cannon are pointed; it is useless to put any thing to the vote, and I am therefore silent." Barbaroux succeeded to Lanjuinais, and refused with equal courage the resignation which was demanded of him. "If the convention," exclaimed he, "ordains my resignation, I will submit; but how can I consent to dispossess myself of my functions, when a number of departments write to me, assuring me that I have discharged them well, and engaging me to fill them again? I have sworn to die at my post, and I will keep my oath!" Dussaulx offered his resignation. "What!" cried Marat, "ought we to afford to these culprits the honour of voluntary sacrifice? It is necessary to be pure, in order to be enabled to offer sacrifices to our country. It is for me, a true martyr, to devote myself. I offer, then, my suspension from that moment at which you shall have decreed the arrest of the accused deputies. But," added Marat, "the list is ill drawn out; instead of the old dotard, Dussaulx, of the poor-spirited Lanthenas, and of Ducois, culpable only on account of certain erroneous opinions, we should substitute Fermont and Valazé, who deserve to be in it, and yet are not."

At this moment a great noise was heard at the doors of the hall. Lacroix entered, in great agitation, and screaming out, he declared that they were no longer even personally free; that he had attempted to leave the place, and was restrained from doing so. Although a Mountainer, and a partisan for the arrest of the twenty-two, Lacroix could be very indignant at the behaviour of the

Since the refusal of the convention to enact any thing upon the subject of the petition of the commune, the watchword had been given at all the doors to prevent the departure of a single deputy. Several had vainly endeavoured to evade it. Gorsas alone contrived to escape, and he went directly to the house of Moilhan, to persuade the Girondists assembled there to hide themselves wherever they could, and by no means to venture to the assembly. All the rest who endeavoured to leave the assembly were forcibly pushed back. Boissy d'Anglas presenting himself at one door, was very roughly treated, and returned into the hall, exhibiting his torn garments. At the sight of this, the whole assembly felt one common indignation, and the Mountain itself was astonished. They demanded the authors of this watchword, and put forth an ineffective decree, which summoned to the bar the commandant of the armed force.

Burrère now began to speak, and expressing himself with an ardour that was by no means common to him, said that the assembly was now, indeed, no longer free, and that it deliberated under the control of tyrants in the back-ground; that in the insurrectional committee, men were to be found for whom no one could answer, suspected strangers, such as Gusman, the Spaniard, and others; that at the door of the hall, assignats had been distributed of five livres* each to the battalions destined for La Vendée, and that it was now become indispensable to ascertain whether the convention was still respected or otherwise. In consequence, he proposed to the assembly that it should repair in a body into the midst of the armed force, in order to assure itself that it had nothing to fear, and that its authority was still recognized. This proposition, which had been previously made by Garat on the 25th of May, and renewed by Vergniaud on the 31st, was now adopted. Hérault-Séchelles, whom they made use of on all emergencies, was put at the head of the assembly as president, and all the right side, and the Plain, arose to follow him. The Mountain alone remained on their benches. The deputies of the right then returned, and reproached the Mountain for not consenting to take part in the common danger: the galleries, on the contrary, implored them, by signs, to keep their seats, as if a great peril menaced them out of doors. Nevertheless, the Mountainers yielded from a sentiment of shame, and the whole convention, with Hérault-Séchelles at its head, presented itself in the court-yard of the National Palace, on the side of the Carousel. The sentinels gave way, and suffered the members of the assembly to pass, who then arrived in the presence of the artillery, who were headed by Henriot. The president addressed himself to this officer, requiring him to open a free passage for the members. "You shan't go," replied Henriot, "until you have delivered up the twenty-two." "Seize this rebel," exclaimed the president, turning to the soldiers. Henriot, on this, backing his horse, addressed himself to his cannoniers, "Cannoniers, to your guns!" Some one immediately grasped Hérault-Séchelles by the arm, and pushed him aside. The assembly then went to the garden, where they experienced similar treatment. Several groups exclaimed, "Long live the nation!" others, "Long live the convention." "Long live Marat!" "Down with the right side!" Outside the garden, certain battalions, who were far differently disposed towards the convention than those who had surrounded the Carousel, made signs to the deputies to come and join them. In order to do this, the convention advanced in the direction of the Pont-Tournant, but found a new battalion there, which opposed their egress from the garden. At this moment, Marat, surrounded by some children, shouting out Vive Marat! approached the president, and said to him, "I summon the deputies who have thus abandoned their posts to return thither."

Finally, the assembly, who now perceived that these repeated and fruitless attempts only tended to prolong their humiliation, re-entered the hall, each taking his place. Couthon first ascended the tribune. "You see clearly," exclaimed he, with a degree of assurance which surprised the assembly, "how you are respected and obeyed by the people. You perceive that you are free, and that you may proceed to vote on the question before you. Hasten then to satisfy their wishes." Legendre proposed to exclude from the list of the twenty-two those who had offered their resignation; and to except from the list of the twelve, Boyer-Fonfrède and Saint-Martin, who had opposed the arbitrary arrests, and to replace them by Lebrun and Clavière. Marat insisted that they should strike out of the list, Lanthenas, Ducos, and Dussaulx, and that they should add to it Fernout and Valazé. These propositions were adopted, and they were ready to pass to the vote. The Plain, intimidated, began to say, that after all, the obnoxious deputies, were they put under arrest, would not have so much to complain of, and that it was necessary, at all events, to put an end to so terrible a scene. The right side upon this demanded the vote by call of names, in order to put to shame these members of the *Ventre, in the very outset of their weakness; but one of them furnished to his colleagues a capital plan of extricating themselves from this perplexing situation. "I will not vote," said he, "because I am under restraint." Following his example, the others refused to vote; and, subsequently, the Mountain alone, with a few other members, voted for the arrest of the deputies denounced by the commune.

Such was the celebrated event of the 2nd of June, better known under the name of the 31st of May. As against the national representation, it was nothing else than a 10th of August†; for, these unhappy deputies once put under arrest, nothing remained but to make them ascend the scaffold, a measure attended with little difficulty. At this point terminates one of the principal eras of the revolution, which served as a preparation to the most awful and the grandest of all, and of which, that it may be thoroughly appreciated, it is necessary to take a comprehensive retrospect.

On the 10th of August, the revolutionists, no longer contented with mere threats, attacked the palace of the monarch, to deliver themselves from apprehensions which had become insupportable. The first measure was to suspend Louis XVI., and to refer his fate to the approaching national convention. The monarch being thus suspended, and the power remaining in the hands of different popular authorities, hence arose the question as to how that power was to be exercised. Then the divisions which had already begun to demonstrate themselves between the respective partisans of moderation and those of an inexorable energy, burst forth unrestrained. The commune, composed altogether of energetic men, attacked the legislative body, and insulted it by threatening it with the tocsin. At this juncture, the coalition, revived on the 10th of August, rapidly advanced, aggravated the danger, moreover provoked fresh outrages, cried down all moderation, and stimulated the passions to the greatest possible excess. Longwy and Verdun fell into the hands of the enemy; and on perceiving the approach of Brunswick, they outstripped all the cruelties which that general had threatened in his manifestoes, striking terror into the hearts of his concealed adherents by the dreadful acts which marked the month of September. Ere long, saved by the good management and temper of Dumouriez, France had time to agitate itself anew with the great question of a lenient or inexorable use of power. The proceedings of September became an irksome subject of reproach: the moderate party was full of indignation; the violent wished them to be silent respecting evils which they affected to regard as inevitable and irreparable. Unfeeling personalities aggravated these individual dislikes into polemical hatred. Discord renched its highest point; and in this state of things arrived the moment which was to decide the fate of Louis. Two systems were experimentalized upon his person; that of moderation was subdued, that of violence carried everything with it, and thus, in sacrificing their king, their revolution came definitively to a rupture with royalty and the throned heads of Europe.

The coalition, re-animated by the events of the 21st of January, as it had formerly been by those of the 10th of August, renewed its agitations, and made us experience reverses. Dumouriez, arrested in his progress by untoward circumstances and by the disorder which prevailed in every branch of administration, felt irritated against the Jacobins, to whom he imputed these reverses, and throwing aside his ordinary political indifference, declared himself altogether for moderation, which he compromised by engaging in its interest both his own sword and that of the foreigner, and, in short, run counter to the revolution, after having placed the republic in the most perilous situation. At the same point of time, La Vendée was in arms: the departments, all of them attached to the moderate party, put themselves into a menacing attitude: never had the existence of the revolution been so completely perilled. Defects and treasonable practices afforded to the Jacobins a pretext for calumniating the moderate republicans, and a motive for demanding a judicial and executive dictatorship. The Jacobins proposed the experiment of a revolutionary tribunal and a committee of public welfare. Vehement disputes arose on these propositions. The two parties proceeded, respecting these questions, to the bitterest extremities; they could no longer bear each other's presence. On the 10th of March, the Jacobins attempted to crush the leaders of the Girondists, but this attempt, too premature, was unsuccessful: they then went to work in a more cautious manner; they promoted petitions, stirred up the sections, and rebelled according to form of law. The Girondists presented against these measures a commission, instituted for the purpose of prosecuting the conspiracies of their adversaries: this commission operated against the Jacobins, excited their vengeance, and was carried away in a political whirlwind. Re-constituted on the succeeding day, it was again swept away by the hurricane of the 31st of May. In short, on the 2nd of June, its members, and those deputies, who ought to have been protected by the national representation, were torn from its presence, and, as was the case with Louis XVI., the decision of their fate was postponed to a period sufficiently violent to conduct them to the scaffold.

Such then is the space which we have traversed from the 10th of August to the 31st of May: it was a protracted struggle between the two systems upon measure of each other's strength. The danger, which was increasing, always rendered the dispute more earnest and envenomed; and the generous-minded deputation of the Girondists, exhausted by their endeavour to avenge the outrages of September, and to prevent the event of the 21st of January, the erection of the revolutionary tribunal and the committee of public welfare, expired when the danger became more urgent, had made violence more impatient, and rendered moderation less practicable. At length, all form of justice being overthrown, every claim stifled with the suspension of the Girondists, and the peril become more imminent than ever by the insurrection itself, which sought to avenge the Gironde, the reign of terror was enabled to manifest itself unchecked, and the dreadful dictatorship, of the revolutionary tribunal and of the committee of public welfare, went far to complete it. Here, then, commenced scenes a hundred times more awful and horrible than all those which had previously roused the Girondists. As to them, their history is finished; nothing remains to be added to it but a recital of their heroic death. Their opposition had been fraught with danger, their indignation was impolitic, they had compromised the revolution, liberty, and France; they even compromised that moderation itself for which they strove, by defending it with too much acrimony; and in dying, they involved in their own ruin all that was most liberal and intelligent in France. But who is there who would not have acted their part? who is there who would not have committed their errors? In fact, is it possible to witness the shedding of blood without demonstrating repugnance and indignation?

THE Act passed on the 2nd of June against the twenty-two deputies of the right side, as well as against the commission of twelve, provided that they should be confined to their own homes, and under the personal restraint of sentinels. Some of them submitted to this act with a very good grace, and placed themselves under arrest, to testify their obedience to the law, and in order to call for a trial which should put their innocence beyond doubt. Gensonné and Valazé could very easily have evaded the watchfulness of their keepers, but they constantly refused to seek safety in flight. They remained in custody, with their colleagues Guadet and Pétion, Vergniaud, Birotteau, Gardien, Doileau, Bertrand, Mollevaut, and Gommairé. Some others, not considering obedience was due to a law procured by intimidation, and not expecting to have justice done them, withdrew themselves from Paris, or concealed themselves there until an opportunity of escape presented itself. Their design was to meet together in the departments, in order to excite a rebellion against the capital. Those who took this resolution were Brissot, Gorsas, Salles, Louvet, Chambon, Buzot, Lydon, Rabaut, Saint-Etienne, Lasource, Grangeneuve, Lesage, Vigée, Larivière, and Bergeioing. The two ministers, Lebrun and Clavière, immediately deprived of their functions after the 2nd of June, were stricken by a warrant of arrest issuing from the commune. Lebrun contrived to elude this process. The same course was adopted against Roland, who having resigned so far back as the 21st of January, fruitlessly solicited leave to pass his accounts. He managed to escape the vigilance of the commune, and hid himself at Rouen. Madame Roland, who was in the same situation as her husband, had no other care than to assist in his escape; and after placing her daughter under the protection of a sure friend, she surrendered herself with a noble disinterestedness to the committee of her section, and was thrown into prison in company with a vast number of other victims of the 31st of May.

The Jacobins were indeed rejoiced. They congratulated themselves upon the energy of the people, upon its good conduct during the latter days, and upon having compassed the complete overthrow of all those impediments which the right side had unceasingly opposed to the progress of the revolution. At the same time they settled amongst themselves, as indeed they did after every important event, the mode in which the last insurrection should be presented to the public. "The people," said Robespierre, "have confounded all their calumniators by their behaviour upon this occasion. Eighty thousand men have turned out for nearly a week, without a single violation of the rights of property, without a single drop of blood being shed, and they have shown plainly enough whether their object was, as was imputed to them, to take advantage of the public confusion for the purposes of murder or pillage. Their rising has been purely voluntary, because it was the effect of a public conviction; and the Mountain itself, powerless as she was, astonished at witnessing this movement, has thus clearly demonstrated that she had been no party to it, therefore this insurrection has been peculiarly a moral one, and in every respect may be said to have emanated from the people."

This, in fact, was at one and the same time to express a favourable idea of the insurrection, to point an indirect censure at the Mountain, who had on the 2nd of June demonstrated some reluctance to act, to avert the reproach of conspiracy directed against the leaders of the left side, and to pass a flattering compliment upon the popular party, who had managed every thing so well and perfectly by itself. After this construction had been allowed with acclamation by the Jacobins, and afterwards repeated by all the echoes of the victorious party, no time was lost in calling Marat to account for one expression which had been the source of considerable disturbance. Marat, who possessed but one single idea with regard to the termination of the revolutionary vacillations, and that was the appointment of a dictator, Marat, perceiving that some tergiversation was exhibited on the 2nd of June, had repeated on this very day as he had upon other occasions, "We must have a Head." Called upon to explain the meaning of this expression, he justified himself after his fashion, and the Jacobins at once did not care to press the matter further, being quite satisfied at having demonstrated their scrupulosities and the sternness of their republican principles. At the same time some remarks were made upon the lukewarmness of Danton, who appeared to have been considerably softened ever since the suppression of the commission of the twelve, and whose energy, which had maintained its character until the 31st of May, had not continued till the 2nd of June.

THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

May.

Danton was absent; Camille Desmoulins, his friend, defended him with some warmth, and an end was soon put to this explanation, on account of the importance of the personage himself, as well as to get rid of some very delicate disclosures; for although the insurrection had been carried out in a masterly manner, it was far from meeting with entire approval from the victorious party. In point of fact, it was well known that the committee of public welfare, and a great many of the Mountaineers, had witnessed with dismay the effect of this popular demonstration. However, the act having been done, it was more expedient for them to avail themselves of its advantages, than to make it the subject of debate. They, therefore, immediately set about turning this victory to good account, and that in the most prompt and effectual manner.

To do this, there were several measures to be adopted. The restoration of the committees, in which were placed all the partisans of the right side,—to possess themselves, by means of the committees, of the direction of affairs,—to change the ministers,—to superintend the correspondence,—to intercept at the post office dangerous publications,—to take charge that none but those of acknowledged utility found their way into the provinces (for, said Robespierre, the liberty of the press ought certainly to be inviolate, but yet it should not be employed for the destruction of liberty),—to forthwith form the revolutionary army, of which the organization had been already ordered, and whose intervention was absolutely necessary for the execution in the interior of the decrees of the convention,—to effectuate a forced loan of one thousand millions from the pockets of the wealthy. Such were the measures proposed, and unanimously adopted by the Jacobins. But one last measure was considered of more importance than all the others, and that was the digesting, within eight days, a republican constitution. It was a point of consequence to prove that the opposition of the Girondists had solely impeded the perfection of this grand work, which was to restore confidence to France by the operation of good laws, and to present her with a pact of union, round which she might rally as an indivisible empire. Such was the desire expressed at the same time by the Jacobins, the Cordeliers, the sections, and the commune.

The convention, in obedience to this irresistible desire, and which had been frequently uttered under so many forms, restored all her committees of general safety, of finances, of war, of legislation, &c. The committee of public welfare, already overburdened with business, and which, not as yet in such bad odour as to cause the peremptory dismissal of all its members, was the only one that had been kept in action. Lebrun was succeeded in foreign affairs by Desforgues, and Clavière in the finances by Destournelles. The draught of a constitution, framed according to the ideas of the Girondists by Condorcet, was considered as incomplete. The committee of public welfare had to present another within eight days. Five members were added to it to assist in this labour. Lastly, it was ordered to prepare a scheme for effectuating the forced loan, as well as a plan of organization of the revolutionary army.

different appearance after the 31st of May. They were not noisy, and almost all the acts were passed without debate. The right side, and part of the centre, no longer voted; they appeared to protest by their silence against all the decisions taken since the 2nd of June, and to wait for news from the departments. Marat had thought it right, as a matter of justice, to keep himself under restraint, until his adversaries, the Girondists, were tried. Till this took place, he disclaimed, as he said, his functions, and confined himself to enlightening the convention through the medium of his newspaper. The two deputies, Doucet and Fonfrède, of Bourdeaux, were the only persons who broke the stillness of the assembly. Doucet accused the insurrectional committee, which had still continued to meet at the Evêché, and who, intercepting the packets at the post office, opened the seals, and then forwarded them still unsealed to their address, under its own stamp, with these words, "Revolution du 31st Mai." The convention passed to the order of the day. Fonfrède, a member of the commission of the twelve, but excepted from the order of arrest, because he had opposed the measures of this commission, Fonfrède ascended the tribune, and required the execution of that decree, which ordered within three days a report to be made concerning the prisoners. This demand caused some disturbance. "We must," said Fonfrède, "instantly prove the innocence of our colleagues. I do not remain here but for the very purpose of defending them, and I declare to you that an armed force is now on its way from Bourdeaux, to avenge the acts committed against them." A grand outcry was made on hearing these words, the call for the order of the day repelled the requisition of Fonfrède, and the assembly relapsed into the deep silence that previously prevailed. This was, as the Jacobins expressed themselves, the last croaking of the frogs in the fen.

The threat thrown out by Fonfrède from the tribune was by no means imaginary, for not only the Bordelais, but the people of almost every one of the departments, were ready to take up arms against the convention. Their cause of dissatisfaction was of older date than the 2nd of June; it had originated with the quarrels between the Mountaineers and the Girondists. It should be recollected that throughout all France, the municipalities and the sections were in opposition to each other. The partisans of the Mountaineer system engrossed the municipalities and the clubs; the moderate republicans, who in the midst of the crisis of the revolution were desirous of maintaining impartial justice, were on the other hand to be found in the sections. Already had open dissension burst forth in numerous towns. At Marseilles the sections had stripped the municipality of its powers, in order to transfer them to a central committee; moreover, they had of their own motion constituted a popular tribunal for the trial of those patriots accused of committing revolutionary excesses. The commissaries Bayle and Boisset had in vain declared the illegality of this committee and this tribunal; their authority was always contemned, and the sections were now permanently adhering to a settled insurrection against the revolution. At Lyons a sanguinary conflict had already taken place. The question was whether a municipal order authorizing the raising of a revolutionary army as well as a tax upon large incomes, should be carried into effect. The sections who acted in disobedience to these measures had declared themselves permanent; the municipality had attempted to dissolve them; but by the assistance of the directory of the department they had acted in open opposition to the municipality. On the 29th of May, they came to personal conflict, notwithstanding the presence of the two commissaries of the convention, whose efforts to prevent this combat were in vain. The victorious section, after having taken the arsenal and the Hotel-de-Ville by assault, had displaced the municipality, closed the Jacobin club, where Chaliier had excited the most dreadful broils, and possessed themselves of the sovereign power of Lyons. Some hundreds lost their lives in this conflict. The representatives Nioche and Gauthier were in confinement a whole day; at last set at liberty, they withdrew to their colleagues Albite and Dubois-Craucé, who, like them, had commission for the army at the Alps.

Such was the state of Lyons and the South during the latter end of May. Bordenux did not present a more promising aspect of affairs. This town, as did all those of the west of Brittany and of Normandy, only delayed their operations until those threats which had been so long repeated against the deputies of the provinces were actually put in execution. It was while the departments were in this mood, that they learnt what had taken place at the end of May. The events of the 27th May, when the commission of twelve had for the first time been suppressed, had already caused great excitement, and on all sides it became a point of discussion, whether resolutions condemnatory of what had taken place at Paris, should not be passed. But the events of the 31st May and the 2nd June wrought their indignation to the highest pitch. Report, which enlarges upon every thing, exaggerated the real facts. It was rumoured that thirty-two deputies had been massacred by the commune; that the public treasuries had been pillaged; that the brigands of Paris had assumed supreme power, and were about to transfer it either to the foreign powers, or to Marat, or to Orleans. Public meetings were held for the purpose of petitioning, and to enable them to arrange the mode of their hostile attack against the capital. At this very moment the fugitive deputies themselves came to relate all that had taken place, and to impart some consistency and method to the hostilities which demonstrated themselves from every quarter.

Besides those who had already escaped, several had got away from the gendarmes; others also had even left the assembly in order to heighten the insurrection. Gensonné, Valazé, and Vergniaud persisted in staying behind, saying, that if it were expedient that some of them should go and arouse the zeal of the departments, it was on the other hand quite as proper that the others should remain as hostages in the hands of their enemies, so that they might make manifest by an open trial, and at the hazard of their lives, the entire innocence of them all. Buzot, who had never been desirous of paying obedience to the decree of the 2nd June, transferred himself to his department of the Eure, there to excite the Normans to hostilities;

Gorsas followed him thither with the same view. Brissot repaired to Moulins; Meilhan, who had not been arrested, but who had afforded an asylum to his colleagues on the nights between the 31st May and the 2nd June, Duchâtel, whom the Mountaineers termed the ghost of the 21st January, because he got out of his bed to vote in favour of Louis XVI., left the assembly in order to cause an excitement in Brittany. Biroteau escaped from the gendarmes and went with Chasset to direct the movements of the Lyonnais. Rebecqui, preceding Barbaroux who was still in confinement, repaired to the Bouches-du-Rhône. Rabaut Saint-Etienne lost no time in getting to Nîmes to procure the concurrence of Languedoc in the general hostility against the oppressors of the convention.

So early as the 13th of June, the department of the Eure assembled, and demonstrated the first outbreak of the insurrection. As the convention, it declared, was no longer free, and as it became the duty of all good citizens to restore it to its freedom, it was resolved that a force of four thousand men should be raised to march against Paris, and that commissaries should be despatched to all the neighbouring departments to solicit them to follow their example, and to combine with their operations. The department of Calvados in its session at Caen, caused the arrest of the two deputies, Rome and Prieur of the Côte-d'Or, who were sent by the convention to urge the organization of the army of the coasts of Cherbourg. It was arranged that the departments of Normandy should hold a special meeting at Caen for the purpose of federation. All the departments of Brittany, such as those of the Côtes-du-Nord, of Finistère, of Morbihan, of Ile-et-Vilaine, of Mayenne, and of the Loire-Inferieure, entered into similar resolutions, and dispatched commissaries to Rennes to establish at that place the central authority of Brittany. The departments of the basin of the Loire, with the exception of those occupied by the Vendéans, followed the general example, and even proposed to send their commissaries to Bruges, to form at that place a convention consisting of two deputies from each department, and to set out and destroy the convention which, alternately usurping or oppressed, was sitting at Paris.

At Bordeaux a very great sensation was experienced; all the constituted authorities met in an assembly styled The popular Commission of Public Welfare, and declared that the convention was no longer free, and that it was incumbent upon them to preserve her freedom; consequently they resolved that an armed force should be forthwith raised, and that in the mean while, a petition should be addressed to the national convention, requiring an explanation and a true statement of the case with regard to the events of June; they also immediately sent commissaries to all the departments, to persuade them to join in a general coalition. Thoulouse, an ancient parliamentary city*, where numerous partisans of the old regime

* The parliament of Thoulouse was one of the twelve parlements of France, analogous to the parliaments of Paris. The parliament of Thoulouse was founded in 1303, suppressed in 1312, and incorporated with the parliament of Paris, restored in 1419, transferred to Beziers in 1487, still concealed themselves under cover of the Girondists, had already organized a departmental force of a thousand men. The administrative authorities of this town had declared in the face of the commissaries sent to the army of the Pyrenees, that they would no longer recognize the convention; they discharged numerous individuals from their prisons, and sent many others accused of being Mountainers to take their place, and they openly announced that they were ready to federalize with the departments of the south.

The upper departments of the Tarn, of the Lot-et-Garonne, of the Aveyron, of the Cantal, of the Puy-de-Dôme, and of the Herault, followed the example of Toulouse and Bordeaux. Nîmes declared herself in a state of open opposition; Marseilles prepared a petition expressive of the utmost indignation, re-established her popular tribunal, commenced a proceeding against the murderers (buteurs), and organized a force of six thousand men. At Grenoble, the sections were summoned together, and their presidents, who acted in conjunction with the constituted authorities, assumed all their powers, appointed deputies for Lyons, and would have arrested Dubois-Crancé and Gauthier, commissaries of the convention for the army of the Alps. The department of the Ain adopted precisely the same course. That of the Jura, who had already levied a body of cavalry and a departmental force of eight hundred men, protested on her own part against the authority of the convention. Finally, at Lyons, where ever since the conflict of the 29th of May the sections reigned supreme, they received and sent forth deputies to effect a combination with Marseilles, Bordeaux, and Caen; proceedings were immediately ordered to be instituted against Challer, president of the Jacobin club, as well as against many other of the Mountainers. All that could now be said to be subject to the authority of the convention were the departments of the north, and those which formed the basin of the Seine. The insurgent departments now amounted to between sixty or seventy, and Paris had with fifteen or twenty to make head against the others, and to carry on the war against Europe.

At Paris different notions were entertained as to the course to be adopted in this perilous situation. The members of the committee of public welfare, Cambon, Barrère, Bréard, Treilhard, and Mathieu, patriots of note, howsoever they had disapproved of the events of the 2nd of June, would yet have wished that some mode of conciliation were adopted; according to their notions, it was necessary that the freedom of the convention should be demonstrated by the adoption of energetic measures against the agitators, and instead of irritating the departments by severe decrees, to reclaim them by convincing them of the danger of a civil war in the face of the foreign enemy. Barrère proposed, in the name of the committee of public welfare, the draught of a decree entirely conceived in this spirit. In this draught, the revolutionary committees, who had rendered themselves so formidable by their numerous arrests, were to be annulled throughout France, or put upon their proper footing, which was the superintendence of suspected foreigners; that the primary assemblies should be congregated in Paris to name another commandant of the armed force, in the place of Henriot, who had been appointed by the insurrectionists; and lastly, that thirty deputies should be sent to the departments as hostages. These measures seemed highly calculated to quiet and impart confidence to the departments. The suppression of the revolutionary committees would put an end to the inquisitorial measures exercised against suspected persons; the choice of a good commandant would ensure the quiet of Paris; and the thirty deputies sent as hostages would be subservient to the purposes of pledge and conciliation. But the Mountain party was not altogether disposed to enter into negotiations. Availing themselves with a high hand of what was termed the national authority, they discountenanced conciliatory means. Robespierre caused this committee bill to be adjourned. Danton again raising his voice in this perilous emergency, adverted to the famous revolutionary crisis, the dangers of September at the period of the invasion of Champagne and the taking of Verdun; the perils of January before the condemnation of the late king had been finally decided upon; lastly, the much greater emergencies of April, at the time when Danton was marching upon Paris, and Vendée was in rebellion. According to him, the revolution had overcome all the dangers which had threatened her, she had come off victorious in every crisis, and she would again come off victorious in this last emergency. "It is at the very instant," cried he "of the birth of a great event that bodies politic, like bodies physical, ever seem threatened with speedy destruction. Well then! the thunder rolls, and it is in the midst of its pealing that the great work, which shall establish the happiness of twenty-four millions of human beings, shall have birth." Danton was desirous that by a single decree affecting all and each of the departments, it should be enjoined them, that within twenty-four hours after notice, they should disclaim their assumed power, upon pain of outlawry. The powerful voice of Danton, never heard in moments of extraordinary danger but to impart self-confidence, on this occasion produced its accustomed effect. The convention, although it had not precisely adopted the proposed measures, nevertheless enacted the most energetic decree. In the first place she declared, in respect of the 31st of May and the 2nd of June, that the people of Paris had by their uprising deserved well of the country*; that those deputies who at first were to be detained in custody at their own houses, (and some of whom had got clear off,) should be transferred to some common prison, there to be detained as ordinary prisoners; that a call should be made of all the deputies, and that those who should be absent without commission or leave should be expelled and replaced by others chosen in their stead; that neither the departmental or municipal authorities could retire or transfer themselves from one place again reunited to the parliament of Paris the same year, and at last reinstated at Toulouse in 1448. The parliaments of France were abolished by two decrees of the constituent assembly, dated 24th of March and 7th of September, 1790. Ante, p. 4. col. 1, note. Trans.

to another; that they could not correspond with each other, and that every commissary sent from department to department as a medium of communication and for the purpose of forming a league, should be instantaneously arrested by the good citizens, and sent to Paris well guarded. After passing these general measures, the convention quashed the resolution of the Department of the Eure; informations were filed against the members of the department of the Calvados, who had arrested two of the commissaries of the convention; the same course was taken with regard to Buzot, the party who instigated the Norman revolt: two deputies, Mathieu and Treillard, were despatched to the departments of the Gironde, the Dordogne, and the Lot-et-Garonne, to know what it was they wanted before they revolted. The authorities of Thoulouse were summoned to appear, the tribunal and central committee of Marseilles were inhibited, Barbaroux was attainted, and the imprisoned patriots were placed under the custody of the lawfully constituted authorities. At last the convention despatched Robert Lindet to Lyons, in order to enquire into circumstances there, and to specially report upon the condition of that town.

These acts, which were successively passed in the course of June, did not cause a little consternation among the departments, who were not accustomed to contest with the central authority. Intimidated and hesitating, they resolved to await the issue of the course those departments would take, who were either most powerful, or more deeply involved in the contention.

The administrative authorities of Normandy, excited by the presence of those deputies who had attached themselves to Buzot, such as Barbaroux, Guadet, Louvet, Salles, Pétion, Bergeois, Lesage, Cassy, Korvelégan, pursued their original intentions, and fixed at Caen the seat of a central committee of the departments. The Eure, the Calvados, and the Orne, sent their commissaries thither. The departments of Brittany, who had previously entered into a federation at Rennes, made up their minds to join the assembly of Caen, and that they would send off their deputies thither. In short, on the 30th of June, the delegates of Morbihan, of Finistère, of the Côtes-du-Nord, of the Mayenne, of the Ile-et-Vilaine, and of the Lower Loire, united with those of the Eure and the Orne, constituted themselves a central assembly of resistance to oppression, promising to maintain equality, and the unity and indivisibility of the republic, but swearing hatred to the anarchists, and solemnly binding themselves to use their best endeavours in preserving the respect due to persons and property as well as to the sovereignty of the people. After thus constituting themselves, they settled that the committee should be furnished from each individual department with the necessary contingents for organizing a sufficiently armed force, which was to proceed to Paris, and re-establish the national representation in its former state. Felix Wimpfen, general of that army which was to be stationed along the coast of Cherbourg, was nominated commander-in-chief of the departmental army. He accepted this command, and immediately assumed the title which had just been conferred upon him. On being summoned to Paris by the minister of war, he replied by saying that there was but one way of making peace, and that was to revoke all the decrees passed since the 31st of May; that upon this condition the departments would fraternize with the capital, but that, on the contrary, he could not appear at Paris in any other manner than at the head of sixty thousand Normans and Bretons.

The minister, at the same time that he required the presence of Wimpfen at Paris, gave orders for the dragoons of La Manche, stationed in Normandy, to forthwith set out for Versailles. On receipt of this intelligence all the federalists who had already joined each other at Evreux, put themselves in battle array, the national guard attached itself to them, and they cut off the road to Versailles from the dragoons. These latter, by no means desirous to come to blows, promised on their part not to go to Versailles, and so far as appearances were concerned fraternized with the federalists. Their officers wrote privately to Paris, stating that they could not obey their orders without commencing a civil war, and therefore they were permitted to remain where they were.

It was arranged by the assembly at Caen, that the Breton battalions already arrived should be sent onwards from Caen to Evreux, the head quarters of the combined forces. It was to this point were despatched provisions, arms, ammunition, and money taken from the public treasury. Thither also were expedited the officers guided over to the cause of federalism, with a great number of concealed royalists, who threw themselves into every commotion, and assumed the mask of republicanism for the purpose of warring against the revolution. Among the counter-revolutionists of this kind, was a man by name Puisaye, who affected great zeal in the Girondist cause, and whom Wimpfen, himself a royalist in disguise, appointed Brigadier-General, and charged with the command of the advance-guard, already mustered at Evreux. This advance-guard might amount to some five or six thousand men, and was daily reinforcing itself by fresh contingencies. The brave Bretons hastened from all sides, and gave intelligence of other battalions who were about to follow them in still greater number. One single circumstance prevented their coming altogether in one body, and that was the necessity that existed for protecting the sea coasts from the English fleet, and for sending off battalions against La Vendée, whose rebellion extended to the Loire and appeared ready to cross that river. Although the rustic population of Brittany were devoted to the clergy, the inhabitants of the towns were steady republicans, and while altogether engaged against Paris, they were not a whit the less desirous of continuing a pertinacious war against La Vendée.

Such was the situation of affairs in Brittany and Normandy towards the commencement of July. In the departments near the Loire, the excitement had cooled down; the commissaries of the convention, who had been directed thither for the purpose of organizing the new levies against La Vendée, had prevailed upon the administrative authorities to ponder and weigh the course of events before they compromised themselves. There, for the present, no desire was exhibited of sending deputies to Bruges, and a great reserve was manifested.

At Bordeaux the insurrection had obtained permanency and was carried on with spirit. The deputies Treillard and Mathieu had ever since their arrival been closely watched, and it next became a question whether they should not be detained in the character of hostages; however, without pushing matters so far, they were summoned to appear before the popular commission, where the townsfolks, who looked upon them as emissaries of Marat (envoyés Maratistes), received them badly enough. They were interrogated upon what was taking place at Paris, and after hearing what they had to say, the commission declared that even according to their own account the convention was not free upon the 2nd of June, nor had the convention been free from restraint from that time to the present; that they were nothing else than the delegates of an assembly possessing no legal character whatever, and consequently they must quit the department. In point of fact, they were conducted back to the frontiers, and immediately afterwards the same measures which had just been enacted at Caen, were ordered to be carried into execution at Bordeaux. Every preparation was made for provisioning an armament; the public money was applied to this purpose, and an advance-guard was marched to Langon to await the arrival of the principal body, which was to set out in a few days. These occurrences took place at the latter end of June and in the beginning of July.

The deputies Mathieu and Treillard, meeting with less opposition, and being enabled to make themselves better understood in the departments of the Dordogne, the Vienne, and the Lot-et-Garonne, contrived to soothe the public agitation, and succeeded by the conciliatory character of their acts to put a stop to hostilities and gain time as a matter of expedience to the convention. But in the more mountainous departments, among the mountains of the Upper Loire, and on the other side in the Herault and the Gard, and all along the banks of the Rhône, the insurrection was general. The Gard and the Herault put their battalions in marching order, and sent them off to Pont-Saint-Esprit, in order to seize upon, at that point, the passages of the Rhône, as well as to effect their junction with the Marseillais who were to ascend this river. In point of fact, the Marseillais, refusing to render obedience to the decree of the convention, kept up their tribunal, did not release the imprisoned patriots, and even began to execute some of them. They formed an army of six thousand men, which advancing from Aix to Avignon, and attaching itself to the Languedocians mustered at Pont-Saint-Esprit, was to stir up the inhabitants of the banks of the Rhône, the Isère, and the Drôme, and lastly fall in with the mountaineers of the Ain and the Jura. At Grenoble the federalized administrations were in opposition to Dubois-Crancé, and even threatened to arrest him. Being fearful of the consequences of levying troops at this juncture, they had despatched deputies who were to fraternise with Lyons. Dubois-Crancé, with the disorganized army of the Alps, found himself in the midst of a town on the point of an outbreak, which every day more plainly told him that the south did not require the assistance of the north; he had to keep watch upon Savoy, where the illusory notions at first excited by liberty and French conquest were fast dissipating, where a great dissatisfaction was manifested with the levies of men and the assignats, and where no one seemed to understand any thing with regard to this revolution, now discovered to be so turbulent and so entirely different from what it was at first supposed to be. On his flanks he had Switzerland, where the emigrants were bestirring themselves, and where Berne was desirous of again dispatching a garrison to Geneva; and finally, on his rear there was Lyons, who intercepted his correspondence with the committee of public welfare.

Robert Lindet had been received at Lyons; but even before his face they had taken the federalist oath: UNITY AND THE INDIVISIBILITY OF THE REPUBLIC; HATRED AGAINST THE ANARCHISTS, AND NOTHING BUT THE NATIONAL REPRESENTATION. So far from sending the arrested patriots to Paris, they had continued the proceedings commenced against them. A newly formed authority, composed of the deputies of the communes and members of the constituted bodies, had been created under the style of The popular and republican commission of the public welfare for the Rhone and Loire. This assembly had just been ordering the organization of a departmental force for the purpose of effecting a junction with the brethren of the Jura, the Isère, the Bouches-du-Rhône, the Gironde, and the Calvados. This force was already perfect in its appointments, and moreover the raising of a subsidy had been agreed upon; and there, as in every one of the departments, all that they waited for, was the signal to put themselves in motion. In the Isère, ever since the intelligence had arrived that the two deputies Basal and Garnier of Troyes, sent thither to re-establish obedience towards the convention, had mustered at Dôle fifteen hundred men, troops of the line, upwards of fourteen thousand mountaineers had taken arms and were preparing to entirely surround them.

If we reflect upon the state of France at the commencement of July 1793*, we shall see that one column issuing from Brittany and Normandy and bearing upon Evreux, was not in fact more than a few leagues from Paris; that another column was advancing from Bordeaux, and was able to draw in its train all those departments of the basin of the Loire who were as yet undecided; that six thousand Marseillais posted at Avignon, waiting for the Languedocians at Pont-Saint-Esprit, already occupied by eight hundred men of Nîmes, were ready at a moment's notice to form a junction at Lyons with all the federalists of Grenoble, the Ain, and the Jura, to push through Burgundy upon Paris. Till this general junction could be effected, the federalists seized upon all the public money, intercepted the provisions and communications sent to the armies, and threw into circulation the assignats produced by the sale of the national property. It is a remarkable fact, which peculiarly characterises the spirit of party, and that is, that the two factions addressed the same reproaches to each other, and imputed to each other the same motive. The Paris party and the Mountain party imputed to the federalists a desire to ruin the republic by dividing it, and of entertaining a correspondence with the English for the purpose of setting up a king, who was to be either the Duke of Orleans, Louis XVII., or else the Duke of York. On their part, the party of the departments and of the federalists accused the Mountain party of a desire to bring about a counter-revolution by means of an anarchy, and stated, that Marat, Robespierre, and Danton, were either in the pay of England or the Duke of Orleans. Thus on either side, it was the salvation of the republic for which they expressed such solicitude, and that the restoration of monarchy was the very thing they considered as mostly to be deprecated. Such is the deplorable and ordinary blindness of party interest.

But this was only a portion of the dangers to which our unhappy country was exposed. The enemy at home had mostly to be feared because of the enemy abroad, who now caused more apprehension than ever. At the same time the armies of the French were advancing from the provinces towards the centre, the armies of foreign powers were encircling France itself, and threatened an invasion which seemed unavoidable. Ever since the battle of Neerwinden and the defection of Dumouriez, a frightful series of reverses caused us the loss of our conquests together with our northern frontier. The reader will call to mind that Dampierre, appointed commander-in-chief, had rallied his army under the walls of Bouchain, and had there imparted to it a little unanimity and confidence. Luckily for the cause of the revolution, the allied powers, strictly adhering to the methodized plan, resolved upon at the commencement of the campaign, were unwilling to make an inroad at any one point, and according to this rule could not enter France until that the king of Prussia, after having taken Mentz, was enabled to march into the heart of our provinces. If there had existed among the generals of the alliance a spark of genius or unanimity, the cause of the revolution would have been lost for ever. After the battle of Neerwinden and the defection of Dumouriez, they ought to have marched forwards, and not to have stopped until our dispirited army, suffering from the effects of disunion and treason, should have been made prisoners, or compelled to seek refuge in the fortified towns, and then our plains would have afforded an open passage to the victorious enemy. As it was, the allies held a congress at Antwerp, in order to methodize the ulterior operations of the war. The duke of York, the prince of Cobourg, the prince of Orange, and several generals, settled amongst themselves what ought to be done. They resolved upon taking Condé and Valenciennes, in order to give the house of Austria some new fortified towns in the Netherlands; and to seize Dunkirk, in order to confirm to England the possession of this desirable continental port. These matters being settled, they recommenced the campaign. The English and Dutch forces had come up in line. The duke of York had the command of twenty thousand Austrians and Hanoverians; the prince of Orange had fifteen thousand Dutchmen, and the prince of Cobourg had forty-five thousand Austrians and eight thousand Hessians. The prince of Hohenlohe kept possession of Namur and Luxembourg with thirty thousand Austrians, and formed a junction between the allied army of the Netherlands with the army of the Prussians who were to besiege Mentz. Therefore eighty or ninety thousand men threatened the north of France.

Already had the allies blockaded Condé, and it was a very great point with the French government to reduce the blockade of that place. Dampierre, a brave man, but placing no dependence upon his soldiers, was not so rash as to attack these formidable masses. Nevertheless, pressed by the commissaries of the convention, he brought back our army to the camp of Famars near Valenciennes, and on the 1st of May he led an attack upon several columns of the Austrians entrenched within the forests of Vicogne and Saint Amans. These military tactics were still conducted with extreme caution; to form a mass, to seize upon the enemy's weakest point and to strike at it boldly, was a combination entirely unknown to both parties. Dampierre threw himself forward with great bravery, but in small bodies, upon an enemy divided within itself, and whom it would have been easy enough to have overwhelmed upon any one given point; his mistake brought its own punishment with it, and he was repulsed after an obstinate conflict. On the 6th of May he again commenced the attack; he was not so much divided as on the former occasion, but the enemy now put upon their guard had adopted the same precaution, and while he was making the most heroic exertions to carry a redoubt, and the capture of which would have effected the junction of two of his columns, he was struck by a cannon ball and mortally wounded. General Lamarche, invested provisionally with the command, ordered a retreat, and brought back the army to the camp of Famars.

The camp of Famars, situated under the walls of Valenciennes and a suburb of that place, prevented its being besieged. The allies therefore resolved to make an attack upon it the 23rd of May. They spread their troops abroad here and there, according to their usual mode of warfare, and thus uselessly dispersed one part over numerous points, all of which it should have been a matter of prudence with the Austrians to have preserved, and did not attack the camp with all the force they could have commanded. Kept in check one entire day by the artillery, the pride of the French army, it was evening before they crossed the Ronelle, which defended the front of the camp. Lamarche effected his retreat that same night in good order, and then posted himself at Caesar's camp, which bore the same relation to Bouchain, as the camp at Famars did to Valenciennes. Here again he ought to have pursued and dispersed us; but egotism and a pedantic adherence to rule kept the allies around Valenciennes. A portion of their army, placed as corps of observation, were stationed between Valenciennes and Bouchain, and faced Caesar's camp. Another division undertook the siege of Valenciennes, while the remaining part continued the blockade of Condé, already straitened for provisions, and which they had hopes of reducing in a few days. The regular siege of Valenciennes was begun. One hundred and eighty pieces of cannon arrived from Vienna, one hundred more from Holland, and ninety-three mortars were already prepared. Thus in June and July Condé was starved out, Valenciennes was burnt, and our generals occupied Cæsar's camp with a disheartened and disorganized army. Condé and Valenciennes being thus reduced, there was every reason for apprehending the worst.

The army of the Moselle, connecting the army of the North with the army of the Rhine, had been transferred to the command of Ligneville at the time when Beurnonville was appointed minister of war. This army faced that of prince Hohenlohe, and had nothing to fear from that position, because that prince, occupying Namur, Luxembourg, and Trèves, all at one time, with not more than thirty thousand at the most, and having before him the fortified towns of Metz and Thionville, did not possess the means of attempting any hazardous movement. His force had been just before rendered still more inoperative by detaching seven to eight thousand men from his division to join the Prussian army. From that time it became more than ever practicable and expedient to join the active army of the Moselle to that of the Upper Rhine, with a view to attempt important military operations.

Upon the Rhine, the preceding campaign had terminated at Mentz. Custine, after his ridiculous actions in the neighbourhood of Francfort, had been obliged to fall back and shut himself up in Mentz, whither he had collected a considerable force of artillery drawn from our fortresses, and particularly from Strasburg. There it was, that he formed a thousand schemes; at one time, he desired to act upon the offensive, at another time, he must needs keep within Mentz, and at some other time he was for abandoning it altogether. At last it was resolved that he should protect it, and he himself contributed not a little to induce the executive council to come to that determination. The king of Prussia found himself compelled to lay siege to it, and it was the stand that was made at this point, that prevented the allies from marching to the north.

The king of Prussia passed the Rhine at Bacharach, a little above Mentz; Wurmser, with fifteen thousand Austrians, and some few thousand men from Condé, crossed the Rhine a little further up; and the Hessian corps of Schönfeld remained upon the right hand bank before the suburb of Cassel. The Prussian army was not near so strong as it ought to have been, considering the engagements Frederic William had entered into. Having despatched a considerable force into Poland, there remained no more than fifty thousand men, inclusive of the different Hessian, Saxon, and Bavarian contingents. Thus, after reckoning the seven to eight thousand Austrians detached from Hohenlohe, the fifteen thousand Austrians of Wurmser, the five or six thousand emigrants of Condé, and the fifty-five thousand men of the king of Prussia, the army which was directed against the eastern frontier might be computed at nearly eighty thousand soldiers. Our fortresses upon the Rhine contained nearly thirty-eight thousand men in garrison, the army in operation amounted to between forty and forty-five thousand men; the army of the Moselle to thirty thousand; and if these two last had been placed under a single command, and with such a position of support as Mentz, they might have set out to seek the king of Prussia themselves, and afforded him plenty of employment on the other side of the Rhine.

The two generals of the Moselle and the Rhine ought at least to have been upon better terms of correspondence with each other than they evidently were; they might have disputed, nay even prevented the passage of the river, but they did nothing. During the whole course of the month of March, the king of Prussia passed the Rhine without opposition, and his path was never crossed, save by advanced guards, which he repelled without any difficulty. During this period, Custine was at Worms. He had not cared to defend either the banks of the Rhine, or the other side of the Vosges, which forming the circuit of Mentz, could have easily checked the march of the Prussians. He came up it is true, but conceived a panic at the checks experienced by his advanced guard; he believed that he should have had one hundred thousand men upon his hands; above all, he ran away with the idea that Wurmser, who had to debouch upon the Palatinate, and above Mayence, was gaining upon his rear, and would thus cut him off from Alsace; he asked for assistance from Ligneville, who, on his own part, being greatly alarmed, durst not transfer a single regiment; he then fairly took to flight, retreated with the utmost celerity to Landau, next to Wissemburgh, and even thought of seeking protection under the cannon of Strasburg. This unaccountable retreat opened the way for the Prussians, who came thick upon Mentz, and invested it upon both banks.

Twenty thousand men were garrisoned in that place, and if that number were more than sufficient for the purposes of defence, it was much greater than necessary having regard to the provisions, which could not suffice for so large a garrison. The uncertainty of our military plans had prevented our taking any measures to secure the provisioning of that town. Fortunately it contained two representatives of the people, Rawbell and the heroic Merlin de Thionville, the generals Kléber, Aubert-Dubayet, and the engineer Meunier, in short a garrison endued with every military virtue, courage, sobriety, and steadiness. The investment of this town began in April; general Kalkreuth conducted the siege with a corps of Prussians. The king of Prussia and Wurmser kept themselves in observation at the foot of the Vosges and faced Custine. The garrison made frequent sallies, and extended its defences to a considerable distance. The French government perceiving the error that had been committed in separating the two armies of the Moselle and the Rhine, consolidated them under the command of Custine. This general having the disposal of from sixty to seventy thousand men, having the Prussians dispersed before him, and beyond them Mentz, protected by twenty thousand Frenchmen, never took the opportunity of attacking the corps of observation, dispersing it, and thus effecting a junction with that brave garrison who stretched out its hand to him. Towards the middle of May, becoming sensible of the consequences of his inertness, he made one attempt, badly conceived and badly seconded, which terminated in a complete rout. According to his usual course, he complained of the subalterns, and was transferred from the army of the north to introduce good discipline and courage to Cæsar's camp. Thus the allied powers who were besieging Valenciennes and Metz, were enabled after the capture of two places to advance upon our centre, and effectuate their invasion without our being able to interpose any obstruction.

From the Rhine to the Alps and the Pyrenees, a connected series of revolts threatened the rear of our armies, and interrupted their communication with each other. The Vosges, the Jura, the Auvergne, and the Lozère form, from the Rhine to the Pyrenees, almost one connected mass of mountains of different extent and height. Mountainous countries are places peculiarly adapted for the preservation of institutions, manners, and customs. In almost every one of those which we are about to describe, the population preserved a relic of attachment for their ancient mode of life, and without being so bigoted as La Vendée, they were nevertheless ready enough to rise against the new order of things. The Vosges, half Germans, were urged on by the nobility and the clergy, and evinced tendencies more and more alarming as the army of the Rhine became more and more unsteady. The Jura was entirely revolted to the Gironde; and if it did, in its rebellion, demonstrate more of the spirit of liberty than the others, it was not the less dangerous for that, for from fifteen to twenty thousand mountaineers gathered themselves round Lons-le-Saulnier, and joined the revolvers of the Ain and the Rhône. It has been already seen in what state Lyons was. The mountains of the Lozère, which divide the Upper-Loire from the Rhône, were filled with insurrectionists precisely similar to the Vendéans. Under the command of an ex-member of the constituent assembly, of the name of Charrier, they already had increased to the number of thirty thousand, and were able to effect a junction by the Loire with La Vendée. After these came the rebellious federalists of the south. Thus it was that extended rebellions, different in views and principles, but all equally formidable, threatened the rears of the armies of the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees.

Along the Alps, the Piedmontese were in arms, their object was to recover from us Savoy and the Comté de Nice. The snow delayed the commencement of hostilities along St. Bernard, and no one stirred from his post in the three valleys of Salenche, the Tarentaise, and the Maurienne. On the maritime Alps, and with that army called the army of Italy, things were not in the same state. There, hostilities had been resumed in good time, and ever since the month of May they had recommenced the contest as to the important post of Saorgio, upon which depended the protection of Nice. In point of fact, this post once fairly gained, the French would become masters of the Col-de-Tende, and have held the key of the great chain of the Alps. Consequently, the Piedmontese had exhibited as much energy in defending it as we did in attempting to get possession of it. The Piedmontese had, as well in Savoy as on the side of Nice, forty thousand men, reinforced by eight thousand Austrian auxiliaries. Their troops, subdivided into various divisions of equal force from the Col-de-Tende to the Great St. Bernard, had followed, as did all those of the allies, the system of cordons, and guarded all the valleys. The French army of Italy was in a most deplorable state; composed at the utmost of fifteen thousand men, in want of every thing, badly regulated, no great attempts could be expected from that quarter. General Biron, who had commanded it for a short period, increased it by five thousand men, but he was unable to provide the necessary requisites. Had one of those enlarged conceptions, which would have ruined us in the north, have originated in the south, our ruin could not have been the less certain in that quarter. The Piedmontese could, by taking advantage of the frost, which utterly paralyzes all warlike preparations in the quarter of the high Alps, have conveyed all their forces to the southern Alps, and debouching upon Nice with a mass of thirty thousand men, have overthrown our army of Italy, driven it back upon the insurgent departments, have dispersed it entirely, have fomented the rebellion on both sides of the Rhône, have advanced perhaps as far as Grenoble and Lyons, engaged our army in the rear, already engaged upon the plains of Savoy, and in this manner invaded one entire portion of France. But there was no more an Amadis with them than there was an Eugene with the Austrians, or a Marlborough with the English. They, therefore, confined themselves to the defence of Saorgio.

Brunet, who succeeded Anselme, had made the same efforts against the post of Saorgio, that Dampierro had made in the quarter of Condié. After numerous bloody and fruitless conflicts, an engagement of a decisive character took place, which terminated in a complete rout. Even then, if the enemy had borrowed a little boldness from his success, he could have dispersed us altogether, have compelled us to evacuate Nice, and to recross the Var. Kellermann had lost no time in leaving his head quarters in the Alps, had rallied the army at the camp of Denjon, appointed posts of defence, and gave orders that no movement whatever should be made until new forces should come up. The situation of this army was rendered more particularly perilous by one circumstance, and that was the appearance of the English admiral Hood in the Mediterranean, who had issued from Gibraltar with thirty-seven sail, and of the admiral Langara, who had sailed from the Spanish ports with nearly as large a naval force. Soldiers might thus have been landed, have occupied the line of the Var, and taken the French in the rear. As it was, the presence of the squadrons prevented our sending provisions by sea, was favourable to the rebellion of the south, and induced Corsica to throw herself into the arms of the English. Our fleets repaired in the harbour of Toulon the damage they had suffered in the unfortunate expedition against Sardinia, and were with difficulty enabled to protect the coasting vessels importing corn from Italy. The Mediterranean we no longer called our own, and the commerce of the Levant was diverted by way of Marseilles to the Greeks and the English. Thus the army of Italy had in front the Piedmontese, victorious in so many engagements, and at their back the insurrectionists of the south and the two squadrons.

At the Pyrenees, the war with Spain, which had been proclaimed the 7th of March, as a consequence of the death of Louis XVI., had hardly commenced. The preparations were slowly conducted on both sides, because Spain, who was slothful, indolent, and wretchedly administered, could not hasten; and because France had upon her hands another class of enemies, who occupied all her attention. Servan, commander-in-chief at the Pyrenees, had spent several months in regulating his army, and in accusing Pache with quite as much bitterness as ever Dumouriez had done. Things had remained in precisely the same state under Bouchotte, and when the campaign opened, the general still reiterated his complaints against the minister, who, he said, had suffered him to be destitute of necessaries. The two countries communicate with each other by two points, Perpignan and Bayonne. To conduct a vigorous invasion against Bayonne and Bordeaux, and thus touch upon La Vendée, was too bold an experiment for that time; the more so as the enemy imagined that we were better able to cope with him on that quarter than we really were; besides, he must have crossed the Landes, the Garonne, and the Dordogne, and difficulties such as these were quite enough to have diverted him from this design, even if he had meditated such a plan. The court of Madrid preferred an attack by Perpignan, because she possessed in that quarter a more firm footing by reason of her fortresses, because, also, she relied upon the royalists of the south in consequence of the promises of the emigrants, and because she had not been able to forget her ancient pretensions to the Roussillon. Four or five thousand were left to protect Aragon; fifteen or eighteen thousand, half of them regulars, and the other half militia, were to fight under general Caro in the western Pyrenees; and lastly, general Ricardos, with twenty-four thousand men, had the command of an important expedition against the Roussillon.

Two great valleys, that of the Tech and that of the Tet, break off from the chain of the Pyrenees, and spreading out towards Perpignan, form our two outermost lines of defence. Perpignan is situated on the second, that of the Tet. Ricardos, who had received intelligence of our deficiencies, hit upon a bold expedient: he covered the forts of Bellegardo and Les Bains, situated on the first line, and boldly marched onward with the design of falling upon all our detachments scattered through the valleys, by getting beyond them. This attempt proved eminently successful. He defiled into the valley on the 15th of April, beat off the detachments under General Villet sent to stop his progress, and struck a panic terror over the whole frontier. Had he marched on with ten thousand men, he would have made himself master of Perpignan, but he had not hardihood enough for that; besides, he had not made preparations for going further, and so gave the French time to recover themselves.

The command, which appeared too great for a single general, was divided. Servan took the command of the western Pyrenees, and general Deflers, who, we have already observed, was engaged on the expedition against the Dutch, the eastern Pyrenees. The latter rallied the army before Perpignan, at a position called the Mas d'Eu. On the 19th of May, Ricardos, having contrived to collect eighteen thousand men, made an attack upon the French camp. The brave general Dagobert, who retained to an advanced age all the spirit of a young man, and combining with his bravery the advantage of great experience, succeeded in keeping his ground on the field of battle. Deflers came up with a reserve of eighteen hundred men, and the ground was kept. The day declined, and the conflict seemed to promise a successful issue; but towards nightfall, our soldiers, tired out by the length of the engagement, gave ground, and fled in disorder, to seek shelter under Perpignan. The intimidated garrison shut the gates, and fired upon our troops, whom they took for Spaniards. Now had been the time to have assailed Perpignan off-hand, and to have seized upon this place, which could not have held out; but Ricardos, who had done nothing beyond covering Bellegard and Les Bains, did not conceive that he ought to venture further, and returned to the siege of these petty fortresses. He possessed himself of them towards the end of June, and showed himself once more to our troops, who had rallied to nearly the same positions as before. Therefore, in July, a lost battle might have caused the capture of Roussillon.

We now observe how calamities increase, as we come to the consideration of another theatre of war, far more bloody and more terrible than those we have hitherto noticed. La Vendée, involved in fire and blood, was about to vomit forth to the other side of the Loire a formidable column. We left the Vendéans, warmed with their unhoped-for successes, in possession of the town of Thouars, which they had taken from Quétineau, and beginning to contemplate designs of greater importance. Instead of marching upon Douai and Saumur, they bent their march southwards of the theatre of war, and were anxious to clear the country in the quarter of Fontenay and Niort. MM. de Lescure and de Larochejaquelein, who had the conduct of this expedition, attacked Fontenay upon the 16th of May. Being checked at the onset by general Sandos, they fell back some distance, but almost immediately taking advantage of the blind confidence which possessed the republican general upon his early success, they came up again, from fifteen to twenty thousand in number, took possession of Fontenay, in spite of the exertions displayed by the young Marceau upon this day, and compelled Chalbos and Sandos to retire to Niort in the utmost disorder. Here they found a great quantity of arms and ammunition, and enriched themselves with new resources, which, in conjunction with those they had procured from Thouars, enabled them to push the war with every expectation of fresh successes. Lescure addressed a proclamation to the inhabitants, and threatened them with the most dreadful punishment if they afforded assistance to the republicans. After which the Vendéans separated, as they usually did, to return to their agricultural pursuits, and they were appointed to meet again upon the first of June in the environs of Doué.

In Lower Vendée, where Charette had the sole command, without as yet connecting his movements with those of the other leaders, the success had been evenly balanced. Cancelaux, commandant at Nantes, could but with great difficulty keep his position at Machecoul; general Boulard, who had the command at Sables, owing to the good conduct and the discipline of his army, had occupied for two months Lower Vendée, and had even kept his advanced posts up to the environs of Pal-was pouring forth her strength against us; and they also felt that, under such circumstances, there was but one good course to pursue, that is to say, the most energetic. In point of fact, all the factions already gathering around them had pointed out their criminality. It was not only the constituents, but the agents of the old court, the followers of the old clergy, in short, all the partisans of absolute power, who rose, as it were, as one man, and they plainly perceived that every opposition to the revolution must necessarily benefit the enemies of liberty and indivisible nationality.

Such were the causes which rendered the allies so inefficient and timorous, the Vendéans so limited in their views, the federalists so uncertain, all which mainly assured the victory of the convention over its enemies both at home and all over Europe. The Mountaineers, who were solely inspired by one grand desire, one single feeling, for the welfare of the revolution, and demonstrating that elevation of mind which brings into action the most unheard-of and the boldest means, which considers nothing too hazardous or too costly, so that it be serviceable, could hardly do other than confound by an unforeseen and grand scheme of action, their slothful, pedantic, and hole-and-corner enemies, and, at the same time, strangle in their birth those factions who wanted the old regime in all its vigour, as well as the revolution in all its vigour, and who possessed neither consistency or determination of object.

The convention, in the midst of the extraordinary circumstances in which it was placed, did not experience a single hour of disturbance. While fortresses or entrenched camps were for a short time obstructing the advance of the enemy upon the several frontiers, the committee of public welfare laboured night and day in re-organizing the armies, by affording them their full complement by means of the levy of three hundred thousand men ordered in March, by sending instructions to the generals, and by dispatching funds and ammunition. The convention held parley with all those local administrations who showed a desire of withholding for the federalist cause the supplies appointed for the armies, and prevailed upon them, out of pure consideration for the public welfare, to desist from such courses.

While these expedients were being employed with regard to the enemy abroad, the convention did not resort to less efficacious measures with regard to the enemy at home. The most available resource against an adversary who doubts his right as well as power, is not to have the least doubt upon one's own. Upon this principle it was that the convention acted. We have already remarked upon the energetic decrees which it promulgated on the first demonstration of the outbreak. Numerous towns refusing to yield obedience, the idea never crossed their minds for one instant to hold any terms with those whose actions bore the decided impress of rebellion. The Lyonnese, having refused to yield obedience, and to send back to Paris the incarcerated patriots, the convention ordered its commissaries stationed near the army of the Alps to use force, and that without giving itself any thought as to the difficulties and dangers which these commissaries would experience at Grenoble, where they had the Piedmontese in their front, and all the rebels of the Isère and the Rhône in their rear. The convention also charged them to bring back Marseilles to a sense of duty. No more than three days were allowed for all the administrative powers to retract their equivocal resolutions; and, in short, the convention despatched to Vernon some light horse, and some thousand citizens of Paris, to put down, in an off-hand manner, the rebels of Calvados, who were the nearest to the capital.

The grand expedient of the constitution was not neglected, and eight days sufficed for the completion of this work, which was rather meant to serve as a rallying point, than as really a scheme of legislation. Herauld de Séchelles was the person who digested it. According to his plan of legislation, every Frenchman, at the age of twenty-one, became a citizen, and of capacity to exercise his political rights without any regard to fortune or property. The citizens in assembly were to nominate a single deputy for every fifty thousand souls. The deputies, who were to form of themselves an assembly, could not sit longer than one year. They were to issue decrees in respect of all matters concerning the emergencies of the state, and these decrees were to be carried into execution forthwith. They were to enact laws in respect of all general and less emergent matters, and these enactments were not to be sanctioned, unless after some delay had intervened the primary assemblies did not protest against them. On the 1st of May the primary assemblies were to meet as a matter of inherent right, and without being summoned for that purpose, for the purpose of renewing the deputies. The primary assemblies were enabled to demand special meetings for qualifying the constitutional act. The executive power was confined to twenty-four members nominated by the electors, and this was the only mediate election. The primary assemblies nominated the electors; these electors in their turn nominated the candidates, and the legislative body was to reduce them by striking out the names of the candidates to twenty-four. These twenty-four members of council were to appoint generals, ministers and agents of every description, and were to take them from among their own body. They were to direct them, to oversee them, and were perpetually responsible. The executive council was to be renewed as to one half every year. In short, this form of a constitution, so brief and so democratic, whereby the government was reduced to a mere temporary commission, yet left untouched one remaining vestige of the old regime, the communes, and neither altered the limits of their administration, or their powers. The energy which they had demonstrated, was the means of preserving them upon this raised tablet, whereon no trace of the past was suffered to remain. Almost without discussion, and in eight days, this constitution was adopted*, and at the moment when it passed in its complete state, the guns echoed throughout Paris, and shouts of joy were heard on every side. Several thousand copies were printed for the purpose of being sent to every part of France. It experienced but one single mark of opposition, and that emanated from some of the agitators who had planned the events of the 31st of May.

* It passed into law the 24th June. The draft had been laid on the table the 10th.

The reader will recollect young Varlet making prosy harangues in places of public resort, also the young Lyonnese, Leclerc, so intemperate in his orations at the Jacobins, and even suspected by Marat for his excesses, as well as Jacques Roux, who acted with such inhumanity towards Louis XVI., who wished him to take charge of his will; all these persons made themselves very notorious in the late insurrection, and possessed great influence at the committee of the Evêché and at the Cordeliers. They found fault, because the constitution contained no enactment against monopolizers; they prepared a petition, got it signed in the streets, and ran to excite the Cordeliers, in declaring that the constitution was incomplete, because it contained no proviso against the greatest enemies the people had. Legendre in vain did his best to oppose this motion; he was considered as a moderatis, and the petition as adopted by the society was by them presented to the convention. On hearing it read, the Mountain became quite indignant. Robespierre and Collot d'Herbois were in a great chafe; got the petition refused, and went themselves to the Jacobins to demonstrate the danger of these perfidious exaggerations, which had no other tendency, as they said, than to lead the people astray, and could only proceed from persons in the pay of the enemies of the republic. "The most popular constitution that has ever existed," said Robespierre, "has but recently emanated from an assembly formerly counter-revolutionary, but since purged of those men who thwarted its operations and impeded its progress. At this time, being in a pure state, this assembly has produced the most complete, the most popular production that ever was imparted to man; and now it is that a single individual, under the mask of patriotism, who boasts that his love for his country is far greater than ours, stirs up the citizens of every class, and wishes to demonstrate that this very constitution, around which all France ought to rally, does not suit them! Beware of such manoeuvres—beware of these ci-devant priests now identified with the Austrians! Take heed of the new disguise in which the aristocrats wish to shroud themselves! I have a glimmering of some new crime about to take place, and which perhaps will not be long before it bursts upon our view; but let us unveil it, and we shall be able to crush the enemies of the people under whatsoever form they may appear." Collot d'Herbois spoke in quite as animated a tone as Robespierre; he maintained that the enemies of the republic wished to have it in their power to say to the departments, "Ye see now, Paris approves of the language of Jacques Roux."

These two orators were received with unanimous acclamations. The Jacobins, who piqued themselves upon their method of blending policy with revolutionary excitement, and prudential considerations with energetic measures, despatched a deputation to the Cordeliers. Collot d'Herbois was its prolocutor. He was received at the Cordeliers with the consideration considered due to one of the most distinguished members of the Jacobins as well as of the Mountain. The Cordeliers professed to entertain the deepest respect for the society which had sent him thither. The petition was withdrawn, Jacques Roux and Leclerc were expelled, Varlet only obtained remission on account of his youth, and Legendre received an explanation of the not very warrantable expressions which had been applied to him the evening before. The constitution thus vindicated, was sent to every quarter of France to receive the sanction of all the primary assemblies.

Thus the convention presented to the departments with one hand the constitution, and with the other the decree which gave them no longer than three days to decide upon its merits. The constitution justified the Mountain against the imputation of desiring to usurp the supreme power, furnished it with a pretext to rally round a lawfully constituted authority; and the decree limiting three days afforded no time for hesitation, and compelled the departments to range themselves on the side of obedience.

In point of fact, a great number of departments gave way, while others persisted in their former designs. But these latter, by their reciprocating addresses, and sending round deputations to each other, appeared to wait for each other before they would make up their mind how to act. The distance at which they were situated from each other did not allow them to correspond with rapidity and to form an union. Moreover, the entire absence of that genius which characterized the revolution, was an insuperable bar to their success. Let the masses be as favourably disposed as can be imagined, they have no inclination themselves to make every sacrifice, unless they are compelled thereto by men of impassioned minds. Very violent measures indeed would have been requisite to excite the unimpassioned mechanics of the towns, before they could be compelled to march, contribute, and use their utmost exertions. But the Girondists, who condemned such measures in the Mountainers, could not adopt them as their own expedients. The merchants of Bordeaux thought they had done a great deal when they had spoken with some slight animation in the sections, but they never went beyond the walls of their town. The Marseillais, who were a little more decisive, had despatched six thousand men to Avignon, but they themselves formed no part of this small army; they sent their substitutes. The Lyonnese were awaiting the junction of the Provençals and Languedocians; the ardour of the Normans seemed somewhat cooled; the Bretons were the only persons who acted consistently with their declarations, and themselves filled the squares of their own battalions. There were considerable disturbances at Caen, the principal seat of the rebellion. The columns who were to proceed from this point, would be the first to engage with the troops of the convention, and therefore this first engagement could not but be regarded with some anxiety. The proscribed deputies who gathered around Wimpfen made sad complaints of his inertness, and thought they perceived some glimmerings of his being a royalist. However, Wimpfen pressed on all sides, gave orders to Puisaye to take his advance guard to Vernon on the 13th of July, and announced that he himself would set out on his march with all his forces. In fact, on the 13th, Puisaye advanced towards Pacy, and fell in with the levies of Paris, who were accompanied by a few hundreds of light horse. A slight firing was exchanged on both sides in the woods. On the next day, the federalists possessed Pacy, and appear to have a little the advantage. But on the following day the troops of the convention made their appearance with cannon. At the very first discharge the ranks of the federalists exhibited great fear; they dispersed, and fled confusedly to Evreux. The Bretons, who manifested more firmness, retired in much better order; but they were involved in the retrograde movement of their companions. The department of the Calvados was astounded on receiving the intelligence, and all the public administrations began to repent of their misconducted proceedings. The moment that this defeat was known at Caen, Wimpfen called the deputies together, and proposed to them that they should entrench themselves in that town, and stand out at all hazards. Wimpfen, in further explanation, told them that he saw but one course to be pursued for continuing this contest, and that was to provide themselves a powerful ally, and that if they agreed in this sentiment, he would procure them one; he even went so far as to lead them to suppose that he alluded to the English Cabinet. He added, that for his part he conceived the republic was an impracticable affair, and that so far as his opinion was concerned, he did not consider a return to a monarchical form of government was a thing so much to be dreaded. The Girondists repelled most strongly every offer of this nature, and openly expressed their indignation. Some of them had already begun to consider the imprudence of their designs, and the danger that presented itself in raising any standard whatever, since every one of the factions would proceed to rally round it as a means of overturning the Republican system. They did not however despair, but thought of retiring to Bordeaux, where some of them thought some movement of a truly Republican character might be brought about, which might terminate more favourably than that of Calvados and Brittany. They therefore set out with the Breton battalions who returned homewards with them, and intended to embark at Brest. They assumed a soldier's uniform, and mixed themselves with the ranks of the Finisterre battalion. It was indeed necessary for them to conceal themselves ever since the check received at Vernon, for all the administrative authorities, most anxious to submit themselves, and afford testimonies of their zeal for the convention, would most certainly have caused them to be arrested. They thus traversed a part of Normandy and Brittany in the midst of constant apprehensions and terrible privations, and managed at last to conceal themselves in the environs of Brest, in order to get from thence to Bordeaux. Barbaroux, Pétion, Salles, Louvet, Meilhan, Guadet, Kervélégan, Gorsas, Girey-Dupré, an assistant of Brissot, Marchenna a young Spaniard, who had just come to seek liberty in France, Rionffe, a young man who was attached to the Girondists from purely enthusiastic motives, composed this band of illustrious fugitives, hunted down as traitors to their country, although ready at a minutes' warning to lay down their lives for her good, and even considering that they were pursuing the best means to render her service, while they were jeopardising her by the most perilous distraction.

In Brittany, in the departments of the West, and the Upper Basin of the Loire, the administrative authorities showed an extreme anxiety to retrace their steps to avoid being outlawed. The constitution, circulated everywhere, became an excuse for an universal submission. The convention, as it was said, demonstrated neither any intention of perpetuating herself, or a desire to usurp supreme power until she had presented a constitution; this constitution would therefore at once put an end to the prevalence of factions, and seemed to comprise the most simple mode of government ever known. During this period, the Mountaineer municipalities, and the Jacobin clubs, redoubled their efforts, and the single-minded partisans of the Gironde were compelled to submit to a revolution which they neither possessed weight enough to oppose, or could have had strength enough to defend. From that time, Thoultouse endeavoured to justify herself. The Bordelais, who had exhibited greater determination, did not tender a formal submission, but withdrew their advance guard, and forebore to proclaim their intended march against Paris. Two other important events had a tendency to put an end to the perils of the convention in the West and South; these were the defence of Nantes, and the dispersion of the rebellers of the Lozère.

We have already noticed the Vendéans at Saumur, masters of the country along the Loire, and thus enabled if they had but known the strength of their position, to have made an attempt upon Paris, which might in all probability have succeeded, for La Flèche and Mans were totally defenceless. The younger Bonchamps, who alone carried his ideas beyond La Vendée, would have desired that an inroad should be made into Brittany, so as to allow them one seaport, and then to march upon Paris. But his companions in arms did not possess sufficient military genius to make them comprehend this. The only capital upon which their march should be directed, was, in their notion, Nantes; neither their intelligence or hopes went a jot farther than that point. However, they had many reasons for acting as they did, for Nantes would open a communication with the sea, would also ensure the possession of the whole country, and nothing would, after the capture of this town, prevent the Vendéans from attempting the boldest enterprises. Besides, they would not have their soldiers torn from their homes, a great consideration with peasants, who never liked to lose sight of their church-steeple. Charette, master of Lower Vendée, after having made a feint attack upon Sablé, had seized upon Machecoul, and was already before the gates of Nantes. He had never yet acted in unison with the chiefs of La Vendée, but on this occasion he offered to regulate his operations by theirs. He undertook to make an attack upon Nantes on the left bank, while the main body of the army was to make the attack on the right bank, and with such a combination of resources it seemed scarcely possible not to succeed.

The Vendéans, then, having evacuated Saumur, went down towards Angers, and put themselves in order to march from Angers upon Nantes, defiling along the right side of the river Loire. Their army had been sadly diminished, because the peasants would not engage themselves in so remote an expedition. Nevertheless it was not composed of less than thirty thousand men, or thereabouts. They appointed a commander-in-chief, and fixed upon Cathelineau, a carrier, in order to pay a compliment to the peasantry, and to attach them in future to their cause. M. de Lescure, who was suffering from a wound, was to stay in the country to procure fresh musters, for the purpose of keeping the troops of Niort in check, and to prevent any interruption being offered to the siege of Nantes.

In the meanwhile the commission of the representatives, sitting at Tours, sought for relief in every quarter, and urged Biron, who was surveying the coast, to bring himself up without delay upon the rear of the Vendéans. Not contenting itself with recalling Biron, the commission regulated military movements in his absence, and despatched to Nantes all the troops which could be got together at Saumur. Biron immediately replied to the suggestions of the commission; he acquiesced, as he said, in the movements executed without his orders, but he was obliged to guard Sablos and La Rochelle, places of far greater importance in his eyes than Nantes; the battalions of the Gironde the flower of the army were about to leave him, and there was an absolute necessity for his replacing them; it was impossible to set his army in motion without witnessing its disorganization and love of pillage, it was so very undisciplined; all that he could do, at the utmost, was to send a detachment of three thousand organized men, and it would be the height of absurdity for him, added he, to march upon Saumur, and to station himself in the midst of that country with so inefficient a force. Biron at the same time wrote to the committee of public welfare, tendering his resignation, since the representatives were thus in the habit of arrogating to themselves the right of command. The committee answered him, that it was no more than reasonable that the representatives should advise or propose certain operations; but they had no right to order them, and that it solely belonged to him to take such measures as he considered expedient to preserve Nantes, Rochelle, and Niort. Biron, upon this, did not the less relax his endeavours to form a small army more easy of transference, and with which he might be able to proceed to the relief of the besieged town.

The Vendéans, in this interval, quitted Angers the 27th, and on the 28th came in sight of Nantes. They made a threatening summons to the town, which was not even heard, and made ready for the attack. It was arranged to take place upon both sides of the river on the 29th, at two o'clock in the morning. Canclaux had no more than five thousand regular troops to guard an immense area intersected by various branches of the Loire, and about the same number of national guards. He made the best arrangements possible, and imparted the highest confidence to the garrison. On the 29th, Charette, at the appointed hour, commenced the attack on the quarter of the bridges; but Cathelineau, who conducted his operations on the right bank, and had the difficult portion of the enterprise, was stopped by the post of Niort, where some hundred men made the most heroic defence. The attack, thus delayed on that quarter, consequently became more obstructed. Nevertheless, the Vendéans spread themselves behind the hedges and in the gardens, and very nearly hemmed in the town. Canclaux, the commander-in-chief, and Doysser, commandant of the citadel, everywhere supported the republican troops. On his part, Cathelineau redoubled his exertions; already he had pushed far into a suburb, when he was mortally wounded by a musket-ball; his soldiers retired in dismay, bearing him off upon their shoulders. From that moment the besiegers slackened in their attack. After an eighteen hours' fight, the Vendéans dispersed themselves, and the place was saved.

Every one on this day had done his duty. The national guard had rivalled in their exertions the troops of the line, and the mayor himself received a wound. The next day the Vendéans threw themselves into their boats, and returned back into the heart of the country. From this time no opportunity of carrying any great enterprise was afforded them, and they could no longer aspire to the performance of any important operation; indeed all they could expect to do was to occupy their own country. At this period, Biron, hastening on his way to relieve Nantes, arrived at Angers with whatever troops he had been able to collect, while Westermann was repairing to Vendée with his Germanic legion.

Nantes had hardly been relieved, before the administrative authority, favourably inclined towards the Girondists, desired to join the insurgents of the Calvados. In point of fact, the administration passed a resolution demonstrative of its hostility to the convention. Canclaux opposed this resolution with all his might, and succeeded in bringing the Nantesais to order.

Thus the greatest dangers were now surmounted in this quarter. A no less important event took place in the department of the Lozère; this was the submission of thirty thousand rebels, who might have otherwise been able to have put themselves in communication with the Vendéans, or with the Spaniards of Roussillon.

By a series of most favorable occurrences, the deputy Fabre, a delegate to the army of the eastern Pyrenees, happened to be upon the very spot at the moment of the outbreak; he thereupon displayed that energy which subsequently precipitated him on a premature death in the Pyrenees. He seized upon the administrative authorities, placed the entire population under arms, and called about him all the forces of the environs, consisting in light horse and regular troops; he raised the Cantal, the Upper Loire, the Pny-de-Dome; and the rebels, stricken at the very outset, pursued on all sides, became dispersed, were thus driven into the woods, and their chief, the ex-constituent Charrier, himself fell into the hands of the conquerors. From his papers, it was clearly shown that his design was closely identified with the great conspiracy, discovered six months previous in Brittany, and the promoter whereof, La Rouarie, had died before he could carry his schemes into execution. Order was now restored in the mountains of the centre and the south, the rear of the army of the Pyrenees was protected, and the valley of the Rhône had no more than one of its flanks covered by mountains in rebellion.

An unexpected victory over the Spanish in the Roussillon, completed the subjection of the south. We have noticed them, after their first march into the valleys of the Tech and the Tet, retreating to effect the capture of Bellegarde and Les Bains, and then coming back and taking up their quarters in front of the French camp. After having made their observations for a considerable time, they attacked the camp on the 17th of July. The French had scarcely twelve thousand recruits; the Spanish, on the contrary, numbered fifteen or sixteen thousand men, well-appointed and disciplined. Ricardos, intending to surround us, had divided his attack more than was necessary. Our young volunteer, supported by General Barbantane and the brave Dagobert, held out courageously in their intrenchments, and, after the most unheard of exertions, seemed to have made up their minds to retreat. Dagobert, who was looking out for this movement, dashed upon them; but one of his battalions altogether separated and fell into confusion. Fortunately, Deflers and Barbantane, observing this incident, rushed to the assistance of Dagobert, and they all darted onwards with such violence, that the enemy was driven from the field. This action of the 17th of July raised the courage of our soldiers, and, to use the words of an historian, it caused at the Pyrenees the same effect that Valmy had produced in Champagne the year before.

In the quarter of the Alps, Dubois-Crance, stationed between Savoy in a state of discontent, Switzerland who had not declared herself, and Grenoble and Lyons in open rebellion, conducted himself most energetically, and made the most of his advantages. So long as the sectionary authorities were taking before his face the federalist oath, so long did he cause to be taken the opposite oath by the club and by his army, and waited for the earliest opportunity to put himself in motion. In short, having seized the correspondence of the authorities, he therein discovered the proof that they were seeking to associate themselves with Lyons; he then denounced them to the people of Grenoble, as desiring to bring about the dissolution of the republic by means of a civil war; and, striking while the iron was hot, he displaced them, and restored all the powers to the old municipality. From that instant, being at ease with respect to Grenoble, he occupied himself with the reorganization of the army of the Alps, so as to preserve Savoy, and to carry into execution the decrees of the convention against Lyons and Marseilles. He remodelled all the staffs, restored order in his battalions, incorporated the recruits accruing from the levy of three hundred thousand men; and, although the departments of the Lozère and of the Upper Loire, had employed their contingent in quelling the revolt of their mountainous districts, he did his best to supply their place by calls upon the public authorities for assistance. After these preliminary attentions, he sent out General Carteaux with some thousand infantry, as well as with the legion raised in Savoy, under the style of the Legion of the Allobroges, to proceed to Valence, there to command the course of the Rhône, and to prevent the junction of the Marseillais with the Lyonnese. Carteaux set out early in July, conveyed himself quickly to Valence, and from Valence to Pont Saint-Esprit, where he took up the corps of the Nimois, disbanded some, embodied others, and made himself sure of both sides of the Rhône. He then made all the haste he could to get to Avignon, where the Marseillais had for some time previously fixed themselves.

While these occurrences took place at Grenoble, Lyons, on all occasions affecting the greatest fidelity to the republic, making promises to maintain its unity and its indivisibility, did not, for all that, render obedience to that decree of the convention which transferred to the revolutionary tribunal of Paris the procedures directed against certain patriots. The commission and the staff of Lyons were mostly filled by concealed royalists. Rambaud, president of the commission, and Précy, commandant of the departmental force, were secretly devoted to the cause of emigration. Led astray by insidious suggestions, the unhappy Lyonnese were about to compromise themselves with the convention, who, from this time in a situation to compel obedience and also victorious, was about to pour forth upon the last remaining rebellious town all the chastisement which had been reserved for prostrate federalism. In the mean time, the Lyonnese furnished themselves with arms at Saint-Etienne, and enlisted deserters of every degree; but being by no means desirous of committing an open act of rebellion, they permitted the supplies appointed for the frontiers to pass, and ordered the release of the deputies Noël-Pointe, Santeyrn, and Lescrypt-Beauvais, who had been arrested by the neighbouring communes.

The Jura was somewhat tranquillized; the representatives, Bassal and Garnier, whom we have seen were with fifteen hundred men surrounded by fifteen thousand, had sent away their too insufficient forces, and did their utmost to open a negotiation. They succeeded in this, and the revolted administrative authorities had promised the convention to extinguish this movement by the acceptance of the constitution.

Nearly two months had elapsed since the 2nd of June (for it was now near the end of July); Valenciennes and Mentz had been always threatened; but Normandy, Brittany, and nearly all the departments of the west, had returned to their allegiance. Nantes had just been rescued from the Vendéans, the Bordelais dared not to stir outside their walls, the Lozère had submitted, the Pyrenees were for the time being in perfect security, Grenoble was quiet, Marseilles was cut off from Lyons by the success of Carteaux, and Lyons, although refusing to render obedience to the decrees of the convention, nevertheless did not dare to declare open war. The authority of the convention was thus nearly quite re-established in the interior. On the one side the inertness of the federalists, their want of unanimity, and their half-measures; on the other side, the energy of the convention, the unity of its might, its centrality, its long usage of the tone of command, its policy alternately clever and vigorous, had decided the triumph of the Jacobins over this last effort of the Girondists. Let us congratulate ourselves upon this result, for at the very moment while France was attacked on every side, the fittest person to have the command was the most vigorous. The vanquished federalists condemned themselves by their own words: "Honest folks," said they, "have never known what it is to possess energy."

But while the federalists were borne down on all sides, one closing incident served to excite the most violent prejudices against them.

At this period there was living in the department of the Calvados a young woman, aged twenty-five years, uniting to great personal beauty a resolute and independent character. Her name was Charlotte Corday d'Armana; her life was unblemished, but her mind was active and restless. She had left her father's house, in order to live with more freedom with one of her friends at Caen. Her father had formerly, by his writings, protested in favour of the privileges of his province, at a period when France was reduced to the necessity of insisting upon the privileges of her towns and province. The youthful Corday, as did many women of her time, had excited herself in the cause of the revolution, and, like Madame Roland, she was intoxicated with the idea of a republic properly constituted, and rising in moral elevation. The Girondists seemed to her as the persons most likely to realize her day-dream; the Mountainers appeared to her as the only persons who interposed obstacles to the accomplishment of her reveries, and when she heard the news of the 31st of May, she resolved to avenge her darling orators. The war of the Calvados had commenced; she believed that the death of the anarchist leader, operating in concurrence with the insurrection of the departments, would insure victory to the latter; she therefore resolved to perform a grand act of self-immolation, and to offer up for her country a life, for which neither a husband, children, or family, presented attraction or solace. She concealed her intentions from her father, and wrote to him that as the troubles of France were growing every day more frightful, she had gone to seek quiet and safety in England. Immediately after writing this letter, she set out for Paris. Before her departure, she was desirous of seeing at Caen those deputies who were the subjects of her enthusiasm and self-devotion. In order to gain an introduction to them, she invented a pretext, and requested from Barbaroux a letter of introduction to the minister of the Interior, having, as she said, some papers to claim for a friend, an old canoness. Barbaroux gave her a letter addressed to the deputy Duperret, the friend of Garat. His colleagues, who saw her as he did, and as well as he, heard her give utterance to her hatred against the Mountainers, and witnessed her enthusiastic aspirations for a pure and well-regulated republic, were struck with her beauty, and affected by her sentiments. All of them, however, were unconscious of her designs.

On her arrival at Paris, Charlotte Corday considered upon the choice of a victim. Danton and Robespierre were quite enough distinguished among the Mountain party as worthy of being stricken by her; but Marat was the one who had appeared in more frightful colours to the provinces, and he was also the person who was looked upon as the chief of the anarchists. She at first conceived the idea of striking the blow at Marat on the very pinnacle of the Mountain, and in the midst of his friends; but this she could not effect, for Marat was at this time in a state that prevented his sitting at the convention. It will doubtless be recollected, that he had voluntarily suspended himself from his functions for the space of fifteen days; but observing that the process against the Girondists could not yet be brought to a termination, he put an end to this ridiculous farce, and appeared again in his place shortly afterwards. One of those inflammatory disorders, which during revolutions cut off those turbid lives that do not expire upon the scaffold, compelled him to retire, and to return to his own home. There, nothing could satisfy his morbid activity; he was accustomed to pass one portion of the day in his bath surrounded by pens and paper unceasingly writing, composing his newspaper, addressing letters to the convention, and complaining that they did not pay him sufficient attention. He wrote one final letter, stating, that if they did not read it, he should cause himself to be carried, sick as he was, to the tribune, and there read it himself. In this letter he denounced two generals, Custine and Biron. "Custine," said he, "transferred from the Rhine to the North, was doing just what Dumouriez always did; he was speaking against the anarchists, he modelled his staffs just as he chose, armed some battalions, disarmed others, and never distributed them but in conformity to his own designs, which doubtless were those of a conspirator." (It will be recollected, that Custine was taking the opportunity of the siege of Valenciennes to reorganize the army of the North in Caesar's camp). "As to Biron, he was an old hanger-on at court; he was affecting to be possessed with a great horror of the English, for the purpose of keeping himself in the Lower Vendée, and to connive at the enemy's taking possession of the Upper Vendée. He evidently was temporising, and was waiting till the English had made a descent, in order to join them, and deliver our army into their power. The Vendean war ought to have been finished by this time. A person of any judgment, having once had the opportunity of seeing the Vendean fight, ought to discover the means of destroying them. As for himself, who was well acquainted with military tactics, he had invented an infallible manoeuvre, and if his health had not been so impaired, he should have gone himself to the banks of the Loire to put his experiment in execution. Custine and Biron were the Dumouriez's of the day; and after having had them arrested, some new course should be taken which should stop the mouths of all calumniators, and should firmly bind all the deputies, beyond the power of retracting, to the revolution; and this was to put to death the imprisoned Bourbons, and to put a price upon the heads of those who had fled. After this, one party could not accuse the other with a design of placing villains on the throne, and would thus effectually prevent the others from ever making their peace with the Capet family." Here were constantly exhibited, as we see, the same self-conceit, the same rage, and the same promptitude in anticipating popular apprehensions. Custine and Biron were, in point of fact, about to become the two objects of the general hatred, and it was Marat, who, ill and in a dying state, had once more the honour of taking the lead.

Charlotte Corday was therefore obliged to seek him at his own home before she could get at him. At first she delivered him the letter which she had for Duperret; performed her commission at the minister of the interior's, and prepared to carry her design into execution. She asked a hackney-coachman for Marat's address, went thither, and was refused admission. She then wrote to him, stating, that having arrived from the Calvados, she had important matters to communicate. This proved quite sufficient to procure her an introduction. In short, on the 13th July, she presented herself for admittance at eight o'clock in the evening. The housekeeper of Marat, a young woman of twenty-seven, whom he treated as his wife, seemed to deny him. Marat, who was then in his bath, hearing Charlotte Corday, ordered her to be introduced. Remaining alone with him, she related what she had observed at Caen, next listened to, and surveyed him attentively, before she struck the blow. Marat with great eagerness desired to know the names of the then present deputies at Caen; she informed him, and he, snatching up a pencil, set about writing them down, adding, "Good, good; they shall all of them go to the guillotine." "To the guillotine!" replied the youthful and indignant Corday; and immediately she drew forth a knife from her bosom, struck Marat under the left breast, and plunged the steel into his heart. "Here!" cried he; "here, my dear!" His housekeeper darted forth on hearing his cry; a messenger who was folding newspapers hurried along with her; they both found Marat weltering in his blood, and the youthful Corday calm, serene, and perfectly still. The messenger knocked her down with a chair, the housekeeper spurned her with her feet. The disturbance attracted a crowd, and shortly the whole neighbourhood was stirring. The youthful Corday got up, and endured, with a dignified air, the outcry and the clamorous rage of those who surrounded her. The members of the section, who had hastened thither on hearing the uproar, struck with her beauty, her courage, and the serenity with which she avowed the act, protected her from being torn to pieces; and took her to prison, where she still continued to confess every thing with the same composure.

This assassination, as did that of Lepelletier, caused a great sensation. A report got immediately afloat, that it was the Girondists who had instigated Charlotte Corday to the commission of this act. The same thing was said in respect to Lepelletier, and such statements as these will always have currency upon similar occasions. Persecuted opinions generally distinguish themselves by the stroke of an assassin; and, although the conception and execution of the act proceed from the mind of some individual more keenly exasperated than others, yet the act itself is laid to the charge of all those who advocate the same opinions, and furnishes a pretext for a fresh display of vengeance, and the infliction of greater cruelties against them. There was a great difficulty as to what crimes should be laid to the charge of the imprisoned deputies; the departmental rebellion furnished the first pretence for sacrificing them, by declaring them accomplices of the fugitive deputies; the death of Marat filled up the measure of their supposed offences, and gave additional weight to the arguments which were urged for bringing them to the scaffold.

The Mountain, the Jacobins, and, above all, the Cordeliers, who boasted of having been the first to know him, to have been particularly associated with him, and in never having disavowed him, displayed great regret for his loss. It was arranged that he should be buried in their garden, and at the foot of those very trees where he was wont to read his newspaper to the people. The convention resolved upon attending his funeral in a body. At the Jacobins', it was proposed to decree extraordinary honours to his memory; it was desired that his body should be buried in the Pantheon, although the law did not allow the removal of a body thither until twenty years after decease. It was also required that the whole club should attend in a body at his funeral procession, that the presses of "The Friend of the People" should be purchased by the club, to prevent their falling into unworthy hands; that his newspaper should be continued by competent successors, who, if they could not equal, should at least be able to recall him to mind, and afford some substitute for his vigilance. Robespierre, who always directed his attention towards making the Jacobins more impressive in their appearance, in checking their extravagances, and who besides was desirous of calling that attention to himself which was rather too much fixed upon the martyr, spoke upon this occasion. "If I speak to-day," said he, "it is because I feel I have the right so to do. Daggers are the subject of your debates; it is the fate that awaits myself; I have deserved it; and it is purely the effect of chance that Marat was stricken before myself; I therefore assume the right of interposing in the debate, and to express my surprise that your energy is thus exhausting itself in idle declamations, and that your only care is for empty ceremonies. The best means of avenging Marat is to inexorably pursue his enemies. That vengeance which seeks its own satisfaction in empty funeral honours is soon at rest, and cares not to exert itself in a more effective and serviceable manner. Cast aside those useless debates, and avenge Marat in a manner more worthy of his memory!" All discussion was entirely put an end to by this address, and no more notice was taken of the propositions that had been made. Nevertheless, the Jacobins, the Convention, the Cordeliers, all the popular societies, and the sections, came in procession to strow flowers upon his coffin. The president of each company made an harangue. The section of the republic was the first: "He is dead," exclaimed its president; "he who was the friend of the people is no more; he met his death from the hand of an assassin—let us not pronounce his eulogy upon his inanimate remains! His best eulogy is the tenor of his conduct, his writings, his still bleeding wound, and his death! Ye citizenesses, (citoyennes) strow flowers upon the pallid corpse of Marat! Marat was our friend, he was the friend of the people, he lived for the people, and it was for the people that he died!" After this address, young maidens walked round the coffin, and strewed flowers upon the corpse of Marat. The speaker proceeded: "Enough of lamentation; hearken to the mighty soul of Marat, who awakens and speaks to you thus: 'Republicans, cease your tears; republicans ought to shed but one natural tear, and then think of their country! It is not myself they wished to assassinate, it is the republic; it is not myself whom you are to avenge, it is the republic; it is the people; it is yourselves!'"

All the clubs, and every one of the sections, thus came one after the other round the coffin of Marat; and if history records such scenes as these, it is but for the purpose of teaching men to reflect upon the prejudices of the moment, as well as to call upon them to examine themselves carefully before they

While this scene was taking place, the trial of the youthful Corday was being conducted with that rapidity so characteristic of revolutionary procedures. Two deputies were implicated in this affair; the one was Duperret, with whom she had been in communication, and who had been the means of introducing her to the minister of the interior; the other was Fauchet, formerly a bishop, who had become an object of suspicion on account of his connection with the right side, and more particularly because a woman, either mad or else extremely wicked, had falsely averred she had seen him in the galleries in company with the prisoner.

Charlotte Corday maintained the same serenity of aspect during her trial. The indictment was read to her, after which they proceeded to examine witnesses. Corday interrupted the first witness, and without giving him time to commence giving his evidence; "I am the person," said she, "who has killed Marat." "Who was it that induced you to commit this assassination?" asked the president. "His crimes." "What do you mean when you say 'his crimes?'" "The evils he has occasioned from the commencement of the revolution," "Name the persons who have induced you to do this," "No one but myself," answered this young maiden, with a dignified air. "I had made up my mind to do it a long time since, and I never should have conferred with others upon a deed of this description. My desire was to give peace to my country." "But do you suppose that you have slain all the Marats?" "No," sorrowfully replied the prisoner, "no." She after this forbore to interrupt the taking of the evidence; but after each deposition had been concluded, she repeated every time, "It is true, the deponent is correct." The only point on which she made a defence was in respect of her alleged connexion with the Girondists. There was but one witness that she contradicted, and that was the woman who wanted to identify Duperret and Fauchet with her cause; she then seated herself, and attended to the subsequent proceedings with the most perfect tranquillity. "You must needs observe," said Chauveau-Lagarde the advocate for the defence, "the prisoner avows every thing with the most undaunted assurance. This serenity of mind, and this self-denying principle, most elevated in one point of view, can only be referred to one cause, and that is, the most extravagant political fanaticism."

Charlotte Corday was condemned to death. Her beautiful countenance betrayed no emotion; she returned to her prison with a smile playing on her lips; she wrote to her father to ask his pardon for having thus disposed of her own life; she wrote to Barbaroux, wherein she related the incidents of her journey and the act she committed in a most inimitable letter, written in a graceful, animated, and elevated style; she told him that her friends ought not to mourn for her, for an ardent imagination and a susceptible temperament, generally ensure a troublesome life to those who are endowed with such gifts. She added that she had well revenged herself on Pétion, who at Caen temporarily doubted her political principles. Lastly, she begged him to inform Wimpfen that she had assisted him to gain more than one battle. She concluded in these words: "What a sad set of people to form a republic! At least they should establish peace; a constitution will then follow somehow or other."

On the 15th, Charlotte Corday underwent her sentence with the same composure of mind she had always retained. The correctness and propriety of her demeanour was the only reply made to the abuse of the vile rabble. However, all did not insult her; many felt great sorrow for this maiden, so young, so handsome, and so self-devoted in her act, and accompanied her to the scaffold with marks of sympathy and admiration.

Marat was borne with great pomp to the garden of the Cordeliers. "This ceremony," so said the report of the commune, "was characterised by simplicity and patriotism; the people assembled under the banners of their sections, came thither peaceably—a slight confusion, in some measure of an impressive character, a respectful silence, and a subdued feeling afforded a most affecting spectacle. The procession lasted from six in the evening to midnight; it was composed of citizens from every one of the sections, of the members of the convention, as well as members of the commune, electors and popular societies. When received at the garden of the Cordeliers, the corpse of Marat was placed beneath the trees, whose leaves, gently agitated, reflected and increased a soft and elated light. The people crowded round the coffin in silence. The president of the convention first delivered an eloquent oration, in which he predicted that the time would soon arrive when Marat would be avenged; but that care should be taken, lest by hasty and injudicious measures the enemies of the country should expose themselves to censure. He added, that liberty could never perish, and that the death of Marat would only strengthen it the more. After numerous orations, which were warmly applauded, the corpse of Marat was deposited in the grave. Tears were shed in abundance, and every one retired oppressed with grief.

The heart of Marat, for which numerous societies contested, remained with the Cordeliers. His bust distributed everywhere with those of Lepelletier and Brutus, was made a conspicuous object at all meetings and places of public resort. The seal placed upon his papers was removed. Nothing was found in his house but one five franc assignat, and his poverty afforded a fresh theme of admiration. His housekeeper, whom, in the words of Chaumette, he espoused "on a beautiful day, in the face of the sun" (un jour de beau temps, à la face du soleil), was styled his widow, and was supported at the public charge.

Such was the end of this man, the most singular of all that appeared at this period, so prolific in remarkable characters. Thrown into the arena of the sciences, he desired to overturn all settled theories; cast among political agitations, he at once conceived a frightful idea, an idea which revolutions every day practically embody in proportion to the dangers that threaten them, but which they will never openly avow, and that is, the destruction of all their adversaries. Marat observing, that although the revolution condemned his notions, they nevertheless adopted them, that the persons he had denounced were stripped of their popularity, and sacrificed at the very time he predicted, began to consider himself as one of the greatest statesmen of modern times, was possessed by an ungovernable pride and audacity, and continued dreadful to his enemies, and, at last, eccentric in the eyes even of his friends. His career was terminated by an event in full keeping with the singularity of his life, and he fell at the very moment when the republican leaders, combining among themselves to establish a cruel and gloomy government, could no longer have temporized with a colleague so maniacal, systematic and audacious, and who must have deranged all their plans by his eccentricities. In short, utterly incapable of becoming an active and influential leader, he became the apostle of the revolution, and when there was no further necessity for his apostolical mission, but rather for energy and perseverance, the dagger of a young and indignant maiden came just in the very nick of time to create him a martyr, and present him as a saint to the people, who being tired of their old idols, must needs set about occupying themselves with the new.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CLASSIFICATION OF PARTIES SINCE THE 31ST MAY, IN THE CONVENTION, IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE PUBLIC WELFARE, AND THE COMMUNE.—DISSENSIONS IN THE MOUNTAIN PARTY.—DANTON'S DECLINE OF POPULARITY.—THE POLICY OF ROBESPIERRE.—EVENTS IN LA VENDEE.—DEFEAT OF WESTERMANN AT CHATILLON AND OF GENERAL LABAROTIÈRE AT VIKIERS.—THE SIEGE AND CAPTURE OF MENTZ BY THE PRUSSIANS AND AUSTRIANS.—THE CAPTURE OF VALENCIENNES.—THE PERILOUS STATE OF THE REPUBLIC IN AUGUST, 1793.—STATE OF THE FINANCES.—DEPRECIATION OF THE ASSIGNATS.—ESTABLISHMENT OF THE "MAXIMUM" TAX.—PUBLIC DISTRESS.—SIOCK JOBBING.

Or those triumvirs so celebrated there remained but Robespierre and Danton. In order to impart some correct notion of their influence, we must observe how the authorities were distributed, and what was the state of public feeling since the suppression of the right side.

From the very day of its institution, the convention was essentially in possession of all the authorities. However, in order to avoid all appearance of despotic authority, she was not desirous to keep them ostentatiously in her hands; she therefore permitted to exist, as apart from herself, the phantom of an executive power, and kept a ministry on foot. Dissatisfied with the administration of the ministers, because their energy did not keep pace with existing circumstances, she established, immediately after the defection of Dumouriez, a committee of public welfare, which entered upon its office the 10th of April, and exercised a superintendence over the government. It possessed the power of suspending the execution of measures adopted by the ministers, to re-inforce them when it considered them insufficient, or to revoke them when it judged them pernicious. This committee framed the instructions of the representatives despatched upon particular missions, and no one else could correspond with them. In this manner, having a control over the ministers and the representatives, who themselves possessed a control over all functionaries whatsoever, it had the entire government under its own hand. Although, if we were to judge from its title, this authority was nothing more than a simple right of overseeing, it practically involved the right itself of acting, for the principal person in a state does not by himself carry anything into execution, but is content to see every thing done under his eyes, to choose his agents, and to direct his operations. Now by its mere right of inspection the committee was enabled to do all this, and in fact, it did effect this object. It regulated military operations, ordered supplies of provisions, provided measures of safety, appointed the generals and agents of every description, and the trembling ministers considered themselves but too happy in discharging themselves from all responsibility by acting the parts of simple clerks. The members who composed the committee of public welfare, were Barrère, Delmas, Bréard, Cambon, Robert Lindet, Danton, Guyton-Morveau, Mathieu and Ramel. They had the character, and that deservedly, of being competent or diligent men, and although they were slightly suspected of moderation, suspicion was never carried so far as to induce the belief, as was the case with the Girondists, that they were in league with the foreign enemy. In a short time they got into their own hands all the affairs of the state, and although their appointment had been limited to a month, it was not desirable that they should be interrupted in their labours, and their term of office was enlarged from month to month, from the 10th of April to the 10th of May, from the 10th of May to the 10th of June, from the 10th of June to the 10th of July. Independent of this committee, the committee of general safety exercised the functions of high police, so important a matter in times of jealousy; but in the application of its functions, it was dependant upon the committee of public welfare, who being charged in general with every thing that concerned the welfare of the state, was rendered competent to inquire into all conspiracies against the republic.

Thus by means of her decrees, the convention possessed the supreme power; by her representatives and her committee, she had the power of carrying them into execution; so that, although she was not desirous of concentrating all the authorities in her own hands, she had been irresistibly induced so to do by circumstances, and by the necessity of causing to be executed, under her own eyes and by the members of her own body, that which she considered had been badly managed by agents not identified with herself.

Notwithstanding the supreme authority was reposed in the convention, she did not interfere with the proceedings of the government without permission, and never made them the subjects of her deliberation. The great questions of social organization were settled by the constitution, which founded a pure democracy. The question as to its resorting to the most revolutionary measures for its own preservation, and whether it was to abandon itself to every extravagant excitement that might be called into action, was resolved by the events of the 31st of May. Thus the state-constitution and moral policy were settled. All that remained for further examination were mere measures of administrative policy, financial and military. Now, subjects of this nature can seldom be well understood by a large assembly, but are handed over to the management of those who concern themselves most in such matters. The convention very willingly consigned these matters to those committees who were charged with the conduct of affairs. She had no reason to suspect either their probity, intelligence, or zeal. She was, therefore, reduced to a state of silence; and the last revolution, in depriving her of the freedom of debate, also annihilated the subjects of discussion. She was, in fact, no more than a mere council of state, whither committees appointed for particular purposes came to make reports, which were always received with approbation, and to propose decrees which were always adopted. The sittings now became taciturn, dull, in every respect short, and were not now protracted for whole days and nights as they formerly had been.

Independent of the convention, which occupied itself with general concerns of government, the commune attended to the regulation of the municipal system, and there a complete revolution was effected. The commune which, since the 31st of May, no longer possessed any motive in conspiring and employing the local militia of Paris against the convention, turned its attention to matters of police, provisions, markets, performance of divine worship, public shows, and even to prostitutes, and promulgated upon all these subjects of internal and domestic government, regulations which, in a short time, were adopted throughout France. Chaumette, procurator general of the commune, who, on account of his requisitions, was always listened to with approbation, was the person who framed this municipal legislation. Unceasingly occupied upon new subjects for regulation, and continually invading the privacy of life, this legislator of the sale rooms and markets every day became more importunate and vexatious. Pache, always indifferent, suffered every thing to be done under his inspection, approved of the proposed measures, and entirely abandoned to Chaumette the honours of the municipal commune.

The convention, thus permitting its committees to act without control, and the commune being exclusively occupied with its own affairs, the discussion of all political matters remained open for the Jacobins. They alone, with their characteristic audacity, discussed the measures of the government, as well as the conduct of its agents. For a long time, as we have noticed already, they acquired great influence by their numerical force, by the celebrity and the high rank of a great number of their members, by the enormous accompaniment of their corresponding societies, and lastly by their long standing and early influence upon the revolution. But since the 31st of May, having completely silenced the right side of the assembly, and having called into predominance the action of an illimitable energy, they had acquired a most powerful accession of opinion, and seemed to have succeeded to that freedom of speech which the convention, in some measure, may be said to have abdicated. They persecuted the committees by an unceasing superintendence, and instituted examinations with regard to their conduct, as well as that of the representatives, ministers, and generals with that personal grossness so peculiar to themselves; they thus called into action an inexorable censorship over every one of their agents, often unjust, but always serviceable, on account of the terror it excited and the extreme attention it exacted from every one. The other popular clubs were not without their freedom and their influence, but they nevertheless submitted themselves to the superior power of the Jacobins. The Cordeliers, for example, who were more turbulent, and more prompt in action, nevertheless acknowledged the superior reasoning of their older brethren, and suffered themselves to be brought within bounds whenever, from an excess of revolutionary impatience, they happened to outstrip the period appointed for a particular measure. The petition of Jacques Roux against the constitution, which, upon the suggestion of the Jacobins, was withdrawn by the Cordeliers, afforded proof of this deference to their opinion.

Such, therefore, was the classification of authorities, and their respective influences. At the same time were to be seen, a committee of government, a commune exclusively attending to municipal regulations, and the Jacobins keeping up a continual and rigorous censorship upon the acts of the government.

Two months had scarcely elapsed before public opinion began to express its opinion with some severity upon the present administration. Public excitement could not stop at the point of the 31st of May; something more was yet wanting, and it was nothing more than natural that fresh demands should more than ever be made with greater celerity, and with additional results. In the general remodelling of the committees required on the 1st of June, it was determined to spare the committee of public welfare, composed as it was of pain-taking men, unconnected with any party, and taking charge of those measures which it had been dangerous to interrupt; but it was recollected that this committee had since exhibited some vacillation from the 31st of May to the 2nd of June; that it had desired to temporize with the departments, and to send them hostages, and therefore the conclusion was, that it was inefficient for the circumstances. Instituted, as it was, at a very difficult crisis, it lay open to the imputation of defects arising rather from our unfortunate situation than from any deficiency in itself. As forming the centre of all operations, it was overwhelmed with business, it was reproached with being buried beneath its papers, and entirely absorbed in petty details, in short, of being worn out and superannuated. However, established at the very period of Dumouriez's defection, at a time when all the armies were disorganized, when La Vendée was in a state of rebellion, and when Spain was commencing war, it had organized the army of the North and that of the Rhine, it had embodied the armies of the Pyrenees, and the Vendée which, till then, had no existence; and had victualled one hundred and twenty-six places, or fortresses; and although much yet remained to be done, in order to place our forces upon the proper footing, yet it was a great deal to have performed so much in so short a time, and amidst the impediments created by the departmental insurrection. But the public distrust was constantly demanding more than had been effected, nay more than could be done, and it was by this means that an energy so vast, and yet so correspondent to the peril, was called forth. To increase the strength of the committee, and to revive its revolutionary energy, Saint-Just, Jean-Bon-Saint-André, and Couthon, had been added to its members. Nevertheless, the public expressed dissatisfaction, and said that the new comers were, doubtless, excellent men, but that their influence was neutralized by the others.

Public opinion was not a whit less severe upon the ministers. Garat, the minister of the interior, who at first was well received by reason of his neutrality between the Girondists and the Jacobins, was nothing more or less than a moderate ever since the 2nd of June. Being ordered to prepare a report for the purpose of affording the departments the fullest information upon the recent events, he entered into a long dissertation, wherein he explained and balanced the faults on both sides with certainly a most philosophical impartiality, but very ill adapted to the tendencies of the period of its publication. Robespierre, to whom he communicated this too wise report, entirely dissented from it. The Jacobins soon took the matter up, and they condemned Garat for not having counteracted the tainted doctrines of Roland. It was the same with the minister of the marine, D'Albarade, who was accused of leaving in the staff of the squadrons all the old aristocrats. It is, in point of fact, true that he had retained many of them, and the events of Toulon demonstrated this quickly enough; but the purifying system was much more difficult to be put in execution in the navy than in the army, because the peculiar requirements so necessary in the marine, will not allow the substitution of new officers for old ones, and, as in the army, to turn a peasant into a soldier, a subaltern, or a general. The only person who preserved himself in the public esteem was Bouchette, because he had, like his predecessor Paché, given up his papers to the Jacobins and to the Cordeliers, and had lulled their suspicions by calling them in to assist in his administration. Nearly every one of the generals was subjected to accusations, and particularly the nobility; but the fate of two of them was destined to become the bugbear of the day: Custine at the North, and Biron on the West. Marat, as we have already observed, had denounced them some days previous to his death; and ever since this accusation had been made, every body wondered how it was that Custine was suffered to remain in Caesar's Camp without removing the blockade from Valenciennes; and how came it that Biron, who was doing nothing in Lower Vendée, had allowed the enemy to take Saumur, and lay siege to Nantes.

every one was suspected, and even the best patriots were distrusted. As there was now no right side, upon whom the blame was to be always thrown; as there was no longer a Roland, a Brissot, or a Guadet, who were to be charged with treason upon every new alarm, the common reproach was directed against the most decided republicans. There existed a most incredible rage for suspicious jealousies and accusations. The longest and most consistent revolutionary life was no longer a protection, and any one was subject, in the course of a day, to be identified with the greatest enemies of the republic. The public imagination was not so soon able to dispel the witcheries of that Danton whose audacity and eloquence had supported public confidence in every critical emergency; but Danton, in engaging himself in the revolution, possessed the most ardent desire for its attainment, without entertaining a personal hatred against individuals. Now this was not thought sufficient. The spirit which actuates a revolution is governed by an ardent desire for the attainment of the object, coupled with intense hatred against those who interpose the obstruction. Danton was only governed by one of these motives. In respect of revolutionary measures, the avowed objects of which were to attack the wealthy, impart energy to the undecided, and develop the national resources, he had been far from mincing matters, and had devised measures of the boldest and most violent character; but, forbearing and goodnatured so far as individuals were concerned, he did not consider every one his enemy, but discriminated in his considerations of men, as to whom he thought worth gaining over, or considering as retainers to his cause, according to their respective degrees of energy. He had never looked upon Dumouriez as a traitor, but merely considered him as a discontented man, driven to his last shifts; he never considered the Girondists as connected with Pitt, but merely as well meaning folks of no capacity, and he would rather have thrown them aside than sacrificed them. It was even said that he felt angry at the order for non-egress, given by Henriot on the 2nd of June*. He took noble generals by the hand, dined with the government contractors, and was accessible to men of all parties, addicted to the pleasures of society, and had his fill of enjoyment during the revolution. All this was generally known, and very equivocal reports were got abroad respecting his energy and integrity. On one particular day, it was said that Danton never made his appearance at the Jacobins; remarks were made upon his indolence, of his continual recreations, and it was broadly stated that the revolution had not been without its pleasurable enjoyments, so far as he was concerned. On another occasion, a Jacobin asserted in the tribune, "Danton left me to go and shake hands with a general." Sometimes complaints were made of the individuals he had recommended to the ministers. Not daring to attack him openly, remarks were levelled at his friends. The butcher Legendre, his colleague in the deputation of Paris, his locum tenens in the streets and faubourgs, and a copyist of his brutal and ferocious eloquence, was treated as a moderate by Hébert and the other turbulents at the Cordeliers.

"Me a moderate," exclaimed Legendre at the Jacobins, "when I sometimes call myself to account for my exaggeration, when it is published in every newspaper that I seized Lanjuinais by the collar, and dragged him on the pavement!" Another friend of Danton was also treated as a moderate, although an approved patriot of note, Camille Desmoulins, altogether the most ingenuous, the most pleasing, and the most able writer of the revolution. Camille was well acquainted with General Dillon, who, stationed by Dumouriez at the post of the Isles in the Argonne, had there displayed so much courage and intrepidity. Camille felt convinced that Dillon was nothing else than a brave man, not impregnated with any political opinion, but endowed with a great military genius, and sincerely attached to the service of the republic. All of a sudden, as a consequence of that extraordinary distrust then so very prevalent, a report obtained, that Dillon was about to head a conspiracy for setting Louis XVII. on the throne. The committee of public welfare immediately caused him to be arrested. Camille, who was internally convinced that such a report was a mere fabrication, was desirous of justifying Dillon to the convention. Immediately, from all sides, was said, "You are in the habit of dining with the aristocrats." Billaud-Varannes cut him short, exclaiming, "Don't let Camille disgrace himself."—"You won't let me speak, then," replied Camille, "well, I shall betake myself to my escritoire," and he immediately published a pamphlet, intitled "Lettre à Dillon," distinguished by elegance of expression and good sense, wherein he laid about him on all sides. He thus addresses the committee of public welfare: "You have usurped every single authority, taken all affairs into your own hands, and have brought none of them to an end. Hence, if you look upon the conduct of the war department, one is absent, the other is ill, and the third does not know what he is about; you allow the Custines, the Birons, the Menous, the Berthiers, all of them aristocrats, Lafayetteists, or incompetents, to be at the head of our armies." He said to Cambon, "I understand nought of thy system of finance, but thy paper is very like unto that of Law, and passes as rapidly from hand to hand." In addressing himself to Billaud-Varannes, "Thou bearest enmity to Arthur Dillon, because when thou wast commissary to his army, he led thee into the fight."—"To St. Just, 'Thou hast too much respect for thyself, and dost hold up thy head like a Saint-Sacrament *."—"To Bréard, Delmas, Barrère, and others, 'Ye desired to give in your resignation on the 2nd of June, because you were not able to survey coolly that revolution which, in your eyes, appeared so terrible.'" He adds, that Dillon is neither a republican, federalist or aristocrat, that he is a soldier, and that all he wants is to serve as such; that so far as patriotism is concerned, he is quite as good as the committee of public welfare, and all the staffs appointed for the heads of the army put together; that, at any rate, he is a great commander, that it is a matter of gratulation to have a few such as he at our command, and that the public must not run away with the idea that every serjeant can make a general. "Ever since," added he, "an obscure officer, Dumouriez, has been a conqueror in spite of himself at Jemappes, and has taken possession of the entire of Belgium and Breda, like a quarter-master with his chuk, the successes of the republic have thrown us into the same intoxication that the successes of his reign inflicted upon Louis XIV. He appointed his generals from his ante-chamber, and we now fancy we can take ours out of the streets; we have at last gone so far as to say that we possess three millions of generals."

It is plain enough by this language, and from these cross-fires, that there existed considerable disunion in the Mountain. This is generally the situation of every party who has been recently victorious, who is about to divide itself into new parties, but whose divided parts are not clearly distinguishable. There had not yet been a new party founded from among the victorious party: the imputation of modéré or exagéré, hovered over the heads of all, but did not alight upon any one. In the midst of this conflict of opinions, the reputation of one man remained constantly impervious to attack,—this was Robespierre. He certainly had never possessed the slightest fellow-feeling for any individual; he had never shown regard for any one under proscription, or maintained any acquaintance with general, financier, or deputy. No one could lay it to his charge, that he had been revelling during the revolution, for he lived obscurely at a cabinet-maker's, and, as it is said, kept up a connexion with one of his daughters, of which no one possessed any knowledge. As a man of austere, rigid, and single mind, he was, and indeed had the reputation of being, incorruptible. All that could be laid to his charge was pride, a species of vice which does not, like corruption, taint the mind, but which is nevertheless the author of great evils in civil dissensions, and which becomes terrible in men of austere dispositions, or when associated with religious or political bigotry, because, being an absorbing passion, they give way to it unreservedly and without remorse.

Robespierre was the only individual who was able to repress certain revolutionary impulses, without his forbearance being laid to the account of selfish and interested ties. Whenever he opposed any of these movements, his opposition was never considered but as proceeding from an unbiassed judgment. He felt the advantages of this position, and then, for the first time, began to found a system for himself. Up to this period, quite in accordance with his hatred, his only care was how to turn the revolution against the Girondists; however, apprehending danger to the patriots from new excesses in the public mind, he considered that respect for the convention and the committee of public welfare should be maintained, inasmuch as all authority was reposed in them, and could not be transferred into other hands without most awful confusion. Moreover, he was a member of the convention, and could not fail, in a short time, to have a seat in the committee of public welfare; so that, in defending them, he was at the same time supporting an all-necessary authority, and one in which he was to have a share. As every opinion received its first impression at the Jacobins, he, therefore, was the more desirous of taking the lead there, so as to link them with the convention and the committee, sure enough to detach them afterwards, if he judged it necessary. Constant in his attendance, but constant only in his attendance upon them, he paid them a compliment by his presence, and seldom taking part in any debate at the convention, where, as we have already noticed, there was scarcely any speaking, he often made himself heard from the tribune at the Jacobins, and never permitted an important question to pass without discussing its merits, qualifying or perhaps repealing it. In this respect, his conduct was much more measured than Danton's. Nothing so much hurts a man, and gives colour to equivocal reports, as absence. Danton, like most men of a fervid and impassioned mind, altogether of a careless disposition, was too little at the Jacobins. When he resumed his attendance, he was obliged to make an apology, to assure them that he would always be a good patriot, and to say, "that if, on some occasions, he had temporized somewhat for the purpose of bringing back to their duty weak but excellent understandings, they might rest assured that his energy was not diminished; that he still watched over the interests of the republic with the same ardour as heretofore, and that she would prove victorious." Vain and dangerous excuses. From the very moment that a man offers explanation or justification, he is treated as an inferior by those to whom he addresses himself. Robespierre, on the contrary, who was always present, and always at hand to avert insinuations against him, was never reduced to the necessity of justifying himself; on the other hand, he assumed the tone of an accuser; he called his faithful Jacobins somewhat imperiously to account, and he precisely seized that point when the impulse that one excites, already decided in its character, is only increased by the severe application of its principles.

We have seen how he treated Jacques Roux who had brought forward a petition against the constitutional act; he acted in the same manner on every other occasion when any one interfered with the convention. That assembly, he would say, has been purified; she has deserved nothing but respect; whoe'er raises his voice against her is a bad citizen. The committee of public welfare had certainly not done all that it ought to have done, (for invariably, in defending, Robespierre never failed to censure those whom he did defend) but this committee was now better conducted; to attack it would be the destruction of the rallying point of all the authorities so necessary for their existence, to exhaust the energy of the government, and to compromise the republic. Whenever an inclination was manifested to fatigue the committee or the convention with oft-repeated petitions, he opposed them, saying that the influence of the Jacobins was being unduly expended, and that they were wasting the time of the depositaries of the supreme authority. One day, it was desired that the sittings of the committee should be public; he angrily argued against this proposition, saying, that there were concealed enemies, who, under the mask of patriotism, were promoters of the most inflammatory proposals, and he began to maintain that the foreign enemy had in pay two sorts of conspirators in France: the esagérés, who pushed everything on to utter confusion; and the modérés, who would paralyze everything from their want of firmness.

The committee of public welfare had been prorogued three times; on the 10th of July, it was either to be prorogued a fourth time, or renewed. On the 8th, there was a special meeting at the Jacobins. On all sides it was said that the members of the committee ought to be changed, and that there was no necessity to prorogue it again, as had been done for three successive months. "Certainly," said Bourdon, "the committee means well; I have no desire to lay blame to it; but it is a defect incident to human nature to limit its energy to some few days. The present members of the committee have already passed that period; they are superannuated: let us change them. We are now in want of revolutionary characters; men to whom the fate of the republic can be confided, and who will answer for it, body for body."

The fervid Chabot followed Bourdon. "The committee ought to be renewed, and ought not to suffer a fresh prorogation. It will not suffice to add to it some few more members, patriots of note, for we have had the experience of the past. Couthon, Saint-Just, Jean-Bon-Saint-André, recently added, are excluded by their colleagues. There is precisely the same reason for not renewing the committee by secret ballot; for the new will not be a whit better than the former, which is worth nothing at all. I have heard Mathieu," continued Chabot, "hold the most invective language at the club of the female revolutionists. Ramel has written to Thoulouse, that the landholders were the only persons who could preserve the commonweal, and that they must take care how they put arms in the hands of the sans culottes. Cambon is a simpleton, who views every object magnified, and is frightened at them when a hundred paces off. Guyton-Morveau is an honest man, a quaker who is always in a tremble. Delmas, who had the office of making the appointments, has made but a sorry choice, and has filled the army with counter-revolutionists. In fact, this committee was the friend of Le Brun, and is the enemy of Bouchotte."

Robespierre was all haste to answer Chabot. "At every turn of expression, at every word," said he, "of the speech of Chabot, I seem to inhale the purest patriotism; but I also perceive therein that extravagant patriotism which expresses indignation because everything does not turn out as desired, which excites itself because the committee of public welfare has not, in its operations, arrived at an impracticable perfection, and which Chabot will nowhere find."

"I am inclined to believe with him, that this committee is not composed of men of equal intelligence, or all equally virtuous; but what public body will he find that is so constituted? Can he prevent men from being subject to error? Has he not seen the convention, since she has expelled from her body those traitors who have disgraced her, recovering fresh energy, an elevation to which she had till this day been a stranger, and a more august character through the medium of her representation? Is not this example a sufficient demonstration that destruction is not always a matter of necessity, and that it is sometimes more prudent to confine oneself to reform?

"Yes, indeed, there are to be found, in the committee of public welfare, men fully capable of winding up the machine, and giving a new impulse to its motions. The least we can do is to encourage them. Who can ever forget the services that this committee has rendered to the commonweal, the innumerable plots it has discovered, the felicitous suggestions we have received at its hands, the sagacious and far-sighted views it has developed?

"The assembly has not appointed a committee of public welfare for the purpose of exercising influence over herself, nor for the purpose of directing her decrees; but this committee has been highly serviceable in distinguishing, in the measures proposed, that which has been good from that which, under an attractive appearance, might have entailed the most dangerous consequences. This committee has also given the first impulses to numerous essential resolves, which perhaps may have saved the country; it has also spared the assembly the inconveniences of a painful and often fruitless labour, in presenting to her the results of inquiries already fortunately discovered, and relieved her from a toil of which she was hardly cognizant, and with which she had not been familiarized.

"All this is sufficient to prove that the committee of public welfare has not been such a petty resource as people affect to consider. It has doubtless committed its errors; is it likely I should cloak them? Have I any such inclinations to indulgence, I who am one of those who think that the country is insufficiently served while anything remains undone? Yes, it has committed its errors, and I have no objection to join with you in their censure; but at this moment it would be the height of impolicy to draw down the disfavour of the people upon a committee which at this time ought to enjoy its perfect confidence, to whom such great concerns are confided, and from whom the country expects great assistance; and although it may happen not to possess the entire approbation of the female republican revolutionists, I do not consider this committee less adapted for the performance of its important functions."

The reflections of Robespierre terminated all further discussion; on the next day but one the committee was reinstated, and reduced to nine individuals, of which it originally consisted. The new members were Barrère, Jean-Bon-Saint-André, Gasparin, Couthon, Héralut Séchelha, Saint-Just, Thuriot, Robert Lindet, and Prieur de la Marne. All those members who were accused of weakness were dismissed, except Barrère, whose great dexterity in digesting reports and conforming himself to circumstances caused the past to be forgotten. Robespierre had not then taken his seat among them; but some few days afterwards, when there was a little more apprehension respecting the frontiers, and some alarm existed in the convention, he lost no time in getting thither.

Robespierre had yet numerous other occasions upon which his new policy might be employed. The state of the marine department beginning to excite some uneasiness, complaints were continually made of the minister Albarade, of his predecessor Monge, of the deplorable state of our ships at sea, which having returned from Sardinia to the dockyards of Toulon, were still unrepaired, and were commanded by old officers, nearly all of them aristocrats. Complaints were also made of certain individuals recently associated with him in the navy-office. Among others, frequent accusations were made against a man of the name of Peyron, who was sent to reorganize the army at Toulon. "He had not done," said his accusers, "all that he ought to have done: the minister was made responsible, and the minister cast the responsibility upon a patriot of note, who had recommended Peyron to him." The party accusing affected the use of the expression, "noted patriot," without daring to mention the name. "His name," exclaimed several voices "Well, then," replies the accusing party, "this noted patriot is neither more or less than Danton." At these words, tokens of dissatisfaction burst forth. Robespierre hurried to the tribune. "I require," said he, "that this farcical mode of proceeding be put an end to, and the sitting be opened. An accusation is made against Albarade; I only know him by common report, which proclaims him as a patriotic minister; but what is it that is laid to his charge? An error. What man is there who is not liable to error? An appointment that he has made has not given general satisfaction. Bouchotte and Pache also have appointed improper objects, and yet both of them are true republicans, and both sincerely attached to their country. A man is appointed to a situation; that is quite enough, and he is libelled. Eh? when shall we ever cease to give credence to all the idle or perfidious statements that come thick and threelfold upon us from all sides?

"I notice that to this rather loose denunciation against the minister, a particular denunciation has been annexed, levelled against Danton. Is he the person they want to make you suspect? If indeed, instead of discouraging the patriots, by attempting to convert slight omissions into crime, you were to occupy yourselves somewhat in facilitating their labours, and rendering their toil less entangled with difficulties, and less rugged, that would be by far the most straightforward course, and the country would reap some benefit from it. They have denounced Bouchotte, Pache has been also denounced, for it has been written, that the best patriots shall always be denounced. It is high time to put a stop to these farcical and distressing scenes; I heartily wish that the club of the Jacobins would confine themselves to some regular course of business, which they could conduct with advantage, and that she would keep within bounds a great number of those who excite disturbances in her body, and who, for the most part, are quite as contemptible as they are dangerous."

Thus it was that Robespierre, apprehending the danger that would arise from a new popular outbreak, which would have annihilated the entire government, endeavoured to attach the Jacobins to the convention and the old patriots. Everything was turned to his own account by this laudable and useful policy. In preparing the way for the power of the committee, he paved the way to his own; by defending the patriots of the same standing and energy as himself, he provided for himself, and prevented public opinion from sacrificing those who were on his side; and he placed those of whom he became the protector far beneath him; in short, he became by his austerity alone the idol of the Jacobins, and obtained for himself a high reputation for superior understanding. In this, Robespierre exhibited no other ambition than that which actuated all the revolutionary leaders, who up to that period had been desirous of staying the progress of the revolution at the very point where they themselves had halted; and this policy which had entirely divested them of popularity, would not have the same effect upon himself, because the revolution was fast approaching the climax of its perils and its excesses.

The imprisoned deputies had been impeached immediately after the death of Marat, and preparations were made for their trial. Already was it said, that the heads of those Bourbons who were yet remaining must needs fall, although these included two females, one of them the wife and the other the sister of the late king, as also the Duke of Orleans, so faithful to the revolution, and at this time a prisoner at Marseilles, as a reward for his services.

A fête had been ordered on the occasion of the constitution being accepted. All the primary assemblies were to send deputies, who were to express their sentiments, and would meet at the field of the federation, as forming a solemn festival. The date of this celebration was no longer appointed for the 14th of July, but was fixed for the 10th of August; for the storming of the Tuileries had brought about the republic, while the taking of the Bastille, leaving monarchy untouched, had only been the cause of the abolition of feudalism. Thus the republicans and the constitutional royalists distinguished themselves in this, that the one celebrated the 10th of August, and the other the 14th July.

Federalism was expiring, and the acceptance of the constitution became general. Bordeaux still maintained the greatest reserve, and did nothing decisive, either as demonstrating submission or hostility, but accepted the constitution. Lyons prosecuted those proceedings which had been transferred to the revolutionary tribunal; but rebellious in no other instance than this, so far as other matters were concerned, she made submission, and also adhered to the constitution. Marseilles alone refused her adhesion; but her small army, already separated from that of Languedoc, had just been, during the latter end of July, driven out of Avignon, and compelled to recross the Durance. Thus federalism was vanquished, and the constitution became triumphant. But for all this, the danger became more alarming upon the frontiers, and it was more than ever imminent in La Vendée, upon the Rhine, and in the North. The Vendéans made themselves amends for the check they received before Nantes by fresh victories, and Mentz and Valenciennes were pressed with greater spirit than ever by the enemy.

Our narration of military events was interrupted at the period when the Vendéans, after being repelled from Nantes, were returning to their own country, and we have observed that Biron came up to Angers after the deliverance of Nantes, and settled further operations with general Canclaux. During this period also, Westermann had gone to Nort with his Germanic legion, and had obtained from Biron permission to march into the heart of the country. Westermann was the same Alsatian who had so distinguished himself upon the 10th of August, and had decided the success of that day; and he, after having gloriously served under Dumouriez, connected himself with him and Danton, and was at last denounced by Marat, whom, as the report goes, he had cudgelled for his abuse. He was one of the number of those patriots whose great services had been acknowledged, and also one of those whom the people began to censure for their enjoyments during the revolution, and with whom the public were already disgusted, merely because they enforced discipline in the armies and intelligence in the officers, and did not seem inclined to turn off every general who was noble by birth, nor stigmatise every beaten general as a traitor. Westermann had formed a legion called The Germanic Legion, of four or five thousand men, inclusive of infantry, cavalry, and artillery. At the head of this small army, of which he had made himself master, and where he kept a rigorous system of discipline, he had displayed the greatest daring, and had performed some brilliant exploits. On his being transferred to La Vendée with his legion, he had regulated it anew, and had driven from it those cowardly wretches who had gone to denounce him. He showed the utmost contempt for those undisciplined battalions who pillaged and sacked the country; he publicly avowed the same sentiments as Biron, and therefore was ranked with him among the military aristocrats. The minister of war, Bouchotte, had, as we have already seen, dispersed his agents from the Jacobins and Cordeliers throughout La Vendée. There they played the rival with the representatives and the generals, authorized pillage and extortion under the title of necessities for war, and insubordination under the pretence of protecting the soldier from the despotism of the officers. The first clerk in the war department under Bouchotte was one Vincent, a young hot-headed Cordelier, one of the most dangerous and turbulent spirits of that period; he entirely governed Bouchotte, filled up all his appointments, and persecuted the generals with the most pertinacious rigour. Ronsin, the paymaster, sent out to Dumouriez when his contract* system was set aside, was the friend both of Vincent and Bouchotte, and the chief of their agents in La Vendée, under the style of Assistant-Minister. Under him were to be found the names of Momoro, a printer; and Grammont, a comedian; together with many others who acted in precisely the same spirit, and with the same violence. Westermann, already on no very good terms with them, entirely alienated them by one energetic act. One Rossignol, formerly a working goldsmith, who had made himself notorious on the 20th of June and the 10th of August, who had the command of one of the Orleans battalions, and was one of those officers who were looked upon with favor by the Cordelier minister. This man on one occasion, while drinking with some of Westermann's soldiers, said that the soldiers ought not to be the slaves of the officers, that Biron was a ci-devant and a traitor, and that it was but right that the townspeople should be driven from their houses to billet the troops. Westermann caused him to be arrested, and handed him over to the military tribunals.

Westermann, who gave himself no further trouble about the matter, set out on his march with his legion, in order to advance into the heart of the country of La Vendée. Setting out from that quarter opposite to the Loire, that is to say, from the south of the theatre of the war, he at first possessed himself of Parthenay, next entered Amailion, and set fire to this latter town, as reprisals against M. de Lescure. The latter, in fact, on entering Parthenay, had exercised some severities against the inhabitants, who were accused of entertaining revolutionary sentiments. Westermann removed all the inhabitants of Amailion, and sent them on to Parthenay, as a means of reparation: he finally burnt the mansion of Clisson, the property of Lescure, and spread universal terror by the celerity of his march and the exaggerated accounts of his military executions. Westermann was not naturally cruel, but he commenced those disastrous reprisals, which absolutely ruined neutral countries, accused by each party with having shown favour to the contrary side. All had fled to Chatillon, whither were assembled the families of the Vendéan leaders, and the wreck of their armies. On the 3rd of July, Westermann, who felt no apprehension in venturing into the heart of the rebel country, made his entrance into Chatillon, and drove from thence the chief council and the staff, who resided there as in their capital. The report of this hair-brained exploit spread far and wide; but the position of Westermann was by no means secure. The Vendéan chiefs had retreated, rung the tocsin, got together a considerable army, and prepared to surprise Westermann from the quarter where he least expected it. He had stationed at a mill and out of the town of Chatillon a post which commanded the whole neighbourhood. The Vendéans stealthily advancing, according to their ordinary tactics, surrounded this post, and set upon attacking it on every side. Westermann, who was not very quickly informed of this manœuvre, hastened to the relief of the post, but the detachments he despatched were driven back and brought into Chatillon. The alarm soon spread throughout the republican army. Chatillon was abandoned in the utmost confusion, and Westermann himself, after having performed prodigies of valour, was involved in the general rout, and compelled to save himself as he best could, leaving behind a great number of dead or prisoners. This repulse caused discouragement in precisely the same ratio as the rashness and success of the expedition had given rise to presumptuous reliance and false expectations.

While these things were taking place at Chatillon, Biron had just then been settling upon an expedition with Caneaux. They were both of them to follow the course of the river downwards to Nantes, sweep the left bank of the Loire, then wheel round towards Machecoul, fall in with Boulard, who was to set out from Sables; and after having thus cut off the Vendéans from the sea, to march in the direction of Upper Vendée, to reduce the whole country. The representatives did not approve of this plan; they assumed that he ought to set out from the point where he then was, in order to advance into the country, and consequently to march upon the bridges of Cê with the troops mustered at Angers, and to cause himself to be supported on the opposite side by a column, which was to advance from Niort. Biron, finding himself thwarted, gave in his resignation; but at that very time intelligence arrived of the defeat at Chatillon, and every thing was laid to the charge of Biron. He was blamed for having allowed Nantes to be besieged, and for not having supported Westermann. Upon the denunciation of Ronsin and his agents, he was summoned to the bar, Westermann was put upon his trial, and Rossignol instantly set at liberty. Such was the fate the generals in La Vendée met with from the agents of the Jacobins.

General Labarolière undertook the command of the troops left at Angers by Biron, and made arrangements, according to the suggestion of the representatives, to march up the country by the bridges of Cê; he directed his course towards Brisac, where he had stationed a post to ensure his communications. This undisciplined army committed the most frightful devastations upon a country entirely devoted to the republic. On the 15th, his army was attacked at the camp of Flinc by twenty thousand Vendéans. The advance-guard, composed of regulars, made a vigorous defence. Nevertheless, the main body was on the point of giving way, when the Vendéans, more ready to run away, retired in great confusion. The new battalions then demonstrated somewhat more spirit than at first; and to encourage them those praises were bestowed upon them, which were much better merited by the advance-guard. On the 17th, they advanced near Vihiers, and a fresh attack, received and sustained with the same vigour by the advance-guard, and with the same wavering by the body of the army, was again driven off. In the course of the day, the army arrived at Vihiers. Several of the generals, considering that the Orleans battalions were in too bad order to keep the field, and that with such an army there was no remaining in the heart of the country, advised a retreat. Labarolière decided that he ought to halt at Vihiers, and defend himself if he was attacked at that place. On the 18th, at one o'clock in the afternoon, the Vendéans showed themselves; the republican advance-guard conducted itself with the same bravery; but the remainder of the army wavered at the sight of the enemy, and fell back in spite of the exertions of their generals. The battalions of Paris, rather preferring to cry treason than fight, retired in great disorder. The confusion became general: Santerre, who had most courageously thrown himself forwards in the thick of the fight, narrowly escaped being made prisoner; the representative Bourbotte exposed himself to the same danger; and the army fled so quickly, that in a few hours it got to Saumur. The division of Niort, which was about to march, remained where it was; and on the 20th, it was settled that it should await the reorganization of the column of Saumur. As some one must needs be made answerable for this defeat, Ronsin and his agents denounced Berthier the chief of the Staff, and General Menou, who, both of them, had the character of being aristocrats, because they enforced discipline. Berthier and Menou were forthwith summoned to Paris in the same way that Biron and Westermann had been. Such had been, up to this period, the state of this war. The Vendéans, on their sudden outbreak in April and May, had taken Thouars, Loudun, Doué, and Saumur; thanks to the inferiority of the troops which had been formed of new recruits. Having got down as far as Nantes in June, they had been driven off from Nantes by Caneaux, and from Sables by Boulard, two generals who possessed the means of introducing a good system of discipline among their soldiers. Westermann, making a bold movement, and possessing some good soldiers, had pushed as far as Chatillon towards the beginning of June; but betrayed by the inhabitants, and surprised by the rebels, he had suffered a defeat; and lastly, the column of Tours, in attempting to advance into the country with the Orleans battalions, had experienced the fate which usually attends ill-regulated armies. At the end of July, the Vendéans were completely masters throughout the whole extent of their territory. So far as concerns the brave and unfortunate Biron, who was accused of not being at Nantes, at the very time he was surveying Lower Vendée, and of not being near Westermann while he was settling upon a plan of operations with Caneaux,—distrusted, interrupted in all his movements as he was, he had only been recently removed from the army without having had time allowed him for action, and indeed he had never appeared with his army but to be perpetually accused. Caneaux remained at Nantes; but the brave Boulard was no longer commander at Sables, and the two battalions of the Gironde had just retreated. This, therefore, was the picture of La Vendée in July: defeats of all the columns in the upper country; complaints and denunciations of the ministerial agents against the generals, who were assumed to be aristocrats, and complaints of the generals against the disorganizers sent out by the ministry and the Jacobins.

At the east and in the north the sieges of Mentz and Valenciennes were making alarming progress.

Mentz, situated upon the left bank of the Rhine, on the French side, and opposite to the mouth of the Main, forms a large arc of a circle, of which the Rhine may be considered as the chord. A large suburb, Cassel, seated on the opposite bank, communicates with the fortified town by a bridge of boats. The island of Petersau, situated above Mentz, stands out in the river, and its point stretches out high enough to batter the bridge of boats, and thus occupy a position, whence it was enabled to maintain an oblique fire upon its fortifications. On that side next the river, Mentz has no other protection than a brick wall; but on the side facing the country it is very well fortified at every point. In going from the river to the height of the point of Petersau it is defended by an enclosure and a ditch, through which the rivulet of Zalbach flows as it falls into the Rhine. At the extremity of this ditch, the fort of Hauptstein takes the whole length of the ditch, and forms an additional protection to the water by the position of its guns. Taking it up from this point, the enclosure extends and stretches onward to the upper channel of the Rhine; but the ditch is not continued, and a double enclosure parallel to the first is substituted for it. Thus, on this side two lines of wall require a double siege. The citadel, which is connected with this double enclosure, serves to increase its strength.

Such was Mentz in 1793, even before the fortifications had been improved. The garrison amounted to twenty thousand men, because general Schaal, who was to have made his retreat with one division, had been thrown back upon the fortifications, and consequently had not been able to rejoin Custine's army. The place was insufficiently provisioned. In the uncertainty that prevailed as to keeping Mentz, little care had been taken to victual the place; at last Custine gave directions to that effect. The Jews offered to contract, but the bargain they wanted to drive was a hard one; they required that all the baggage-waggons intercepted in their passage by the enemy should be included in the contract price. Rewbell and Merlin declined this offer, apprehending that the Jews themselves might cause the capture of the waggons. Nevertheless, there was no want of corn, but it was foreseen that if the mills seated on the river should be destroyed, it never could be ground. There was but little meat, and, in particular, the forage was utterly inadequate to supply the three thousand horses of the garrison. The artillery consisted of one hundred and thirty pieces of brass, and sixty of iron, which were there previously, and in a very bad condition; the French, however, had brought thither eighty pieces in good condition. Thus there was sufficient cannon to man the ramparts, but then there was a bad supply of gunpowder. The skilful and heroic Meunier, who had executed the fortifications of Cherbourg, was commissioned to defend Cassel and the posts on the right bank; Dorpré took the direction of the operations by the soldiers in the fortress; Aubert-Dubayet and Kleber took the command of the troops; and the representatives Merlin and Rewbell animated the garrison by their presence. The encampment was formed in the space between the two enclosures, and occupied in the distance some very advanced posts. The army was animated by the very best spirit, possessed great confidence in the fortifications, its officers, and its strength; and, what was more, it was well understood, that it had to make good its ground at a point of the utmost importance for the welfare of France.

General Schoenfeld, whose encampment was upon the right bank, hemmed in Cassel with ten thousand Hessians. The Austrians and the Prussians together led the principal attack on Mentz. The Austrians occupied the right of the besiegers. In front of the double enclosure, the Prussians formed the centre of Marienburg, where the head-quarters of the king of Prussia were stationed. The left likewise was composed of Prussians, encamped in front of Hauptstein, and the ditch overflowing with the water of the brook of Zalbach. Nearly fifty thousand men composed this army of siege, under the direction of old Kalkreuth. Brunswick commanded the army of observation in the quarter of the Vosges, where he kept up a constant communication with Wurmser in order to afford protection to this important operation. Being in want of heavy siege-artillery, they treated with the states of Holland, who again partially exhausted their arsenals for the purpose of assisting the progress of their more formidable neighbours.

The investment of Mentz commenced in April.

Distress of the republican garrison at the siege of Mentz.

307

Until the trains of artillery could arrive, the garrison acted upon the offensive in continually making the most spirited sallies. On the 11th of April, and some few days after the investment, our generals resolved to attempt a surprise against the ten thousand Hessians, who had extended their line rather too far upon the right bank. On the night of the 11th they issued from Cassel in three columns. Meunier marched straightforwards to Hockheim; the two other columns went down the right bank towards Biberich; but a careless musketeer from the column of general Schaal caused a general disorder. The troops, who were yet quite undisciplined, did not yet possess that steadiness they so soon acquired under their generals. They consequently were obliged to retreat. Kléber with his column covered the retreat in the most masterly manner. This sally brought the besieged forty nine, which were saluted.

On the 16th, the enemy's generals attempted to carry the post of Weissenau, which, situated as it was near the Rhine, and on the right of their attack, caused them considerable uneasiness. The French, notwithstanding the firing of the village, entrenched themselves in a cemetery; Merlin, the representative, posted himself there with them, and they were enabled, by performing prodigies, to retain possession of the post.

On the 26th, the Prussians despatched a false parley, who stated that he was sent by the general of the army of the Rhine to engage the garrison to surrender. The generals, the representatives, and the soldiers, already attached to the place, and feeling convinced that they were rendering a great service in checking the army of the Rhine upon the frontier, rejected all terms. On the 3rd of May, the king of Prussia made an attempt upon a post on the right bank opposite Cassel, that of Costein, and Meunier defended it. The attack, which was supported on the 3rd of May with great obstinacy, and recommenced on the 8th, was repelled with considerable loss to the besiegers. Meunier, on his part, did his utmost to maintain an attack upon the islands situated in the mouth of Maine; he gained, and ultimately lost them, and on each occasion displayed the most undaunted bravery.

On the 30th of May, the French settled upon making a general sally upon Marienburg, where the king Frederick-William then was. Favoured by the night, six thousand men passed through the enemy's lines, took possession of their entrenchments, and got up to the head-quarters. In the mean time, the alarm then raised, brought the entire army down upon them, and they got back after having lost many of their brave comrades. The next day, the king of Prussia, in a chafé, kept up a constant fire upon the fortress. The same day, Meunier made a fresh attempt upon one of the islands of the Maine. Being wounded in the knee, he died, not so much from the wound itself as from the consequences of the irritation he felt at being compelled to absent himself from the operations of the siege. The entire garrison attended his funeral: the king of Prussia ordered a cessation of the firing while the last honours were being paid to this hero; and gave a salute with one salvo of artillery. The body was deposited at the point of the bastion of Cassel, which had been constructed under his superintendence.

The great train of artillery had arrived from Holland. It was full time, therefore, for the enemy to commence the operations of the siege. A certain Prussian officer strongly advised them to seize upon the Isle of Petersau, the point of which elevated itself between Cassel and Mentz, to place batteries there, to destroy the bridge of boats and the mills, and to assault Cassel at the very time when they would have cut it off, and prevented its receiving relief from the fortifications. He next proposed to make an advance towards the ditch through which the Zabach flowed, to throw himself therein, under the protection of the batteries of Petersau, which cover the whole length of the ditch, and to essay an assault upon that front, which consisted of no more than a single enclosure. The scheme was both bold and dangerous; for he must have landed at Petersau, and afterwards have thrown himself into the dyke full of water, and under the fire of the Hauptstein; but then the results would also soon demonstrate themselves. It was thought preferable to open a trench all along the double enclosure, and opposite the citadel, although this was sure to cause a double siege.

On the 16th of June, a first parallel was opened at eight hundred paces distant from the first enclosure. The besieged interrupted the works; they had to fall back. On the 18th, another parallel was opened much further off, that is to say, at fifteen hundred feet; and this distance excited the contempt of those who had proposed the bold attack by the Isle of Petersau. From the 24th to the 25th, they got nearer; they fixed themselves at eight hundred paces, and raised batteries. The besieged again interrupted the works, and spiked the cannon; but they were at last repelled, and overwhelmed by a continued firing. On the 18th and the 19th, two hundred pieces of cannon were brought to bear upon the place, and covered it with projectiles of every description. Some floating batteries, stationed on the Rhine, burnt the interior of the town on the most unprotected side, and inflicted considerable devastation upon that quarter.

However, the last parallel was not yet opened, the first enclosure had not yet been gained, and the garrison, in high spirits, never once thought of surrendering. In order to rid themselves of the floating batteries, some brave Frenchmen threw themselves into the water to swim, and set about cutting the cables of the enemy's boats. One was seen towing, while in the water himself, a boat containing eighty soldiers, who were made prisoners.

The distress of the garrison was at its height. The mills had been burnt, and it became necessary to use handmills for grinding the corn; but there was no procuring any one to work them; for the enemy, who were acquainted with the fact, kept up a continual play of howitzers on the spot where they were placed. In addition to this, there was scarcely any corn left; for a long time the garrison had nothing but horseflesh; the soldiers ate rats, and went to the side of the Rhine to fish out the dead horses that floated down the river. This kind of food became fatal to many of them; it became absolutely necessary to prohibit it, and to prevent their obtaining it, by posting guards on the banks of the Rhine. A cat fetched six francs; horseflesh sold for forty-five sous the pound. The officers were not better off than the soldiers; and Aubert-Dubayet having invited his staff to dine with him, served up as a great treat a cat flanked by a dozen mice. But the most miserable part of the affair for this unhappy garrison was the total privation of every species of intelligence. All communications had been so effectually intercepted, that for three months they were kept in utter ignorance of what was taking place in France. They had done their utmost to make their distress known: on one occasion, by means of a lady who was travelling into Switzerland; on another occasion, by a priest who was going to the Netherlands; and lastly, on another occasion, by a spy who was to pass through the enemy's camp. But none of these intelligences reached their destination. Hoping that perhaps it might occur to their friends to send them intelligence from the Upper Rhine by means of bottles thrown into the river, the besieged placed nets, which they dragged every day, but never found any thing there. The Prussians, who had practised every species of stratagem, had caused forged Moniteurs to be printed at Frankfurt, stating that Dumouriez had overturned the convention, and that Louis XVII. governed by a regency. The Prussians placed at the outposts conveyed these forged Moniteurs to the soldiers of the garrison; and their perusal diffused the greatest uneasiness, and added, to the sufferings they already were enduring, the mortifying consideration that they might be at that very time defending a lost cause. However, they patiently waited, in saying among themselves, The army of the Rhine will soon be here. Sometimes it was reported, It has come. One night, a brisk cannonade was heard a long way off from the fortifications. Everybody joyfully got up, hurried to their arms, and made ready to march in the direction of the French cannon, so as to place the enemy between two fires. Vain hope! the noise ceased, and the army that was to deliver them never made its appearance. At last the general distress became so intolerable, that two thousand inhabitants requested to leave the place. Aubert-Dubayet gave the required permission; but they were not recognised by the besiegers, and remained between the firing on both sides, and most of them perished under the walls of the fortifications. The next morning, the soldiers were seen bringing under their cloaks the wounded children into the town.

During this period, the army of the Rhine and the Moselle made no progress. Custine had been its commander-in-chief until the month of June. Still being entirely disheartened by his retreat, he had been continually in a state of uncertainty during the months of April and May. He said that he was not sufficiently reinforced; that he wanted much more cavalry to enable him to stand his ground on the plains of the Palatinate against the strength of the enemy's cavalry; that he had not sufficient forage to keep his horses; that he must needs wait till the rye was ripe enough for forage, and then he would lose no time in marching to the assistance of Mentz*. Beauharnais, who was as indecisive as himself, lost the opportunity of saving the place. The chain of the Vosges, as is well known, runs along the Rhine, and does not break off far from Mentz. By occupying the two slopes of the chain, and its principal passes, an important advantage may be secured, because a force can be brought to bear either on one side or the other, so as to overwhelm an enemy by compact masses. This was the position the French, in fact, occupied. The army of the Rhine occupied the eastern slope, and that of the Moselle the western slope. The forces of Brunswick or Wurmser were scattered at the end of the chain of mountains over a long extended cordon. Having the possession of the passes, the two French armies could either bring themselves together on either of the slopes, overwhelm Brunswick or Wurmser, fall upon the besiegers in their rear, and thus save Mentz. Beauharnais, who, though not deficient in courage, had not the spirit of enterprize, made a few unproductive movements, and did not relieve the garrison.

The representatives and the generals shut up in Mentz,—considering that there was no necessity for pushing matters to the worst; that if they waited eight days or so longer, they would be destitute of every thing, and after all be compelled to surrender the garrison as prisoners; and that, on the other hand, by capitulating they would be able to secure for themselves free egress with the honours of war, and also preserve twenty thousand men, who had become the best soldiers possible under Kléber and Dubayet,—decided upon the necessity of surrendering the place. There is no doubt, but that in a few more days Beauharnais could have saved the town; but after having waited so long, it was no longer reasonable to entertain any hopes of relief, and the reasons which urged their surrender were peremptory. The king of Prussia was not hard in his terms; he allowed them to march out with arms and baggage, and insisted but upon one condition, and that was, that the garrison should not serve for one whole year against the allies. But there remained enemies enough in the interior to occupy these admirable soldiers, since named the Mayerçais. They were so attached to their post, that they would not obey their generals until it became absolutely necessary to quit the place: a remarkable instance of that esprit de corps which characterizes itself upon one point, as well as of the affection which is contracted for a place which one has defended for some months. However, the garrison evacuated; and while it fled off, the king of Prussia, struck with admiration at the bravery it had exhibited, called those officers by name who had distinguished themselves during the siege, and complimented them in a spirit of chivalrous courtesy. This evacuation took place on the 25th of July.

We left the Austrians at the blockade of the fortified town of Condé, and laying regular siege to Valenciennes. These operations, carried on simultaneously with those of the Rhine, were now about to terminate. The Prince of Cobourg, at the head of an army of observation, lay opposite to Cæsar's camp; the Duke of York commanded the besieging army. The attack, at first pointed against the citadel, was subsequently directed against the suburb of Marly and the bridge of Mons. This front presented a much more extended line; but it was not so strongly defended, and it was preferred as being more attainable. It was settled that the fortifications should be battered by day, and that the town should be fired by night, in order to add to the privations of the inhabitants, and as a means to effect their speedy discouragement. The place was summoned to surrender on the 14th of June: General Ferrand, and the representatives Cochon and Briest, answered with a dignified firmness. They had mustered a garrison of seven thousand men, who all evinced the most kindly feelings towards the inhabitants, whom they formed into companies of gunners, and rendered us the most effective services.

Two parallels were opened, one after the other, on the nights of the 14th and 19th of June, armed with formidable batteries. They caused the most frightful havoc in the town. The inhabitants and the garrison replied to the attack with a corresponding vigour, and several times effected the destruction of the besiegers' operations. The 25th of June was particularly dreadful. The enemy fired upon the fortifications till noon without any reply being made; but at this time a terrible fire from the ramparts was poured upon the trenches, threw all into confusion there, and carried thither the same terror and destruction which had been prevailing in the town. On the 28th of June, a third parallel was opened, and the constancy of the inhabitants began to be shaken. Already a portion of this opulent town had been burnt down. The children, old men, and the women, had been put in the cellars. The surrender of Condé, which had been recently taken by famine, had a further tendency to discourage the besieged. Emissaries had been despatched to them, in order to work upon their feelings. Meetings were formed, which had for their object the compelling a capitulation. The municipality identified itself with the inclinations of the inhabitants, and combined secretly with them. The representatives and General Ferrand replied, with great force, to the requirements thus addressed to them; and, by the assistance of the garrison, whose courage was worked up to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, they dispersed these meetings.

On the 25th of July, the besieged prepared their mining operations, and made ready for the assault of the covered way. Luckily for them, three shells burst at the very moment when the mines of the garrison were beginning to play upon and destroy their works. The besiegers then rushed forwards in three columns, cleared the palisades, and pushed into the covered way. The garrison, in alarm, made a retreat, and was already leaving the batteries, but General Ferrand brought them back upon the ramparts. The artillery, who had performed prodigies during the whole siege, did further execution upon the besiegers, and stopped them almost at the gates of the fortifications. The next day, the Duke of York summoned General Ferrand to surrender; he fairly told him that, after the lapse of that day, he would turn a deaf ear to all proposals, and that the garrison and the inhabitants should be put to the edge of the sword. At this threat, great gatherings of the people took place; one mob in particular, in which were a vast number of men armed with pistols and daggers, surrounded the municipality. Twelve individuals became spokesmen for all, and made a formal request that the town should surrender. A council of war was held in the midst of this uproar; none of its members were allowed to depart from it, and sentinels were stationed to keep guard over them until they had come to the resolution to decide in favour of the surrender. Two branches, the disaffection of the inhabitants, and an active besieging enemy, did not justify their holding out any longer. The place was surrendered the 28th of July. The garrison issued forth with the honours of war, were compelled to lay down their arms, but were at liberty to return to France, provided they abstained for one entire year from serving against the allies. There were still seven thousand brave soldiers available against the enemies at home. Valenciennes had undergone a forty-one days' bombardment, and had been exposed to eighty-four thousand cannon-balls, twenty thousand howitzer-shot, and eighty thousand bombs. The general and the garrison had done their duty, and the artillery had entitled itself to great honours.

At this precise period, the war of federalism reduced itself to these two practical disadvantages; the rebellion of Lyons on one side, and that of Marseilles and Toulon upon the other.

Lyons had certainly acknowledged the convention, but refused to render obedience to two decrees: the one, which transferred to Paris the proceedings commenced against the patriots; and the other, which displaced the authorities and ordered the formation of a new provisional municipality. The aristocrats who lay concealed in Lyons had excited an alarm in that city against the return of the former Mountaineer municipality, and thus, by indistinct apprehensions of danger, engaged them in the practical dangers of an open rebellion. On the 15th of July, the Lyonnese caused the two patriots Chaliar and Richard to be put to death, and from that day they were declared to be in a state of rebellion. The two Girondists, Chasset and Biroteau, perceiving that royalism was in the ascendancy, withdrew themselves. In the mean time, the president of the popular commission, who was entirely devoted to the emigrants, having been displaced, the sway of public opinion had become of a less hostile character. They acknowledged the constitution, and offered to be bound by it, but always upon the condition of non-performance of the two principal decrees. In this interval, the leaders of this rebellion were casting cannon, and engrossing military stores, and there seemed no way of settling the question other than by a recourse to arms.

Marseilles bore a much less formidable appearance. Her battalions, driven beyond the Durance by Carteaux, were not able to maintain a protracted struggle; but she had communicated to Toulon, hitherto so republican, her rebellious spirit. This port, one of the most important in the world, and the first port of the Mediterranean, had excited the envy of the English who cruised off its coasts. It was there that the emissaries of England conducted a clancular intrigue, and concerted a dishonourable piece of treachery. The sections had assembled there on the 13th of July, and, proceeding in the same manner with all those of the south, had displaced the municipality, and closed the Jacobin club. The executive authority, thus transferred to the hands of the federalists, was in danger of passing in succession from faction to spoliation; but they were constantly clamouring for terrible examples to be made of the traders, and the reader will recollect the priest Jacques Roux stirring up the Cordeliers, in order to obtain the insertion of an article in the constitution specially comprehending the monopolizers. Public clamour was also let loose against the stock-brokers, who were the main cause, as the saying was, of the increased price of goods, by their speculations in the assignats, gold, silver, and foreign paper.

The imagination of the people had conceived such monstrosities, and upon every quarter had considered themselves exposed to inveterate enemies, while, in fact, there only existed a greedy sort of gamblers, profiting by the evil, it is true, but not originating it, and, what is more, totally incompetent so to do. The depreciation of the assignats may be traced to numberless causes: the great quantity in which they were issued; the uncertainty of their ever being paid off, an event that would never take place if the revolution failed to keep its ground; their relative disproportion between money (which never divested itself of its substantive value) and merchandizes (which, in retaining their value, would not put themselves in point of exchange upon a level with a money divested of its worth). In this state of things, capitalists would not invest their capital in assignats, for, if invested in that shape, they would be utterly lost. At first, they had done their best to procure money; but six years of trouble had alarmed the sellers and purchasers of metallic currency. They next thought of purchasing goods, but they only afforded a temporary investment, because they could not be long kept on hand, and were, in fact, a dangerous employment of capital, now the popular rage against monopolizers was at its height. They therefore sought for foreign securities. All those who held assignats used their utmost exertions to procure bills of exchange upon London, Amsterdam, Hambro', Geneva, or on any other place in Europe; they paid for these foreign securities national securities to an enormous amount, and thus caused the depreciation of the assignats, in thus abandoning them. Some of these bills of exchange were realized out of France, and their value got into the hands of the emigrants. These bills of exchange, which were transmuted into guineas or ducats, were paid for by the proceeds of splendid furniture, the spoils of former luxury, consisting of carvings, clocks and watches, mirrors, gilt bronzes, porcelain, pictures, rare editions of valuable works; and it was but a small portion of these that was ever expected to be reduced into money. These bills were anxiously sought for by the alarmed capitalists, who never desired to emigrate, but simply desired to impart stability to their fortune; they did not generally circulate far from the spot where the most alarmed capitalists negotiated them amongst each other. These bills thus formed a peculiar species of funds, secured upon foreign parties, and competing with our assignats. There is some reason for believing that Pitt had induced the English bankers to accept a vast quantity of this paper, and had even opened for them a considerable credit to augment the gross amount, and by this contrivance to contribute, on all occasions, to the depreciation of the assignats. Great anxiety was also exhibited to obtain shares in the various stocks, which seems to be quite beyond all the influences of the revolution and a counter-revolution, and which, moreover, offered a desirable investment. Those of the discount company were very much liked, but those of the East India company were, above all, sought after with the greatest avidity, because in some measure their security depended upon a pledge that could not be seized, the subject of credit consisting in vessels and factories in every quarter of the globe. In vain was it that they had been charged with a heavy transfer duty; the directors evaded the law, by abolishing the actual transfers, and substituting for such transfers a simple entry upon the books of the company, which required no legal formality. The revenue was thus defrauded to a considerable extent; for there were several thousand transfers a day, and they rendered of no avail the precautions taken to prevent stock-jobbing. To no purpose was it, that in order to diminish the preference for these shares, a duty of five per cent. had been charged upon their value; the dividends were distributed to the share-holders as a repayment of a part of the capital, and by this scheme the directors again evaded the law. Thus it was, that shares of 600 francs rose to 1000, 1200, and even 2000 francs. These were so many modes of investment which stood in competition with the revolutionary currency, and materially assisted to depreciate it.

Not only were all these species of funded securities, but even certain portions of the public debt, and even of other specific assignats, in operation against the assignats. In point of fact, there existed loans subscribed for at all periods and in every shape. There were even some which dated their commencement from Louis XIII. Among the later stocks subscribed for under Louis XIV. there were some of different creations. A marked preference was generally exhibited for those which were prior to the constitutional monarchy, over those that had been opened for the purposes of the revolution. Every one disliked the assignats charged upon the property of the clergy and the emigrants. In short, there were distinctions made between the assignats themselves: out of about five thousand million issued since their creation, one thousand million had been received from the purchases made of national property; nearly four thousand million remained in circulation; and out of those four thousand million, five hundred million may be said to have been created under Louis XVI., and bearing the king's head. These last, it was said, would meet with more consideration in case of a counter-revolution, and would be recognised for at least some portion of their nominal value. Thus they advanced in price ten or fifteen per cent. above the others. The republican assignats, the sole resource of government, the only circulating medium, were therefore in every respect depreciated, and were placed in competition at one and the same time with money, merchandise, foreign paper, stocks and funded securities, and the various government securities, and, lastly, the royal assignats.

The compensation money in respect of abolished offices, the payment of the great supplies for the purposes of the war, the readiness of numerous debtors to release themselves from their engagements, had placed a vast amount of capital in a few hands. The war, and the fear of a terrible revolution, had interrupted numerous commercial operations, had led to great settlements of accounts, and had still further increased the mass of unemployed capital requiring investment. The capitals thus accumulated, formed the subject of a perpetual stock-jobbing on the exchange at Paris, and were alternately converted into gold, silver, provisions, bills of exchange, shares in companies, old government securities, &c. There, as usual, resorted those adventurous gamblers, who plunge themselves into every species of hazard, who speculate upon the accidents of commerce, upon the army contracts, upon the good faith of governments, &c. By constantly watching the course of exchange, they turned to good advantage every rise of the funds upon the constant fall of the assignats. The fall of the assignats first began at the exchange with reference to money and moveable property. The next fall bore evident relation to the value of merchandise, which rose in price in shops and markets. Nevertheless, goods were not so rapid in their rise as money, because the markets are at some distance from the exchange, consequently they are not so soon affected, and more especially as merchants cannot quote the price with such rapidity as is done by stock-jobbers met together in one hall. The difference in prices first settled at the exchange, was not declared in other places, until more or less time according to circumstances had intervened; the five-franc assignat, which at one time was not current for more than two francs at the exchange, yet passed for three francs in the market, and the stock-jobbers thus obtained the necessary interval to enable them to speculate. Having thus their capitals always at hand, they procured money before the rise; as soon as it had obtained a rise in reference to assignats, they exchanged against the latter; they of course had always a quantity of assignats, and as commodities had not had time to rise also, with this quantity of assignats they bought a greater quantity of goods, and sold them again when they came to par. Their scheme consisted in possessing themselves of either cash or merchandise while one or the other were rising, against the assignats. Their profit therefore was obtained by the continual rise of every thing above the assignat; and it was nothing more than natural that this sort of gain, which always was made at the expense of a public calamity, should be looked upon with an evil eye. Their speculations comprehended the rise and fall of every description of security, such as foreign bills, shares of companies, &c. They took advantage of every circumstance that was calculated to cause a change in the funds, such as a defeat, a motion or a false report. These persons composed a class by no means inconsiderable. In their number might be comprehended, foreign bankers, contractors, usurers, persons who had formerly been priests or nobles, revolutionary upstarts, and also a few deputies, who, to the honour of the convention be it spoken, did not count more than five or six, and who availed themselves of the paltry means of adding to the changes in the funds by motions made for that purpose. They led a careless life with actresses, and women who had been either nuns or countesses, who, from being simple mistresses, not unfrequently took upon themselves to engage in this business. Those deputies who were principally engaged in these intrigues were, Julien of Toulouse and Delamuray of Angers, both living in open concubinage, the first with the countess of Beaufort, and the latter with an actress of the name of Descoings. It has been hinted that Chabot, who as an ex-capuchin was extremely debauched, and not unfrequently meddled with questions of finance, entered into this brokerage system in partnership with two brokers of the name of Frey, exiles from Moravia on account of their revolutionary opinions and now set up in Paris as bankers. Fabré d'Eglantine also dabbled in this traffic; and Danton was accused, but without foundation, of being no stranger to these proceedings.

The most scandalous stock-jobbing trick was that which identified the Baron de Batz, a banker and expert loan-contractor, with Julien of Toulouse and Delamuray of Angers, the deputies who seemed most bent upon making their fortunes. They entered into a conspiracy to charge the East India Company with certain corrupt practices, and thus to cause its bonds to fall,—to purchase them immediately, and then cause them to rise gradually by a gentle counteraction, and thus realize the difference of the rise. That profligate abbé, D'Espagnac, who was contractor for Dumouriez in Belgium, and had since obtained the general contract for waggons, and whose interests Julien took special care to protect at the convention, was, in return for the obligation, to furnish the capital for this speculation. Julien also had in view the engagement of Fabre, Chabot, and others, who were likely to prove useful, as members of various committees, in this conspiracy.

The greater part of these men were attached to the revolution, and had no desire to lower it in public estimation; but, at all events, they wished to make their fortunes. All their secret devices were not made public, but inasmuch as they speculated upon the fall of the assignats, they were charged with the whole extent of that evil of which they had taken advantage. As their association included many foreign bankers, they were said to be agents of Pitt and of the allied powers; and here it was that the people fancied they saw that mysterious and so-much-dreaded influence of the English ministry displayed. The people were, in short, equally clamorous against the stock-jobbers and the monopolizers, and required that both should be subjected to the same punishment.

Thus, while the north, the Rhine, the South, and the Vendée, were invaded by our enemies, our financial resources consisted of a repudiated currency, of which the security was quite as uncertain as the revolution itself, and which, upon every miscarriage, diminished in a value proportionate to the threatened danger. Such was our singular situation: in exact proportion as the danger increased, and the means to oppose should have increased with it, they diminished in the contrary ratio; supplies for the army were quite beyond the power of the government to furnish, and provisions were out of reach of the people. It therefore became imperatively necessary, at one and the same time, to obtain soldiers, arms, and money for the service of the state and the people, and, after that had been accomplished, to assure ourselves of victory.

faction, to the emigrants and to the English. The army of Nice, in its then state of weakness, was unable to prevent such an unfortunate occurrence. There was every thing to fear; and that vast storm, blown up under the horizon of the south, hung over two points, Lyons and Toulon.

For the last two months, the state of things was more clearly seen, and the danger, although less general and not so astounding in its character, yet became more settled and more serious in its aspect. In the west, there was the destructive wound of La Vendée; at Marseilles, deeply-seated sedition; at Toulon, subtle treachery; at Lyons, open rebellion and a siege. On the Rhine, and in the north, there was the loss of two bulwarks, which had so long stood between ourselves and the allies, and prevented the enemy from marching up to the capital. In September, 1792, when the Prussians were marching up to Paris, and had taken Longwy and Verdun; in April, 1793, after the retreat from Belgium upon the defeat at Neerwinden, the defection of Dumouriez, and the first outbreak of the Vendée; on the 31st of May, after the universal insurrection of the departments, the invasion of Roussillon by the Spaniards, and the loss of the camp of Famars;—at these three periods, the dangers had certainly been most alarming, but perhaps never so distinctly visible as at this fourth period of August, 1793. This was the fourth and last crisis of the Revolution. France was less ignorant, and also more acquainted with war, than she was in September, 1792; felt less alarmed at treasonable practices than in April, 1793, was less involved with insurrectionary movements than on the 31st of May and the 12th of June; but if she was more inured to war and better obeyed, she was also invaded upon every point at once,—at the north, on the Rhine, at the Alps, and at the Pyrenees.

However, we shall never make ourselves acquainted with all the evils which at that time afflicted the republic, if we confine ourselves to the sole consideration of the five or six fields of battle, on which so much human blood was spilt. The interior showed a state of things altogether quite as deplorable. Corn was always dear and scarce. One had to knock at the doors of the bakers to procure even a small piece of bread. It was useless to dispute with shop-keepers to compel them to accept assignats in exchange for necessary articles. The distress was at its height. The people uttered complaints against the monopolizers who forestalled the supplies; of brokers who made them still more dear, and who in their dealings would not accept of assignats. The government in every respect suffering as much as the people, had no other means of existence than the assignats, which it was compelled to deliver in much more than treble or quadruple the amount as payment for identical services, and which they were fearful of issuing, as that might tend to depreciate them still further. In fact, nobody knew how the government or the people contrived to exist.

Nevertheless, the natural products of the earth sustained no diminution. Though the night of the 4th of August had not produced its mighty effects, France was neither in want of corn, or raw materials, or wrought goods; but their lawful and peaceable distribution became impracticable by the effects of a paper currency. The revolution, who in abolishing monarchy had been equally desirous of fulfilling her engagements; who in abolishing the sale of offices felt bound to offer a compensation, who in defending the new order of things against all Europe united against her, was compelled to bear the charges of an universal warfare, had for the purpose of answering these charges, the national property taken from the clergy and the emigrants. To put the value of this property into circulation, the revolution had devised the assignats which represented this property, and these assignats by the ordinary course of purchases were to be presented to the treasury and then burnt. But as the accomplishment of the revolution, and the stability of the sales, became a matter of doubt, no one purchased any of the property. The assignats remained in the circulating medium upon the same footing as an unaccepted bill of exchange, and became depreciated, from the doubt that existed respecting them, as well as by their number.

Current money alone had always remained as the real measure of value; for nothing is so prejudicial to a questionable money, as the rivalry of a money bearing a specific and undoubted character. The one withdraws itself from circulation, and refuses to show itself, while the other offers itself in abundance, and detracts from its own value by offering itself. Such was the situation of the assignats with respect to money. The revolution, doomed to violent measures, knew not where to stop. She had put into forced circulation the anticipated value of national property, she tried the experiment of keeping up their value by compulsory measures. On the 11th of April, in spite of the opposition of the Girondists, who nobly but imprudently struggled against the fatality of that revolutionary necessity, the convention punished by six years' imprisonment whosoever sold current money, that is to say, exchanged a certain quantity of silver or gold against a higher nominal quantity of assignats. She also visited with the same punishment whosoever should ask a different price for his goods, by making a distinction whether the payment was to be made in current money or in assignats.

These measures did not prevent the difference from rapidly demonstrating itself. In the month of June a metallic franc was worth three francs in assignats; and in August, two months afterwards, one silver franc was worth six francs in assignats. The relative diminution in value, which at first bore the proportion of one to three, now raised itself to the proportion of one to six.

Under these circumstances the shopkeepers refused to affix the same prices to their goods as before, because the money that was tendered them was not more than a fifth or sixth of its nominal value. They therefore closed their shops, and refused to deal with their customers. Certainly, this diminution in value would not have affected the assignats at all, supposing everybody receiving them at no more than their real value, had received and paid them according to the same standard. In such a case they might still have designated the rate of exchange, and done as well for the purposes of circulation as any other money; but the capitalists who lived upon their income, and the creditors of the state who received either an annual interest or the compensation for an office, were compelled to accept the paper at the rate of its nominal value. Debtors of every description hastened to discharge their obligations, and creditors forced to accept a fictitious value, never received more than the fourth, fifth, or even the sixth of their capital. Lastly, the operative classes, always compelled to offer their services, and to afford them to those who will accept of them, unable to enter into a combination to raise their wages to double or treble the amount, in the same ratio that the assignats decreased in value, only received a portion of what they earned as a means of obtaining in exchange the necessities they required. The capitalists half-ruined, became dissatisfied and taciturn; but the people now became furious, styled those trademen who refused to sell at the ordinary price monopolizers, and raised an outcry for sending all monopolists to the guillotine.

This unsatisfactory state of things was the necessary consequence of creating assignats, just the same as the assignats were introduced by the necessity for paying off old debts, buying up the offices, and by a ruinously expensive war; and from precisely similar causes, the maximum would soon be the consequence resulting from the assignats. It mattered little, so far as practical purposes were concerned, whether this money was to have a forced currency, if the dealer, by raising his price, could elude the necessity of receiving it in payment; the rate of commodities should have been forced precisely in the same way as money. From the time when the law said, "The paper is worth six francs," it ought to have said, "Such commodities are worth no more than six francs;" for otherwise the dealer by raising the price of his goods to twelve francs would save the difference in the exchange.

There certainly should have been established the maximum price of corn, notwithstanding what was urged by the Girondists, who had given excellent reasons, deduced from the ordinary economy of things. The greatest privation the people can suffer is the want of bread. Corn was not deficient; but the farmers, who were unwilling to face the disturbances of the markets, or deliver their corn at the rate of the assignats, concealed themselves together with their supplies. The small quantity of corn that made its appearance was quickly taken off by the communes, and by those individuals whose apprehensions suggested their laying in a stock. The scarcity was thus more severely felt at Paris than in any other town of France, because the furnishing of provisions for that immense city was more difficult, the markets more subject to disturbance, and the timidity of the farmers greater. On the 3rd and 4th of May, the convention could no longer forbear passing a decree, according to which all the farmers and corn-merchants were compelled to make a declaration of the quantity of corn they possessed, to thresh out what was in sheaf, to take it to the markets, and to the markets alone, and there sell it at a mean price to be fixed by each commune, and based upon the prices anterior from the 1st of January to the 1st of May. No person was allowed to purchase more than would serve him for a month: those who had sold or bought at a price above the maximum, or made false declarations, were punishable with forfeiture of the corn itself, and by fine from three hundred to a thousand francs. Domiciliary visits were established to obtain evidence of the fact; and in addition to this precaution, a tabular digest of all the declarations was to be sent by the municipality to the minister of the interior, in order to afford a correct statistic of the supplies France was enabled to yield. The commune of Paris, superadding its own police regulations to the decrees of the convention, had, moreover, taken upon itself to regulate the mode of dealing out the bread at the bakers' shops. No person was allowed to go thither unless he had tickets of safety (cartes de sûreté). Upon this ticket, which was issued by the revolutionary committees, was inscribed the quantity of bread that the bearer was enabled to require, and this allowance was in proportion to the number of individuals of which each family was composed. Even the mode of each party taking his turn to be served at the baker's door was the subject of a specific regulation. A rope was to be fastened to their doors; each person was to hold it in his hand, so as not to lose his place, and to avoid disorder. However, abandoned women not unfrequently cut this rope, a frightful scuffle was the consequence, and the military were then obliged to be called in to restore order. We, in this instance, have some idea of the overwhelming anxieties to which a government is subjected, and to what harassing measures it is compelled to have recourse, from the moment it is placed under the necessity of attending to everything. But in the present state of things one matter involved another. To force the currency of assignats led to forcing the exchanges, to forcing prices, to even forcing the quantity, the time, and the mode of dealing; the last act was the result of the first, and the first was quite as unavoidable as the revolution itself. In the mean time, the rise in the price of provisions, which had led to their maximum, extended itself to all articles forming the necessities of life. Meat, vegetables, fruit, groceries, fuel and candle, liquors, articles of clothing, and leather, had every of them risen in exact proportion to the depreciation of the assignats, and the people were every day more pertinacious in looking upon those traders as monopolizers who refused a worthless currency. It will be recollected that in February there had been a general pillage of the grocers' shops, upon the suggestion of Marat. In July, some boats, laden with soap, which came via the Seine, to Paris, were plundered in a similar manner. The indignant commune had passed the most severe regulations in reference to these offences, and Pache published the following simple and laconic notice.

"PACHE, MAYOR, TO HIS FELLOW-CITIZENS:

"Paris contains seven hundred thousand inhabitants: the soil of Paris contributes nothing to their food, their clothing, or their subsistence. It is a natural consequence, therefore, that Paris should derive everything from the other departments and from abroad.

"If the inhabitants commit spoliation upon the remittances and goods sent to Paris, they will no longer be sent.

"In that case, Paris will be destitute of food, clothing, and the means of enabling its numerous inhabitants to subsist.

"And thus seven hundred thousand persons, entirely destitute, will devour each other."

The people, indeed, had not committed further

spoliation; but they were constantly clamouring for terrible examples to be made of the traders, and the reader will recollect the priest Jacques Roux stirring up the Cordeliers, in order to obtain the insertion of an article in the constitution specially comprehending the monopolizers. Public clamour was also let loose against the stock-brokers, who were the main cause, as the saying was, of the increased price of goods, by their speculations in the assignats, gold, silver, and foreign paper.

The imagination of the people had conceived such monstrosities, and upon every quarter had considered themselves exposed to inveterate enemies, while, in fact, there only existed a greedy sort of gamblers, profiting by the evil, it is true, but not originating it, and, what is more, totally incompetent so to do. The depreciation of the assignats may be traced to numberless causes: the great quantity in which they were issued; the uncertainty of their ever being paid off, an event that would never take place if the revolution failed to keep its ground; their relative disproportion between money (which never divested itself of its substantive value) and merchandizes (which, in retaining their value, would not put themselves in point of exchange upon a level with a money divested of its worth). In this state of things, capitalists would not invest their capital in assignats, for, if invested in that shape, they would be utterly lost. At first, they had done their best to procure money; but six years of trouble had alarmed the sellers and purchasers of metallic currency. They next thought of purchasing goods, but they only afforded a temporary investment, because they could not be long kept on hand, and were, in fact, a dangerous employment of capital, now the popular rage against monopolizers was at its height. They therefore sought for foreign securities. All those who held assignats used their utmost exertions to procure bills of exchange upon London, Amsterdam, Hambro', Geneva, or on any other place in Europe; they paid for these foreign securities national securities to an enormous amount, and thus caused the depreciation of the assignats, in thus abandoning them. Some of these bills of exchange were realized out of France, and their value got into the hands of the emigrants. These bills of exchange, which were transmuted into guineas or ducats, were paid for by the proceeds of splendid furniture, the spoils of former luxury, consisting of carvings, clocks and watches, mirrors, gilt bronzes, porcelain, pictures, rare editions of valuable works; and it was but a small portion of those that was ever expected to be reduced into money. These bills were anxiously sought for by the alarmed capitalists, who never desired to emigrate, but simply desired to impart stability to their fortune; they did not generally circulate far from the spot where the most alarmed capitalists negotiated them amongst each other. These bills thus formed a peculiar species of funds, secured upon foreign parties, and competing with our assignats. There is some reason for believing that Pitt had induced the English bankers to accept a vast quantity of this paper, and had even opened for them a considerable credit to augment the gross amount, and by this contrivance to contribute, on all occasions, to the depreciation of the assignats. Great anxiety was also exhibited to obtain shares in the various stocks, which seems to be quite beyond all the influences of the revolution and a counter-revolution, and which, moreover, offered a desirable investment. Those of the discount company were very much liked, but those of the East India company were, above all, sought after with the greatest avidity, because in some measure their security depended upon a pledge that could not be seized, the subject of credit consisting in vessels and factories in every quarter of the globe. In vain was it that they had been charged with a heavy transfer duty; the directors evaded the law, by abolishing the actual transfers, and substituting for such transfers a simple entry upon the books of the company, which required no legal formality. The revenue was thus defrauded to a considerable extent; for there were several thousand transfers a day, and they rendered of no avail the precautions taken to prevent stock-jobbing. To no purpose was it, that in order to diminish the preference for these shares, a duty of five per cent. had been charged upon their value; the dividends were distributed to the share-holders as a repayment of a part of the capital, and by this scheme the directors again evaded the law. Thus it was, that shares of 600 francs rose to 1000, 1200, and even 2000 francs. These were so many modes of investment which stood in competition with the revolutionary currency, and materially assisted to depreciate it.

Not only were all these species of funded securities, but even certain portions of the public debt, and even of other specific assignats, in operation against the assignats. In point of fact, there existed loans subscribed for at all periods and in every shape. There were even some which dated their commencement from Louis XIII. Among the later stocks subscribed for under Louis XIV. there were some of different creations. A marked preference was generally exhibited for those which were prior to the constitutional monarchy, over those that had been opened for the purposes of the revolution. Every one disliked the assignats charged upon the property of the clergy and the emigrants. In short, there were distinctions made between the assignats themselves: out of about five thousand million issued since their creation, one thousand million had been received from the purchases made of national property; nearly four thousand million remained in circulation; and out of those four thousand million, five hundred million may be said to have been created under Louis XVI., and bearing the king's head. These last, it was said, would meet with more consideration in case of a counter-revolution, and would be recognised for at least some portion of their nominal value. Thus they advanced in price ten or fifteen per cent. above the others. The republican assignats, the sole resource of government, the only circulating medium, were therefore in every respect depreciated, and were placed in competition at one and the same time with money, merchandise, foreign paper, stocks and funded securities, and the various government securities, and, lastly, the royal assignats.

The compensation money in respect of abolished offices, the payment of the great supplies for the purposes of the war, the readiness of numerous debtors to release themselves from their engagements, had placed a vast amount of capital in a few hands. The war, and the fear of a terrible revolution, had interrupted numerous commercial operations, had led to great settlements of accounts, and had still further increased the mass of unemployed capital requiring investment. The capitals thus accumulated, formed the subject of a perpetual stock-jobbing on the exchange at Paris, and were alternately converted into gold, silver, provisions, bills of exchange, shares in companies, old government securities, &c. There, as usual, resorted those adventurous gamblers, who plunge themselves into every species of hazard, who speculate upon the accidents of commerce, upon the army contracts, upon the good faith of governments, &c. By constantly watching the course of exchange, they turned to good advantage every rise of the funds upon the constant fall of the assignats. The fall of the assignats first began at the exchange with reference to money and moveable property. The next fall bore evident relation to the value of merchandize, which rose in price in shops and markets. Nevertheless, goods were not so rapid in their rise as money, because the markets are at some distance from the exchange, consequently they are not so soon affected, and more especially as merchants cannot quote the price with such rapidity as is done by stock-jobbers met together in one hall. The difference in prices first settled at the exchange, was not declared in other places, until more or less time according to circumstances had intervened; the five-franc assignat, which at one time was not current for more than two francs at the exchange, yet passed for three francs in the market, and the stock-jobbers thus obtained the necessary interval to enable them to speculate. Having thus their capitals always at hand, they procured money before the rise; as soon as it had obtained a rise in reference to assignats, they exchanged against the latter; they of course had always a quantity of assignats, and as commodities had not had time to rise also, with this quantity of assignats they bought a greater quantity of goods, and sold them again when they came to par. Their scheme consisted in possessing themselves of either cash or merchandize while one or the other were rising, against the assignats. Their profit therefore was obtained by the continual rise of every thing above the assignat; and it was nothing more than natural that this sort of gain, which always was made at the expense of a public calamity, should be looked upon with an evil eye. Their speculations comprehended the rise and fall of every description of security, such as foreign bills, shares of companies, &c. They took advantage of every circumstance that was calculated to cause a change in the funds, such as a defeat, a motion or a false report. These persons composed a class by no means inconsiderable. In their number might be comprehended, foreign bankers, contractors, usurers, persons who had formerly been priests or nobles, revolutionary upstarts, and also a few deputies, who, to the honour of the convention be it spoken, did not count more than five or six, and who availed themselves of the pultry means of adding to the changes in the funds by motions made for that purpose. They led a careless life with actresses, and women who had been either nuns or countesses, who, from being simple mistresses, not unfrequently took upon themselves to engage in this business. Those deputies who were principally engaged in these intrigues were, Julien of Toulouse and Delaunay of Angers, both living in open concubinage, the first with the countess of Beaufort, and the latter with an actress of the name of Descoings. It has been hinted that Chabot, who as an ex-capuchin was extremely debauched, and not unfrequently meddled with questions of finance, entered into this brokerage system in partnership with two brokers of the name of Frey, exiles from Moravia on account of their revolutionary opinions and now set up in Paris as bankers. Fabré d'Eglantine also dabbled in this traffic; and Danton was accused, but without foundation, of being no stranger to these proceedings.

The most scandalous stock-jobbing trick was that which identified the Baron de Batz, a banker and expert loan-contractor, with Julien of Toulouse and Delaunay of Angers, the deputies who seemed most bent upon making their fortunes. They entered into a conspiracy to charge the East India Company with certain corrupt practices, and thus to cause its bonds to fall,—to purchase them immediately, and then cause them to rise gradually by a gentle counteraction, and thus realize the difference of the rise. That profligate abbé, D'Espagnac, who was contractor for Dumouriez in Belgium, and had since obtained the general contract for waggons, and whose interests Julien took special care to protect at the convention, was, in return for the obligation, to furnish the capital for this speculation. Julien also had in view the engagement of Fabre, Chabot, and others, who were likely to prove useful, as members of various committees, in this conspiracy.

The greater part of these men were attached to the revolution, and had no desire to lower it in public estimation; but, at all events, they wished to make their fortunes. All their secret devices were not made public, but inasmuch as they speculated upon the fall of the assignats, they were charged with the whole extent of that evil of which they had taken advantage. As their association included many foreign bankers, they were said to be agents of Pitt and of the allied powers; and here it was that the people fancied they saw that mysterious and so-much-dreaded influence of the English ministry displayed. The people were, in short, equally clamorous against the stock-jobbers and the monopolizers, and required that both should be subjected to the same punishment.

Thus, while the north, the Rhine, the South, and the Vendée, were invaded by our enemies, our financial resources consisted of a repudiated currency, of which the security was quite as uncertain as the revolution itself, and which, upon every miscarriage, diminished in a value proportionate to the threatened danger. Such was our singular situation: in exact proportion as the danger increased, and the means to oppose should have increased with it, they diminished in the contrary ratio; supplies for the army were quite beyond the power of the government to furnish, and provisions were out of reach of the people. It therefore became imperatively necessary, at one and the same time, to obtain soldiers, arms, and money for the service of the state and the people, and, after that had been accomplished, to assure ourselves of victory.

CHAPTER XII.

THE ARRIVAL AND MODE OF RECEPTION AT PARIS OF THE COMMISSARIES OF THE PRIMARY ASSEMBLIES.—THE RETREAT OF THE ARMY OF THE NORTH FROM CESAR'S CAMP.—FETE OF THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE TENTH OF AUGUST, AND THE INAUGURATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF 1793.—EXTRAORDINARY MEASURES OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE PUBLIC WELFARE.—THE DECREE ENACTING A LEVY EN MASSE.—MEANS TAKEN TO ENSURE ITS EXECUTION.—INSTITUTION OF THE "GREAT-BOOK;" REMODELLING OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.—FORCED LOAN.—A DESCRIPTION OF THE VARIOUS FINANCIAL OPERATIONS AT THIS PERIOD.—NEW DECREES RESPECTING THE "MAXIMUM."—DECREES AGAINST LA VENDEE, CONCERNING FOREIGNERS, AND AGAINST THE NOUBLONS.

THE commissaries despatched by the primary assemblies to celebrate the anniversary of the tenth of August and to accept the constitution in the name of entire France, had just arrived at Paris. A desire was evinced to seize upon the present moment as a means of calling a movement of enthusiasm into action, of reconciling the provinces with the capital, and stimulating heroic resolves. A splendid reception was indeed prepared for them. Applications were made to every merchant in the neighbourhood. An immense store of provisions was collected, so that the general scarcity should not interfere with the fêtes, and that the commissaries might at the same time enjoy the spectacle of peace, plenty, and tranquillity. So much attention was paid to these commissaries, that all the administrations * of public conveyances were ordered to afford them places therein, notwithstanding they might previously have been booked by travellers. The administrative authorities of the departments, who equalled those of the commune in the sternness of their language and proclamations, made an address to the brethren of the primary assemblies. "There," said they, "men who wear the mask of patriotism, will talk to you enthusiastically of liberty, equality, the unity and indivisibility of the republic, while at the bottom of their heart they breathe forth and use their exertions for the re-establishment of royalty, and the distraction of their country. These are the wealthy, and the wealthy have ever shunned virtue and extinguished morality. There, you will meet with misconducted women, too seductive in their attractions, who will mutually endeavour with them to beguile you by their vicious allurements. Beware, above all things beware, of the ci-devant † Palais Royal; it is in that garden you will meet with those traitors. That famous garden, the cradle of the revolution, late the asylum of the friends of liberty and equality, is at this day, in spite of an active superintendence, nothing else than the filthy sink of society, the resort of wretches, the den of all the conspirators. Fly from this pestiferous place; prefer, to the dangerous example of luxury and debauchery, the useful pictures of industrious virtue; visit the suburbs, the founders of our liberty; enter the workshops, where men of active minds, simple, and well-regulated as yourselves, and, like you, ready to defend their country, have long been waiting to rivet the links of fraternity. Above all, attend our popular societies. Let us be unanimous! let us acquire new vigour from the dangers that threaten our country, and let us, once for all, swear death and destruction to tyrants.

The first attention that was paid them, was to take them to the Jacobins, who received them with the greatest satisfaction, and offered them the use of their hall for their meetings. The commissaries accepted this offer, and it was settled they should hold their deliberations in the very body of the club, and should also mix with them during the day. The only consequence of this was, that there were only four hundred more Jacobins at Paris. The club, which sat every second day, now wished to meet every day, in order to confer with the commissaries of the departments upon those measures which concerned the public welfare. It was said that among the number of those commissaries, some of them had a leaning towards indulgence, and that they had been desired to demand a general amnesty on the day the constitution was accepted. In point of fact, some persons had conceived this measure for the purpose of saving the imprisoned Girondists and all others in custody in respect of political offences. But the Jacobins were averse to any accommodation; for all they required was energy and vengeance. The commissaries of the primary assemblies, said Hassenfratz, were slandered by the report that they had desired an amnesty; they were utterly incapable of doing any such thing, and would unite with the Jacobins in demanding not only prompt measures for the public welfare, but the punishment of all traitors. The commissaries took the hint, and if some few of them had any idea of an amnesty, not one of them dared to propose it.

On the 7th of August in the morning, they were conducted to the commune, and from the commune to the Evêché, where the electors' club held its sittings, and where the events of the 31st of May had been concocted. It was there that the reconciliation of the departments with Paris was arranged to take place, because it was from thence that the attack upon the national representation had issued. Pache the mayor, the procurator Chaumotte, and the entire municipality marching before them, introduced the commissaries to the Evêché. Speeches were made by both parties to each other; the Parisians declared that they had never desired to slight or usurp departmental rights; the commissaries in their turn admitted that an unauthorized imputation had been cast upon Paris; thereupon they immediately embraced one another, and abandoned themselves to the most perfect flow of soul. It suddenly occurred to them, that they should repair to the convention in order to make them parties to this reconciliation. Business was suspended, and one of the commissaries addressed the convention. "Citizens representatives," said he, "we are come hither to acquaint you with the melting scene that has just taken place in the hall of the electors, whither we had repaired to give our brethren of Paris the kiss of peace. We trust that it will not be long before the heads of those who had uttered unworthy imputations against this republican city, shall fall under the sword of the law. All of us are Mountaineers; long live the Mountain!" Another of the commissaries requested that the representatives should give the commissaries a fraternal embrace. Instantly the members of the assembly quit their seats, and fling themselves into the arms of the commissaries of the departments. After some few minutes devoted to this scene of tender emotion and flow of soul, the commissaries file off through the hall, shouting out "Long live the Mountain! long live the republic!" and singing

* In France every thing is done by means of an "administration," which may be termed a subdivided apportionment of public functions. The subject of these administrations, however, are not unfrequently those which, in England, are confined to private enterprise. The sale of milk, and the establishment of public conveyances, are two well-known subjects of these "administrations." Trans.

† This term, which has occurred before, was a bitter reproach used by the revolutionists against those who were presumed attached to the old regime. Trans.

En congédiant Gensonné,
La Montagne nous a sauvés
En congédiant Gensonné.
Au diable les Buzots

They next went to the Jacobins, where they prepared, in the name of all the commissaries of the primary assemblies, an address, declaratory of the fact that false imputations had been made against Paris. "Brethren and friends," wrote they, "cease your apprehensions. We all of us here are quite agreed. Our souls are as one, and liberty triumphant bestows her smiles on none but Jacobins, brethren, and friends. The Marais is no more. We constitute here but one vast and terrible Mountain, which is about to pour forth her fiery stream upon all royalists and advocates of tyranny. Perish the infamous libellers who have scandalized Paris! We are watching here night and day, and are labouring in company with our brethren of the capital for the common weal. We shall not return to our hearths till we announce to you that France is free and the country saved." This address, when read, was most enthusiastically applauded, and was forthwith sent to the convention for the purpose of its being entered on their votes for the day. The intoxication of the moment became general; a crowd of speakers rushed to the tribune of the club, every one's head seemed turned by the excitement. Robespierre perceiving this ferment, immediately required leave to speak. Every one most willingly made way for him. Jacobins, commissaries, and all, overwhelmed with applause the celebrated orator, whom some of them had neither seen or heard.

* This was the name of a revolutionary song of the year 1790, the burden or chorus of which (refrain) Dansons la Carmagnole,—a. was repeated as the singers danced in a ring. The word Carmagnole was first applied to the most extravagant members of the Jacobin club, who affected to wear a vest called a Carmagnole, which term probably was associated with a town of that name in the Sardinian States. The song of the Carmagnole seems to have been sung to a popular air, Malbrough s'en va-t-en guerre, —a. the burden of which is supposed to be extremely ancient. The air suddenly started into extreme popularity in the year 1781, from the circumstances mentioned in Chamber's Edinb. Journal, I. 38. (N. S.) Trans.

Robespierre commenced by congratulating the departments, who had just then saved France. "They saved it," said he, "for the first time in the year '89, in voluntarily putting themselves in a state of defence; the second occasion was when they came to Paris to carry out the 10th August; a third time, when they came to present, in the midst of the capital, an example of unity and absolute reconciliation. At the time I am now speaking, untoward events have oppressed the republic, and placed her in jeopardy; but republicans have nothing to fear, they should rather repress any emotion that may involve them in excesses. A design had been broached of procuring a factitious dearth, and inducing a riot; a scheme was agitating for gathering the populace to the arsenal, to destroy the ammunition, or set it on fire, as had been done in many other towns; in short, every endeavour was made to excite a sensation in the prisons, for the mere purpose of libelling Paris, and dissolving the union which has just been ratified. Beware of these snares," added Robespierre, "be ye calm and intrepid, boldly brave the dangers to which the country is exposed, and do your utmost to save her." Tranquility was restored by this address, and they did not separate without first complimenting the discreet orator with repeated plaudits.

The next ensuing days did not witness any commotion in Paris, but nothing was omitted which had a tendency to operate upon the public mind, and encourage a lofty enthusiasm. There was no concealing any danger, there was no making a mystery of any adverse event; the public was in due course informed of the defeats in La Vendée, the alarming intelligence (daily getting worse and worse) from Toulon, the retreating movement of the army of the Rhine, which fell back before the conquerors of Mentz, and, lastly, of the extremely perilous state of the army of the North, which had retreated to Caesar's camp, and which the Imperialists, the English, and the Dutch, who having made themselves masters of Condé and Valenciennes, and forming an irresistible mass, were able to carry by storm. The intervening space between Caesar's camp and Paris was now no more than forty leagues, and there was not a single regiment, or a single impediment, to obstruct the march of the enemy. If the army of the North had been taken prisoners, all had been lost, and the slightest reports from that quarter were eagerly laid hold of.

Those apprehensions were not without good foundation, and at this juncture Caesar's camp was in the greatest possible jeopardy. On the evening of the 7th of August, the allies came up to it, and threatened it on all sides. Between Cambray and Bouchain a line of heights extends itself, and the claimed that they had sworn not to separate until the convention had taken measures for the public welfare, and they declared that they should compel it to remain in office. Audouin, the son-in-law of Pache, next spoke, and moved the question of demanding the levy en masse, and also the imprisonment of suspected persons. Forthwith the commissaries of the primary assemblies prepared a petition, and upon the morrow the 12th attended to present the same to the convention. They required that the convention should take upon herself the care of saving the country, that no act of oblivion whatever should be enacted, that suspected persons should be arrested, that the commissaries of the primary assembly should be first sent against the enemy, and that the people raised en masse should march behind them. A portion of these propositions was adopted, the apprehension of suspected persons was in effect decreed; but the plan of a levy en masse, which appeared too violent a measure, was referred to the inquiry of the committee of public welfare. The Jacobins, who were discontented, insisted upon, and never ceased to repeat in their clubs, that no partial, but a general movement was the thing needful.

A few days afterwards the committee made its report, and proposed an enactment of too uncertain a character, as well as some proclamations deficient in vigour.

"The committee," exclaimed Danton, "has not stated every thing; it has not stated that if France be vanquished, that if she is torn in pieces, the wealthy will be the first victims of the rapacity of the tyrants; it has not stated that the vanquished patriots will rend and burn this republic, rather than see it pass into the hands of their insolent conquerors! This is what these wealthy egotists must be taught. What can you expect," added Danton, "you who will not exert yourselves for the salvation of the republic. Are you aware what will befall you if liberty should fall? A regency under the direction of an incompetent person, an infant king, whose minority will be protracted, and lastly, the dismembering of our provinces and a most frightful internal commotion! Yes, ye wealthy, they would overtax you, and would squeeze you more, ay a thousand times more than you will have to spend for the salvation of your country, and the perpetual establishment of liberty. The convention," further added Danton, "holds in her hands the thunderbolts of popular power; let her use them and launch them forth against the hands of tyrants. She has the commissaries of the primary assemblies, she has her own members, let her send the one and the other to carry into execution an universal resort to arms."

The draughts of the proposed enactments were again referred to the committee. The next day the Jacobins again despatched the commissaries of the primary assemblies to the convention. The latter came to demand once more, not a partial enlistment, but a levy en masse, because, as they observed, half measures are abortive, and for this reason it is far easier to make a strong impression upon an entire nation than upon a portion of its citizens. "If you require," added they, "a hundred thousand soldiers, they will not be found; but millions of men will assemble to a general call. Let there be no exemption for that citizen who is of physical ability to bear arms, whatever may be his occupation; let agriculture alone retain those hands, without which the fruits of the earth cannot be preserved; rather let the current of commerce be momentarily stopped in its course, nay, let all business cease, let the grand and all-absorbing and sole business of the French be the salvation of the republic.

The convention was unable to resist a summons so urgently pressed. Partaking herself, in some measure, of the excitement of the petitioners, she gave instructions to her committee to withdraw for the purpose of instantly preparing the draught of a decree for a levy en masse. The committee returned in a few minutes, and presented the following rescript, which was adopted in the midst of general rejoicing.

"Article 1. The French people declare, through the medium of her representatives, that it will rise as one man in the defence of its liberty and its constitution, as well as for the conclusive deliverance of its territory from its enemies.

"2. The committees of public welfare will to-morrow present the mode in which this great national movement shall be carried into effect."
